intended to compliment the king withal, upon the birth of the prince. So one ſaid, * twelve talents, perhaps; another more or leſs, according to their ability; ſome, in fine, one thing, ſome another; Hyrcanus ſeeming uneaſy all this while, upon a pretence, that he could not come up to their proportion; for † five talents, he ſaid, was all that he was able to advance. Theſe ſervants told their maſters what paſs'd betwixt them and Hyrcanus, who were not a little pleaſed to think how the narrowneſs of the young's man preſent would leſſen him in the eſteem of the king. But when it came to appear upon the day appointed for the ſolemnity of making their oblations, that ‡ twenty talents was the moſt that was given by any man, Hyrcanus only excepted, whoſe preſent was a hundred boys, and a hundred girls; the former for the king, the other for the queen; and with every one of them || a talent for another preſent over and above. This was ſo exceſſive and ſo unexpected a munificence, that the king himſelf and all his friends were in admiration at it; beſide the gratuity of divers talents more, that were diſtributed among the king's miniſters and officers, for fear of the worſt; Hyrcanus's brothers having employed their uttermoſt intereſt with them to get him deſtroy'd. The king was ſo tenderly ſenſible of the greatneſs of the young man's mind, and the graceful way of expreſſing it, that he bad him ask what he would, and he ſhould have it; of which generous offer he made no other uſe, than to deſire his majeſty's letters of recommendation back again to his father and brethren; ſo the king took an honourable leave of him, preſented him like a prince; and with recommendatory letters to his father and brothers, and to his own officers and governors, he gave him his diſcharge. But when his brothers came to underſtand how magnificently the king and queen had receiv'd him, and the eſteem they had of him, and that his reputation was now much greater at his return than it was before this expedition, they laid their heads together how they might lay an ambuſh for him upon the road, intercept and deſtroy him; and this not altogether without their father's privity neither, who was ſo highly diſguſted at his extravagant expence upon the late preſents, that he did not much care what became of him, though he was forced, however, to diſſemble the matter for fear of the king. It came to this iſſue in the concluſion, that the brothers met, and aſſaulted him upon the way; and after a reſolute reſiſtance on his part, loſt a conſiderable number of the train; two of the brotherhood kill'd upon the place, and the reſt made the beſt ſhift they could to get back again to their father at Jeruſalem. Hyrcanus kept on his way into the city; but finding that no body own'd him there, he croſs'd the river Jordan for his own ſecurity, where he ſpent the remainder of his life in gathering the king's duties from the Barbarians. This was in the days of Seleucus the king of Aſia, otherwiſe called Soter, or the Saviour, the ſon of Antiochus the Great. About the ſame time died Joſeph, the father of Hyrcanus, a man of great piety and reſolution, and a perſon that highly contributed to the relief and well-being of the Jews in all their diſtreſſes. He executed a commiſſion of receiver of all publick duties in Syria, Phenicia, and Samaria, for the ſpace of two and twenty years. His uncle Onias died alſo about the ſame time, and his ſon Simon ſucceeded him to the prieſthood; and he going off too, his ſon Onias ſucceeded him, to whom Arius king of the Lacedemonians ſent an embaſſy in the terms following.

The magnificence and curioſity of Hyrcanus's preſents.

The king is ſo delighted with it, that he bids him ask what he will and he ſhall have it. Hyrcanus only deſires the king's recommendatory letters back again, which the king grants, and ſo with honourable preſents diſmiſſes him.

Arius king of Lacedemon to the high-prieſt Onias.

"WHEREAS there is come to our hand an ancient manuſcript, ſetting forth the near affinity betwixt our anceſtors and yours, and the relation we have to the line of Abraham, it is but reaſonable for brethren ſo nearly allied to do all good offices one toward another. This is therefore to offer you the command of any thing within our power to ſerve you, as we ourſelves ſhall take the ſame freedom in looking upon your concerns as our own, and joining in one common intereſt. You are to receive this letter from our truſty ſubject and ſervant Demoteles, written in a quarto page, and ſeal'd with the figure of an eagle holding a dragon in her talons." This was the purport of the letter.

All in mutiny and ſedition after the death of Joſeph.

AFTER the death of Joſeph, the people broke out into mutinies and ſeditions, upon the quarrel of the ſons that he had left behind him, the elder brothers making war upon the younger; the greater part of the people appearing alſo in favour of the former; and among the reſt, Simon the high-prieſt, upon the account of his relation. Hyrcanus did not think fit to return to Jeruſalem, but however kept himſelf ſtill beyond Jordan, where he maintain'd a perpetual war with the Arabians, killing great numbers of them, and carrying others into captivity. He cauſed to be erected there a marvellous ſtrong caſtle, the walls from the bottom to the top all of white ſtone, with figures upon them of ſeveral ſorts of creatures, of an extraordinary ſize and proportion. This building was encompaſſed with a deep ditch, or moat, and vaults cut out through a moun-

There were alſo in this caſtle fair eating-rooms, and places for entertainment and lodging; variety of fountains up and down, both for pleaſure and for ornament; large courts, ſtately buildings, lovely and ſpacious gardens; and to this place thus perfected he gave the name of Tyre, which lies upon the borders of Arabia and Judea beyond Jordan, and not far from the country of the Eſſebonites. Hyrcanus held this government for the ſpace of ſeven years; that is to ſay, for the whole time that Seleucus reign'd in Syria. After his death his brother Antiochus ſucceeded him, otherwiſe called Epiphanes, and then died Ptolemy alſo, king of Egypt, who was likewiſe called Epiphanes. This Ptolemy left two ſons behind him, both of them minors; the name of the elder was Philometor, and the name of the other Phyſcon. Antiochus was at that time very ſtrong and powerful; inſomuch, that Hyrcanus, for fear of being call'd to an account for his inroads upon the Arabians, laid violent hands upon himſelf, and Antiochus took poſſeſſion of all his goods and eſtate.

CHAP. VI.

Onias, otherwiſe Menelaus, is excluded from the pontificate. He betakes himſelf to Antiochus, and apoſtatizes from his religion. Antiochus makes a furious inroad into Egypt, but the Romans force him back again.

ONIAS the high-prieſt dying about this time, Antiochus Epiphanes advanced his brother Jeſus to the pontificate, in the minority of a ſon he had then living, of whom we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. This Jeſus fell under the king's diſpleaſure, who depoſed him from the pontificate, and transferred it afterward to Onias the younger brother. Now theſe were the three ſons of Simon, and they all came to the dignity, as we have already ſet forth; but Jeſus choſe rather to take upon himſelf the name of Jaſon, as the other changed his name for Menelaus. In this confuſion of chopping and changing, one brother advanc'd a faction againſt the other, and the people divided upon it. The ſons of Tobias ſided with the new high-prieſt Menelaus; but the greater part of the multitude joined intereſts with Jaſon, and ſo much overpower'd the other, that Menelaus and the ſons of Tobias withdrew to Antioch, declaring themſelves that they would no longer be tied up to their country's laws and inſtitutions, but go over to the religion of their king, and the Greek way of worſhip; deſiring liberty to erect a kind of academy, or place for publick exerciſes in Jeruſalem. Upon the obtaining of this licence, they order'd their bodies ſo, that even naked, there was no viſible difference betwixt them and the Greeks, at the ſame time caſting off all regard to the Jewiſh laws and cuſtoms, and betaking themſelves to the ways and manners of other nations.

Antiochus upon the death of Onias advances Jeſus to the high-prieſthood, under the name of Jaſon, who is depoſed, and the dignity transferr'd to his younger brother Onias, under the name of Menelaus.

Two factions; the ſons of Tobias ſide with Menelaus, and the multitude with Jaſon.

The party of Tobias renounces the Jewiſh religion for that of the Greeks.

ANTIOCHUS finding himſelf at this time ſo eaſy at home, and his people ſo well ſettled, had a great mind to try an expedition into Egypt, partly out of an ambition to make himſelf maſter of the country, and partly encourag'd by the weakneſs and inability of Ptolemy's ſons, to manage ſuch a war; ſo that he advanced with a mighty army to Peluſium, where he ſlily circumvented Philometor by craft, and got footing in Egypt; advancing from thence to Memphis, and other neighbouring places, which he reduced likewiſe; and ſo to Alexandria, with a deſign to reduce at once both the king and the city; but upon the peremptory command of the Romans, to withdraw his army immediately, upon his utmoſt peril, he gave over his deſign, and quitted what he had taken, as we have ſaid heretofore; but in regard that we have only touch'd upon this ſubject in our former writings, it will be now neceſſary to handle the hiſtory of this king more at large, and in particular to report the manner of his taking Jeruſalem and the temple.

Antiochus breaks into Egypt, takes Memphis, and marches againſt Alexandria.

The Romans command him to withdraw; whereupon he quits what he had taken.

CHAP. VII.

Jeruſalem betray'd to Antiochus. The temple rifled, the city levell'd, and the worſhip of God forbidden upon pain of death and torments. A great many Jews turn idolaters. The Samaritans dedicate the temple at Garizin to Jupiter.

ANTIOCHUS, at his return from Egypt, when he was frighted away by the menaces of the Romans, marched with his army outright to Jeruſalem, and enter'd the city in the hundred and forty third year, from the time that the kingdom of Syria fell into the family of Seleucus. He made himſelf maſter of it without any ſort of difficulty; for the gates were ſet open to him, by the treachery of a party he had made in the town, where he exerciſed great cruelty, and put a great many people to the ſword, without diſtinction of friend or foe; pillag'd the city, and carried the treaſure away to Antioch.

Antiochus takes Jeruſalem by treachery; ſacks it, and lays it waſte.

THIS calamity happen'd in the ſecond year after the taking of the city, in the hundred and forty fifth year from the firſt Seleucus, the twenty fifth day of the month, which we call Chaſleu, the Macedonians Appellæus, and in the hundred and fifty third olympiad. In the licence of this outrage they did not ſpare ſo much as thoſe who quietly open'd the gates to them, only for the greater liberty of breaking in upon the riches of the temple, where the ſpoil was ſo conſiderable, that the very value, they thought, might in ſome degree atone for the treachery. The temple, in ſhort, was wholly ſtripp'd and rifled, all the holy veſſels and utenſils taken away, the golden candleſticks, the golden altar, and the table of ſhew-bread, as they call'd it, among the reſt. The curtains, and the embroidery of ſilk and fine linnen; nay, the very hiding-places, where they conceal'd an immenſe maſs of treaſure, were all laid open and expos'd, and not ſo much as any relicks left of this prodigious wealth; and further to conſummate the miſery of theſe poor people, their daily ſacrifices were forbidden, the city levell'd with the ground, the inhabitants partly kill'd, partly carried away captives, together with their wives and children, to the number of ten thouſand; their walls demoliſh'd, and their ſtately edifices conſum'd by fire. He erected a tower in the city that overlook'd and commanded the temple itſelf; and when he had ſupplied and fortified the place, put a ſtrong garriſon of Macedonians into it, but not without a mixture of execrable and apoſtate Jews, that were as malicious as the very worſt of their enemies. He raiſed an altar in the temple, and ſacrificed hogs upon it, in a moſt ſpiteful contradiction to the laws and conſtitutions of the Jews. He forced all people to extremities, who would not renounce the true God, and worſhip his idols; and ſo in all other cities and towns, he built temples and altars for the daily ſacrifice of ſwines fleſh. He made it grievouſly penal for any of the Jews to circumciſe their children, keeping officers and informers ſtill at hand, either to proſecute them upon the violation of his edicts, or to extort from them an obedience by terror or force; and ſo it was in fine, that the greater part of the Jews, either of their own accord, or out of fear of puniſhment, complied with the king's orders, though there were others again ſo brave and generous, as to ſtand firm againſt all trials of torment and death itſelf, rather than depart from the religion and laws of their country; having their bodies cut and torn with whips, and then crucified alive, with their wives, and ſo many of their children as were circumcis'd, hanging about their necks according to the king's order. The holy ſcriptures were deſtroyed alſo wherever they were found; and it was made death ſo much as to entertain them.

Unheard-of cruelties.

The Samaritans were no longer of the ſtock of Abraham, they ſay, but Medes and Perſians.

THE Samaritans, conformable to the character we have before given of them, when they found the Jews reduced to ſo miſerable a ſtate of diſtreſs, for fear of being brought to bear a ſhare in their calamities, immediately diſclaimed all kindred with them, diſowning the temple of Garizin for the temple of God, and alledging themſelves to be of the race (as indeed they were) of the Medes and Perſians. To enforce the belief of which, and in order to take off the danger apprehended upon this occaſion, they ſent a ſolemn embaſſy and addreſs to Antiochus, in theſe terms:

To the king Antiochus Epiphanes, the illuſtrious god, the humble petition of the Sidonians, inhabitants of Sichem, ſheweth,

The Sichemites petition to Antiochus.

"THAT the forefathers of your petitioners lying under the affliction of "many and grievous plagues in their own "country, were partly wrought upon by that "calamity, and in part prevail'd upon by the "ſuperſtition of an ancient cuſtom, to join in "the religious obſervance of a certain feſtival, "which the Jews call the ſabbath, and in the "erecting of a temple upon the mountain Ga"rizin, where ſacrifices were offered to a God "without a name. Now ſince it is ſo, that "your majeſty hath been pleaſed to inflict a "puniſhment upon this wicked people, ſuitable "to the heinouſneſs of their offences, and to "appoint officers, who upon a ſuppoſition that "we were all of the ſame ſtock, are thereby "induced to involve your petitioners with the "Jews in the ſame crime; whereas we derive "our original from the Sidonians, as we can "make appear by records extant to this day: "May it therefore pleaſe your majeſty, out of "your clemency and goodneſs, to grant ſuch "order to Apollonius our governor, and to "Nicanor his deputy, in favour of your peti"tioners, that they may not be any further "moleſted for the future, upon the ſuſpicion "of any correſpondency or confederacy with "the Jews, to whom we are as much ſtrangers "in our manners, as in our extraction; and "we do further pray, that the temple which "hath ſtood hitherto without any dedication "at all, may from this time forward be cal"led the Temple of Jupiter of Greece, to the "end that when we ſhall live in more ſecu"rity and freedom, as to the government of "our own private affairs, we may the better "attend thoſe duties in the advancement of "your ſervice and revenue." In anſwer to this requeſt of the Samaritans, the king wrote back as follows:

They renounce the Jews and their cuſtoms, and deſire that the temple of Garizin may be henceforth called the temple of Jupiter of Greece.

King Antiochus to Nicanor.

Antiochus to Nicanor, in favour of the Sidonians.

"HAVING receiv'd a petition from the "Sidonians at Sichem, which we have "here annexed to this letter, this is to let "you underſtand, that it appeareth unto us, "and to our council, upon the information of "the bearers thereof, that the Sidonians are "no way guilty of the crimes charged upon "the Jews; but on the contrary, that they "govern themſelves according to the way and "faſhion of the Greeks; wherefore it is our "will and pleaſure that they receive no fur"ther trouble about this matter; and as to "what concerns the temple, it is our will "likewiſe, that from this time forward it may "be known and diſtinguiſh'd by the name of "the Temple of Jupiter of Greece. We have "written to the ſame effect alſo to our gover"nor Apollonius. Dated in the year forty ſix, "and the eleventh day of the month of He"catombæon."

1 Maccab. ii. 1.

THERE lived at this time in Modim, a village of Judea, one * Matthias, a prieſt of the family of Joarib, and a native of Jeruſalem. This Matthias was the † ſon of John, the ſon of Simon, and Simon the ſon of Aſmonæus. Matthias had five ſons; Joannan, who was ſirnamed Gaddis; Simon, otherwiſe Thaſſi; Judas, who was alſo called Maccabæus; Eleazar, alias Auran; and Jonathan, ſirnamed Apphus. This Matthias would be every now and then condoling with his ſons, upon the deplorable ſtate of the Jewiſh nation, their city laid deſolate, their temple pillag'd and prophan'd, with a thouſand other calamities; and he would be often ſaying alſo, how much more glorious it would be to fall a ſacrifice to the laws and religion of their country, than to linger out a miſerable life after this ſervile manner.

The king's officers tempt Matthias with rewards and threatenings to worſhip as he is commanded; but he poſitively refuſes. 1 Maccab. ii. 15--22.

UPON the coming of the king's officers into the village to preſs the execution of their maſter's orders, they began with Matthias, as a perſon of authority, and one who might be a leading example to all the reſt. They laid before him the danger of diſobeying, with the advantages and rewards he ſhould receive upon his compliance; and upon theſe terms charg'd him in the king's name to worſhip as he was commanded, which he not only refuſed to do, but told them poſitively moreover, that if every ſoul within their maſter's dominions ſhould yield to him in that particular, he would never either ſubmit to him himſelf, or adviſe any of his ſons to abandon the religion of their country. Matthias ſtopt here; and after a ſhort ſilence, out ſtept a Jew to ſacrifice according to the king's way; but Matthias and his ſons were ſo inflam'd at the indignity of this affront, that in a fury they not only kill'd the Jew, but the king's officer Apelles, with all his guard about him, as they were forcing the people to that abominable worſhip. In this heat they overturn'd the altar alſo; Matthias calling out with a loud voice to the people about him, "As ma"ny of you, ſays he, as have an hearty re"gard for the purity of your religion, follow
"me." And ſo the father and the ſons withdrew themſelves immediately into the wilderneſs, leaving their goods and their effects behind them. Soon after this a great part of the reſt, of the people with their wives and children, after ſo generous an example, fled into the ſame deſart, where they made a ſhift to live for ſome time in caves. When this came to the ear of the king's general officers, they drew the gariſon out of the caſtle at Jeruſalem, and march'd after the Jews into the wilderneſs. Upon coming up to them, they eſſay'd to bring them over firſt by good counſel and fair words, adviſing them to bethink themſelves, and to take ſoberer meaſures, without forcing the ſoldiers upon the neceſſity of a military execution: but all this was to no purpoſe; and when they ſaw there was no good to be done that way, they pitch'd upon the ſabbath-day for an attack upon them; burning and deſtroying them in their holes, without any ſort of reſiſtance, and without ſo much as ſtopping the mouths of their caves; for ſuch was the reverence they had for the ſacredneſs of that day, and for the obſervance of the laws that commanded them to keep it holy, that they choſe rather to periſh, than prophane it. There were a matter of a thouſand of them, men, women, and children, who were thus ſuffocated under ground; but there were great numbers alſo that made their eſcape, and liſted themſelves under the command of Matthias. But upon this experiment he preached another doctrine to them; and that in caſe of ſuch an extremity, they were not to refuſe fighting, but to defend themſelves upon the ſabbath, as well as upon another day; for otherwiſe that ſcruple would be their total deſtruction; when their enemies taking advantage of that ſuperſtition, would be ſure ſtill to attack them at a time when they were certain they ſhould meet with no reſiſtance. The reaſon of this diſcourſe was ſo clear, that they were all convinced of the lawfulneſs of uſing their arms upon the ſabbath, in caſe of neceſſity; and the practice of it has continu'd ever ſince. This great general was by this time maſter of a conſiderable force; inſomuch that he deſtroy'd their altars, and put all apoſtates to the ſword wherever he could come at them; appointing children to be circumcis'd, which was before forbidden; and driving away the king's officers that were appointed to hinder it; having drawn into a body, all that had diſperſed themſelves up and down into privacies and hiding-places for fear of the enemy.

He kills an apoſtate Jew in the very act of idolatry, with the officer that commanded the party, Ver. 24, 25.

Matthias and his ſons withdrew into the wilderneſs, and multitudes follow their example, Ver. 27--30.

The ſoldiers fall upon them in their hidden places upon the ſabbath-day, and kill about 1000 of them without any reſiſtance, Ver. 31--38.

Matthias cries down the doctrine of non-reſiſtance upon that day, and cures the ſuperſtition, Ver. 39--41.

Matthias deſtroys the idol altars, and puts apoſtates to the ſword. V. 44--48.

MATTHIAS having now been a full year in this command, felt himſelf ſeiz'd with a mortal illneſs; and calling his ſons about him, ſpoke to them to this purpoſe. "My dear ſons
"(ſays he) my life is drawing to an end; but "I am now to charge you upon my bleſſing,
"before I leave you, that you ſtand firm to
"the cauſe that your father has aſſerted be-

"and do as I have adviſ'd you. Do your ut-

"your country, and to reſtore the order of a "nation that wants but very little of being "ſwallow'd up in confuſion; have nothing to "do with thoſe, that either for fear, or for "intereſt, have betray'd it. Shew yourſelves
"to be ſons worthy of ſuch a father; and in "contempt of all force and extremity, carry
"your lives in your hands and deliver them
"up with comfort, if any occaſion ſhould re"quire it, in defence of your country; com"puting with yourſelves, that this is the way
"to preſerve you in God's favour; and that
"in conſideration of ſo unſhaken a virtue, he "will in time reſtore you to the liberty of "your former life and manners. Our bodies
"'tis true, are mortal; but great and gene"rous actions will make us immortal in our "memory, and that's the glory I would have
"you aſpire to; that is to ſay, the glory of "making the hiſtory of your life famous to
"after ages by your illuſtrious actions. Be
"ſure, in the firſt place, to agree among your-"ſelves, and in what caſe ſoever any one of "you hath an advantage over the reſt, give "way to every man in the buſineſs of his pro"vince and talent. As for example; it be"ing Simon's faculty to make a right judg"ment of things, I ſhall adviſe you to pay the "ſame regard to his counſels as thoſe of a
"father; Maccabæus excels in military con"duct and bravery; wherefore chuſe him for
"your general, as the beſt qualify'd for the "vindicating of your friends, and for the "cruſhing of your enemies. Do but mind
"your buſineſs; and depend upon it, that all
"men of honour and piety will join with you."

After the death of Matthias, Judas ſucceeded to the command of the army.

The death of Matthias. V. 70.

Modim. After his funeral obſequies, according to the forms of decency and honour, were well over, Judas, otherwiſe called Maccabæus, had the publick adminiſtration put into his hands; which was in the year one hundred forty ſix, reckoning from Seleucus the firſt; and he was ſo well ſeconded by his brothers, that he clear'd the country of the enemy, put all renegadoes to the ſword, and purged the land from all the abominable pollutions that had been practis'd there.

His ſon Judas ſucceeds to his command. 1 Maccab. iii. 1.

CHAP. X.

Judas Maccabæus defeats Apollonius, the governour of Samaria, and kills him hand to hand. Seron, upon this, marches againſt Judas. He himſelf falls in the action, and his army is totally routed.

Judas encounters Apollonius; and kills him with his own hand. V. 1, 11.

THE news of this turn of affairs upon the progreſs of Judas, induced Apollonius, the governour of Samaria, to advance with his army againſt Judas; who, without any loſs of time, met him half way, fought and routed him, kill'd a great number of his people upon the place, and Apollonius himſelf for one; diſarming him with his own hand, and carrying off his ſword in triumph. He had alſo the ſpoil of the camp, a booty of prodigious value.

THE tidings of this defeat, and of the vaſt enforcements that came thronging in to Judas, upon the ſucceſs (even to the degree of a conſiderable army) gave Seron the governour of Cœle-Syria to underſtand, that it was high time to look about him; ſo that he took up a reſolution immediately to puſh it to a battle, reckoning himſelf bound, even upon a point of truſt and confidence, to chaſtiſe mutineers, and bring rebels to obedience. In order to this expedition, with what men he had of his own, and with the additional force of a rabble of fugitive Jews, he took his march to Bethoron, a village of Judea, where he pitch'd his camp; whereupon, Judas put himſelf in poſture to encounter him; but finding his ſoldiers out of humour, if not out of heart; whether it was for fear of their mighty army, or for faintneſs upon over-faſting, he made them a ſhort harangue, that animated them with freſh courage and reſolution. "Fellow-"ſoldiers, (ſays he) it is not the arm of fleſh, "but God, that gives the victory; not mul-"titudes of men, but truſt and confidence in "the Almighty. This is no more than we "have found many and many a time experi-"mentally true in the hiſtory of our anceſ-"tors; who with an inconſiderable number "of men, in a righteous cauſe, that is to ſay, "in the defence of their religion, laws, li-"berties, wives and children, have put many "thouſands to flight. Great is truth, in ſhort, "and the force of innocence is invincible." With theſe words, he led his men on to the battle, where they behaved themſelves like heroes; engag'd Seron, and kill'd him upon the ſpot; defeating the whole army of the Aſſyrians. For upon the fall of their general their troops were preſently broken and ſcatter'd, and every man's buſineſs was only to ſhift the beſt he could for himſelf. Judas had the chace of them as far as the plain; about eight hundred of them were ſlain in the field of battle, and the reſt made their eſcape toward the ſea-ſide.

Judas gives battle to Seron; kills him upon the ſpot, and routs his army. V. 15--24.

CHAP. XI.

Judas Maccabæus encounters Antiochus with a mighty army, and defeats him. He cuts off five thouſand of another army under Lyſias, purifies the temple, ſets the country right, and ſo returns to Jeruſalem.

THESE diſaſters, one upon the neck of another, forced Antiochus upon the neceſſity of an extraordinary levy; inſomuch, that what with his own people, and with Greek mercenaries that he took into pay, he got a mighty army together in a ſhort time, with a reſolution to break into Judea with it early in the next ſpring: But theſe troubles had given ſuch an interruption to the raiſing of his taxes, over and above the frankneſs and generoſity of his own nature, that upon the payment of his troops, he found money fall ſhort, and that the income of his revenue would not anſwer the charge of the war. Upon this conſideration, he propoſed rather to go into Perſia firſt, and to ſupply himſelf with what monies he could pick up out of that province, leaving the command of all the country betwixt Egypt and Euphrates, during his abſence, in the hands of one Lyſias, a perſon of an approved faith and integrity, together with ſome part alſo of his troops and elephants; giving him further in charge, to have a particular care of his ſon Antiochus, till he ſhould come back again. And moreover, that upon the reducing of Judea, and the ſelling of all the inhabitants for ſlaves, he ſhould utterly deſtroy the city, and extirpate the nation. Upon the giving of theſe orders, he marched ſtraight away from Perſia, in the year one hundred and forty ſeven; and paſſing the Euphrates, advanced forward into the higher countries.

Money falling ſhort with him, he goes into Perſia for ſupplies. V. 29--31.

He leaves Lyſias to manage the war of Judea in his abſence, and to take care of his ſon Antiochus. V. 32--36.

LYSIAS took to his aſſiſtance, in the execution of this commiſſion, Ptolemy the ſon of Dorymenes, Gorgias, and Nicanor; three of the beſt officers he could find among the king's beſt friends. He put theſe commanders at the head of forty thouſand foot, and ſeven thouſand horſe, with orders to march forthwith into Judea. They advanced as far as Emmaus, and there encamped upon the plain, where there came over to them great numbers of auxiliaries from Syria, and other neighbouring countries, and an abundance of fugitive Jews; beſides ſeveral merchants and traders, with a great deal of money about them to buy ſlaves; who brought fetters alſo and manacles with them of all ſorts to ſecure their captives. The enemy had gotten a formidable army; but Judas however bad them caſt themſelves upon Providence, and fear nothing; and ſo they humbled themſelves in ſackcloth, faſting and prayer, according to the cuſtom of the country, in imminent danger; imploring God's mercy, favour and protection. The general's next buſineſs was to range his men by regiments, troops and companies, into order of battle, according to the Jewiſh cuſtom; and then to diſcharge the army of all new-married men, and ſuch as had lately made purchaſes, who probably might be thinking of ſomething elſe

Judas has word ſent him that Gorgias intended to beat up his quarters that night. 1 Mac. iv. 1-4.

AFTER this ſpeech of Judas to his ſoldiers, while his thoughts were intently taken up about the ſucceſs of the approaching battle, there came intelligence to him from a ſure hand, that Gorgias would be with him that night with a thouſand horſe, and five thouſand foot, with ſome Renegado-Jews for their guide, to ſurprize him, and beat up his quarters. This diſcovery put Judas upon a deſign of countermining him; which was at the ſame time to make an attempt upon the camp of the enemy, taking the opportunity of their being ſo divided. In order to this he call'd preſently for ſupper; cauſed ſeveral fires to be made in his camp, and ſo marched all night toward Emmaus, where the enemy lay. Gorgias, in the mean time, finding no body left in the Jews camp; and preſuming that they were run away for fear, to hide themſelves in the mountains, reckon'd that he had little more to do than to learn how he might hunt them out. But Judas coming by break of day to the enemy's camp, with only three thouſand men, and thoſe ill-armed too; and finding the enemy well armed at all points, and their camp in very good order, Judas told his people for their encouragement, that they ſhould not fear to attack them, even if they were all naked, ſo long as they were certain of God's favour and protection, which would ſupport them againſt all other difficulties; and with theſe words, he order'd the ſounding of the charge; and breaking in upon them at the ſame inſtant, put them into ſuch a ſurprize and conſternation, that after the putting of thoſe to the ſword that reſiſted, the reſt betook themſelves to flight, and they had the purſuit of them as far as Gadara, and ſo to the plains of Idumea, Azotus and Jamnia. The number of the ſlain was about three thouſand: But Judas would not ſuffer his people to meddle with the ſpoil, in regard that the troops of Gorgias were as yet entire; but upon the routing of him, he ſaid, that they might take poſſeſſion of the booty at leiſure. While theſe words were between his lips, Gorgias's people diſcovering from an eminence near hand, the dead bodies of their friends; the havock that had been made in their tents, and their camp all in a ſmoak, they took for granted all this while that Judas's men were ſtill in a body, and in condition to attack them; ſo that they fled immediately upon it, and diſperſed themſelves ſeveral ways; every man conſulting his own ſafety. The victory being thus gained without a blow, Judas permitted his men at pleaſure to take the pillage of the field, where they found gold and ſilver, coſtly habits of purple and ſcarlet, and other rich booty in abundance; which they carry'd off ſafe and triumphing, ſinging as they marched, and giving thanks to God, the bleſſed author of that victory, which proved both an earneſt and a foundation of their future freedom.

Gorgias's people finding the ways ſtrew'd with dead bodies, and the camp in a ſmoak, give all for loſt, and every man ſhifts for himſelf. V. 16--22.

LYSIAS was ſo ſenſible of the ſhame and wound of this diſgrace, that to redeem his credit, he brought into the field, the year following, an army of ſixty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe; all try'd and choice men; and with this body he enter'd into Judea, by the way of the mountains, encamping at a place called Bethſura. Judas was not at all diſcourag'd at the odds of number, but marched directly up to him with an army only of ten thouſand men. His truſt was in God alone; ſo that after a ſhort, and a fervent prayer for a bleſſing upon his arms, he charged the enemy ſo home, that upon the firſt ſhock he forced the line, and cut them off five thouſand men upon the place. This unexpected diſaſter put their whole army into ſuch a confuſion, that Lyſias finding them obſtinately determin'd either to live or die free, thought it his beſt courſe to withdraw his troops before the conſternation was gone too far; out of an apprehenſion, not ſo much of their ſtrength, as of their deſpair; ſo that Lyſias returned to Antioch, where he poſted himſelf by the help of mercenaries, and other additional enforcements, to be ready for the firſt opportunity of a revenge upon the Jews.

Lyſias recruits, and falls into Judea with a powerful army again the the year following. V. 28.

Judas defeats Lyſias. V. 34.

JUDAS was ſo fluſhed with theſe repeated ſucceſſes againſt the forces of Antiochus, that he prevailed upon the Jews, in confidence that after ſo many victories obtained, God would not now forſake them, to march without any more delay to Jeruſalem itſelf, and there to purge the temple, and offer up their daily ſacrifices. But when they came thither, and found the temple abandon'd, the gates all burnt, and the courts over-run with weeds, Judas, and his people could not but ſhed tears to ſee the uncouth ſolitude and deformity of the place. The two great works that he firſt enter'd upon, were the aſſault of the citadel, and the cleanſing of the temple. The former he committed to his officers and ſoldiers, and reſerved the care of the other to himſelf. So ſoon as he had gone through with the purging of it in form, he provided new veſſels and utenſils; a candleſtick, a table and an altar of incenſe, all of pure gold; put up new veils and hangings upon the walls, and before the paſſages of the doors; and in the next place ſupply'd the doors themſelves. The altar that had been prophaned with idolatrous ſacrifices, and burnt-offerings, was demoliſh'd, and remov'd; and another of * unhewn ſtone erected in the place of it. Upon the twenty fifth day of the month Caſleu, which the Macedonians call Apellæus, they ſet lighted tapers in the candleſticks; offer'd incenſe upon the altar, and laid the ſhew-bread upon the table, and ſo went on to their oblations of burnt-offerings; and this fell out preciſely upon the ſame day, three years from the prophanation of the temple and religion by Antiochus; the temple having now been full three years deſerted. This happened in the † year one hundred forty five; the twenty fourth day of the month Apellæus, and the hundred and fifty third Olympiad; which ſolemnity of purification was repeated alſo on the anniverſary day of the year one hundred forty eight; Olympiad one hundred forty and four, as the prophet Daniel had expreſly foretold, four hundred and eight years before the diſſolution by the Macedonians came to paſs.

The temple purify'd, and God's holy worſhip reeſtabliſh'd. 1 Maccab. iv. V. 38–51.

THE celebration of this feſtivity was continued by Judas for eight days, with all ſolemnity of ſacrifices and rejoicing; as magnificent feaſting, and the freedom of indulging themſelves in all honeſt and lawful ſatisfactions and delights; and the air ringing with hymns of acclamation, praiſe, and thankſgiving. The people, in fine, were ſo tranſported at the unexpected bleſſing of finding themſelves reſtored to the religion and laws of their forefathers, that they appointed an anniverſary of eight days ſolemnity to be ſtrictly obſerved by their poſterity for ever after; which we have conſtantly celebrated from that time to this, under the name of the ‡ Feſtival of lights; alluding, I ſuppoſe, to the comfort of that light, which beyond all hope ſhined down from heaven upon us on this occaſion. Judas in the mean while rebuilt the walls of the city, and fortify'd them with ſtrong towers to keep off an enemy; ſettling a garriſon in Bethſura, and putting the place into a ſtate and poſture of defence.

THE neighbouring nations were ſo irritated at the growing power and confidence of the Jews, that they ſet their inſtruments at work by fraud and treachery to circumvent them, deſtroying many of them at unawares: Judas, in the mean time, uſing the beſt means he could, either to prevent, or to diſappoint their incurſions. He fell at this time upon Acrabatan, where he killed great numbers of the Edomites, the poſterity of Eſau, making himſelf maſter alſo of a great booty. He block'd up the ſons of Baan likewiſe their chief, in the ſtrong places they were poſſeſſed of, and where they lay in wait to make ſallies upon the Jews, taking the places by aſſault; killing the defendants, and laying the forts in aſhes. After the ſubduing of theſe people, he carried his arms againſt the Ammonites, who had at that time a numerous army under the command of Timotheus. He fought with theſe alſo, and overcame them, and then took the city of Jazar; carry'd away the people's wives and children, captives; and after the pillaging of the city, ſet it on fire, and ſo returned home victorious. He was no ſooner gone, but the people thereabouts taking advantage of his departure, and gathering together at Galaad, made an attempt upon the Jews that lay upon that quarter; who being forced to take ſanctuary in the fortreſs of Dathema, gave intimation to Judas, both by meſſengers and letters, that Timotheus had a deſign to attack them, and ſo prayed him earneſtly for relief. In the very inſtant, while Judas was reading his intelligence, came in ſeveral meſſengers from Galilee, with remonſtrances and complaints that the people of Ptolemais, Tyre and Sidon, and other bordering nations, were all join'd in a confederacy againſt them.

CHAP. XII.

Simon, the brother of Judas, does great things in Galilee. Judas and Jonathan get a bloody victory over the Ammonites. All the Jews, with their wives, families and effects, tranſported out of Galaad into Judea. Ephron laid in aſhes; and the males put to the ſword. Joſeph and Azarias fight contrary to orders, and are defeated by Gorgias.

JUDAS, who had an eye upon the neceſſity of his friends in both places, ſent his brother Simon with three thouſand choice men to the ſuccour of the Jews at Galilee; and with eight thouſand more marched with his other brother Jonathan to Galaad, leaving the reſt of the army under the command of Joſeph, the ſon of Zacharias and Azarias, as his lieutenant generals for the guard of Jeruſalem, with orders to forbear fighting till his return. Simon, upon his arrival at Galilee, engaged the enemy, and defeated them, giving them chace to the very gates of Ptolemais, and killing about three thouſand in the purſuit. They ſtript them of what they had, and redeemed the priſoners with what goods they had taken from them, and ſo conducted them back to Jeruſalem.

Judas ſends Simon to the relief of Galilee, and marches himſelf with Jonathan to the ſuccour of Galaad, leaving the command of the reſt to Joſeph; with orders not to fight till he came back again. V. 17–19.

Simon relieves Galilee, and ſets the priſoners at liberty, with a great ſlaughter of the enemy. V. 21–23.

AT the ſame time Judas, and his brother Jonathan, after three days march beyond Jordan into the wilderneſs, were amicably received by the Nabathites, who very kindly gave them intelligence of the extreme diſtreſs and danger of divers of their friends and countrymen, who were cloſe ſhut up in the towns and caſtles of Galaad; adviſing them withal, that they would, with all imaginable expedition, haſten by the way of the deſart to their relief and aſſiſtance. In this expedition, they took the town of Barasa by the way, putting all people to the sword that were able to bear arms, and burning the city to the ground. It was now almost night, but Judas still prosecuted his way to a castle wherein he understood the Jews were besieg'd; and coming thither betimes in the morning, he found the enemy hard at work with their machines and scaling-ladders, to force the place; whereupon he distributed his troops into three divisions; animated his men to behave themselves resolutely for the relief of their countrymen and friends; and so upon the sound of the trumpet, charged the enemy in the rear. So soon as Timotheus understood that Judas Maccabeus had the command of this action, a person whose valour and conduct he knew so much of beforehand by woful experience, his men were so dismay'd at the very name, that they fled immediately upon hearing of it: Eight thousand of them fell upon the place; the Jews, upon the rout, closely pursuing them. Judas, upon the pursuit, took a town of the Barbarians called Mallam, where they put all the males to death, and destroy'd the city by fire. They did the same thing also at Casphan, and Bosor, and other places that they took in that country.

Judas and Jonathan relieve a castle just as the enemy was about to scale it, 1 Maccab. v. 24--34.

Judas carries all before him with fire and sword, Ver. 35, 36.

SOME short time after this, Timotheus got a very considerable army together; and among other auxiliaries, he had a band of Arabians. They cross'd the river, and encamped near Raphon, where he encouraged his people to acquit themselves like men, and to be sure to keep the Jews from passing the river; for the whole cause, he said, depended upon it; and that if ever they gain'd that pass, they would most certainly carry the day. When Judas understood that Timotheus was resolved upon, and prepared for a battle, he pass'd the river immediately with his army, and gave the onset, and put the army to the rout, upon the first encounter; killing those that resisted, and putting to flight the rest; who casting away their arms, and running some one way, some another, part of them betook themselves for sanctuary to the temple of Carnaim, in hope that the place might protect them. But Judas took the town by force; burnt the temple, and destroy'd all the inhabitants by fire and sword.

Judas gives Timotheus battle, and breaks him all to pieces with a terrible slaughter, Ver. 43.

THIS difficulty being over, he gather'd together all the Israelites that were in the country of Galaad, with their wives, children, and goods, and carried them all into Judea. The city of Ephron lay so directly in his way, that there was no avoiding it without going a great way about; so that he sent a fair message to the inhabitants for leave to pass with his army through the town; but the ports being barricadoed, and the avenues cut off, the inhabitants in plain terms denied him any passage that way. Upon this repulse he encourag'd his men to attack the town; begirt it immediately, and in one day and night made himself master of it, laid it in ashes, and marched with his army over the bodies of the dead through the ruins of it, putting all the males that were found in it to the sword. After passing the river Jordan, they advanced to a great plain near Bethsan, called by the Greeks Scythopolis, and from thence returned to Judea, the people rejoicing all the way they went with hymns and triumphal songs, and offering sacrifices of thanksgiving for the safety of the army; for they had not yet lost so much as one Jew in all these engagements.

Not one Jew kill'd, ibid.

JOSEPH, the son of Zacharias, and Azarias, two great captains, being left for a guard to Judea, in the absence of Simon, who was now marched into Galilee against the people of Ptolemais, and Judas with his brother Jonathan against the Galaadites; these commanders thought it incumbent on their honour, to signalize themselves by some glorious adventure, as well as their brethren. In this fit of emulation they advanced to Jamnia, where Gorgias, the governor of the place, gave them a fair battle before the town, kill'd a matter of two thousand of them, and pursued the rest to the very borders of Judea. This calamity deservedly befel them, for not obeying the order of their general, who had positively commanded them not to engage the enemy upon any terms, till his return. This caution was much to the reputation of the providence and foresight of Judas, who very well understood, that if they departed from their instructions, they would suffer for it.

Joseph fights a battle contrary to his orders, and is defeated, Ver. 55--60.

BUT Judas and his brethren carried on the war all this while vigorously against the Edomites, pressing them on all hands. They took Hebron by force, demolish'd the fortifications of it, and burnt the towers and castles down to the ground, laid the enemy's country all waste, demolish'd Marissa, and from thence in the same heat over-ran and pillag'd Azotus. Having perform'd these exploits, and enrich'd themselves with a considerable booty, they returned all safe and triumphant to Jerusalem.

returns to Jerusalem, V. 61, &c.

CHAP. XIII.

Antiochus Epiphanes besieges Elymais, but is forc'd to draw off. He acknowledges the righteous judgment of God in it, and so he dies.

AS Antiochus Epiphanes was about this time in his progress through some of his highland provinces, he was told of a mighty rich city in Persia called Elymais, and of a most magnificent temple in it dedicated to Diana, where were deposited precious donatives of all sorts, with the very shields and breast-plates of Alexander, the son of Philip of Macedon. Antiochus was so mov'd with the fame of these splendid curiosities, that he advanced toward it with his army to take it by assault; but the inhabitants, without any regard either to his power, or to his design, made a very brave resistance, and disappointed him of his expectation; nor did they content themselves with beating him from the walls, but they follow'd him so close upon his retreat, that they cut off a good part of his rear, and drove him before them like a fugitive, for protection into Babylon. While the sense of this infamy and loss was fresh upon him, news came to him of the defeat of his other troops also, to whom he had committed the care and conduct of the war against the Jews, and of the daily increase of their number and power; so that with one calamity upon the neck of another, the insupportable anguish of his thoughts made him heart-sick upon it; and finding himself to grow still worse and worse, and his end near at hand, he he call'd his friends about him, and told them both the cause and the quality of his distemper. "I am here justly punished, says he, for "the sake of these miserable Jews, for the sa-"crilegious rifling and prophaning of their "temple, and for the contempt of the hea-"venly God." And with these words he expir'd. Now I cannot but admire at Polybius the Megalopolitan, (a man otherwise ofered it,) for saying that this judgment befel Antiochus for his design of rifling the temple of Diana, which was a sacrilege only in his will, but never came into act; but if Polybius was of opinion that he deserv'd this punishment only for the intention, he might much more reasonably have imputed his death to the sacrilege that he was actually guilty of upon the temple of Jerusalem. But whether the reader be of Polybius's opinion, or of mine, it is to me indifferent.

Polybius imputes the judgment to a wrong cause.

Antiochus Epiphanes leaves the government to his son Antiochus Eupator. Lysias proclaims him king. Judas lays siege to the citadel at Jerusalem. Antiochus sets down before Bethsura. They both rise, and come to a battle. The bravery and death of Eleazar. Judas returns to Jerusalem. Antiochus takes Bethsura upon conditions, but breaks his articles. The temple makes an obstinate defence.

Antiochus leaves the regency to Philip, in trust for his son Antiochus, ib.

WHEN Antiochus found himself near his end, he sent for Philip, as the most trusty confident of his court friends, and committed the regency of his kingdom into his hands, delivering up to him at the same time, the crown, the royal robes and signet, with orders to preserve them for his son Antiochus, who was then in minority, passionately adjuring him to take care of his education, and to secure the crown to him, till he should come to be capable of the administration. Antiochus died in the year one hundred and forty nine. The death of this prince was no sooner made known to the people, but Lysias declared Antiochus king, under the name of Eupator, having at that time the tuition of the young prince.

The Jews annoy'd from the citadel in their passage to the temple, Ver. 18.

The Macedonians, in the mean while, who were then garison'd in the citadel of Jerusalem, together with some Jewish revolters, made several vexatious sallies upon the Jews, as they went to worship at their temple; which was no hard matter to do, in regard that the castle was above, and commanded it; so that Judas found it of absolute necessity to reduce that fort for the common security of the nation. It was now just a hundred and fifty years that this government had been in the family of Seleucus. Judas, in short, was so bent upon his design, that they fell presently to the framing of machines and engines for battery, and the casting up of works. While this was in agitation, several deserters slipt away by night, and joining with others as bad as themselves, went to Antiochus, setting forth the miserable condition they were reduced to by men of their own tribe, for their obedience to the king's command, in opposition to their own law, and that they are now in imminent danger of falling into the hands of Judas, without immediate relief. The young prince, in a rage, gave orders presently to his friends and commanders to make a levy of what auxiliaries were to be had for money, over and above the uttermost force of choice men that they could raise out of his own subjects. They plied their business so hard, that in a short time they muster'd a hundred thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, and two and thirty elephants. With this formidable army under the command of Lysias as general, the king march'd out of Antioch, and so advanced to Idumea, and from thence to Bethsura, a place well fortified, beside the strength of the situation. This fort he assaulted, and lost a great deal of time before it; for betwixt sallies and stratagems, they found a way to burn or disappoint all engines of battery and danger that were brought against it. Judas being inform'd of the approach of Antiochus, rais'd the siege from before the citadel, and march'd the ready way to meet the enemy, pitching his tents upon the very entrance into the streights of Bethzachariah, about * seventy furlongs from the adversary. Antiochus, upon this, quitted the Bethsurites, and encamped within distance of engaging Judas, appointing his army by break of day to put themselves upon their march in order of battle; but the place being too narrow for the elephants to march in front, they were forced into a defilee, with a thousand foot, and five hundred horse, upon the guard of every elephant, and so to advance one after another with a kind of tower or castle upon their backs, charged with archers, while the rest of the troops mounted the hills on both sides, under the command of such officers and friends as the king could best confide in. From this ascent they gave the attack, and with so horrid a shout and clamour, that the vallies all rang with the echo; so that what with the hideous outcry, and the dazzling flashes of their gold and brazen bucklers, nothing could be more surprizing. But all this was to Judas no more than so much empty pomp and noise; for he received them so bravely, and without any sort of daunt or apprehension, that he kill'd a matter of six hundred of them upon the first encounter. While they were thus engaged, Eleazar, otherwise call'd Auranes, the brother of Judas, taking notice of one elephant that was caparison'd with richer trappings than the rest, he made his way with a generous resolution through all the guards, to that beast, taking for granted that the king himself was upon her. When he had cut part of his opposers to pieces on each hand, and forced the rest to clear his passage, he crept under the belly of the elephant, and wounded him to death, himself also perishing under the weight of the beast upon his fall. He had the honour and the comfort however to die in the prospect and attempt of a glorious action, and encompassed with the dead bodies of his enemies round about him.

The Bethſurites were ſo diſcouraged upon the appearance of the king's troops, and ſo much more diſhearten'd by their want of proviſions, that they found themſelves under a neceſſity of delivering up the place, which they did upon conditions, with ſolemn articles that there ſhould be no violence or moleſtation offer'd them whatſoever. But the king kept his faith no farther than to the bare ſaving of their lives; for the inhabitants were all turn'd naked out of the town, and a gariſon of his own ſettled in their ſtead. But the ſiege of the temple held them work yet a long time after, by a moſt obſtinate defence; for all their machines and approaches were ſtill eluded with counter-workings and deſigns. Their only diſtreſs was want of bread; for having already ſpent their laſt year's ſtore, and this happening to fall out upon the ſeventh year, when by the Jewiſh law they could neither plow nor ſow, great numbers of the Jews deſerted the town merely for want of proviſion, inſomuch that there were hardly hands enough left to defend the place.

THERE came at this time intelligence to the king, and his general Lyſias, that Philip had uſurp'd the government, and was marching toward them at the head of an army out of Perſia; ſo that they came to a ſecret reſolution betwixt themſelves, to quit the ſiege, ſeek him out, and give him battle; but to carry the deſign ſo private, that neither officer nor ſoldier ſhould ſo much as gueſs at the meaning of it; wherefore the king order'd Lyſias, without mentioning the name of Philip, to enter into a diſcourſe with the commanders and ſoldiers about this ſiege, the ſtrength of the place, and that it would be a work of time to take it; beſide, that being brought to a ſtrait now for want of corn, and the king's buſineſs alſo requiring his preſence elſewhere, they could not do better than to come to ſome ſort of agreement with them, though upon the condition of allowing them the free exerciſe of their particular religion, laws, and cuſtoms; and this being granted, which had been the only ground of all their rebellions, the king might go back again when he pleaſed, without any further trouble. This was it that Lyſias had in charge to communicate to the army, and the ſoldiers were all highly pleas'd with the propoſal.

Antiochus takes the temple upon terms, but breaks his covenants. Onias put to death at Berrhea. Alcimus, or Jacimus, though not of the ſacerdotal race, promoted in his ſtead. Antiochus gives Philip battle, and overcomes him. Onias flies to Egypt, and gets leave to build a temple in Heliopolis, anſwerable to that at Jeruſalem.

MATTERS being thus concerted, Antiochus diſpatch'd a herald away to Judas and the beſieged, with an offer of peace, and a free enjoyment and exerciſe of their laws and conſciences, which they very readily agreed to, and upon the ſecurity of oath and honour for the performance of articles, they deliver'd up the temple; but upon Antiochus's taking poſſeſſion of it, he found the place ſo very ſtrong, that without any regard to his oath and promiſe, he order'd his ſoldiers to demoliſh the walls, and lay them level with the ground, which was executed accordingly, and ſo he returned to Antioch, carrying the high-prieſt Onias, otherwiſe called Menelaus, along with him. This was upon the advice of Lyſias, who told him that if ever he liv'd to ſee the Jews quiet, or himſelf at eaſe, that man muſt be taken off; for it was at his inſtigation that his father forced the Jews to a religion againſt their laws and judgments; and that Onias was conſequently the author and promoter of all the evils that had befallen him. The king, upon this, ſent away Menelaus to Berrhea in Syria, where he cauſed him to be put to death, after ten years enjoyment of the pontificate; a very wicked man, who to ſecure the dignity to himſelf, cauſed a general defection among the Jews, from the laws and worſhip of their country. His next ſucceſſor's name was Alcimus, who was alſo called Jacimus.

Demetrius ſeizes Tripolis; takes the government upon him; and puts Antiochus and Lyſias to death. Alcimus complains of Judas to Demetrius. Demetrius ſends an army to deſtroy him, and ſettles Alcimus in the pontificate. His barbarous cruelties. But he flies at laſt to Demetrius for ſuccour.

DEMETRIUS the ſon of Seleucus, being fled away from Rome, poſſeſs'd himſelf about this time of Tripolis in Syria; took the crown upon him, and with as many mercenaries as he could get together, invaded the country, where the people did not only come over to him in great numbers, with open arms to receive him; but as a farther inſtance of an affection to his intereſt, ſeized upon the perſons of Antiochus and Lyſias, and brought them in cuſtody, priſoners to him. Whereupon they were immediately both put to death by the commend of Demetrius; Antiochus having now reigned two years, as we have ſaid elſewhere. He had in his party a great number of profligate Jews, that had been baniſh'd for notorius crimes, together with Alcimus the high-prieſt at the head of them, who all joined in one common accuſation and complaint againſt the whole people of the Jews, but eſpecially Judas Maccabæus and his brethren, whom they charged, not only with the destruction of as many of the king's friends as fell into their hands, but with the very ejection of themselves out of the land too. Wherefore they made it their request to Demetrius, only to send some particular person that he could confide in to examine matters in Judea, and to see what havock Judas had made there.

Bacchides marches with an army toward Judas and his brethren. V. 8--10.

DEMETRIUS presently, in a heat, sent away Bacchides upon this errand, a friend formerly to Antiochus Epiphanes; a resolute man, and at that time governor of Mesopotamia: putting Alcimus likewise into the same commission, whom he dispatch'd away with an army, and orders to fall upon Judas and his followers. With these troops Bacchides left Antioch, and marched directly into Judea, where he gave Judas and his brethren a specious and a solemn invitation to come to a better understanding with him. Now the design was only under the colour of a peaceable and friendly disposition, to draw them into a toil, and so to surprize them. But upon his coming attended with such an army, and in the posture of an enemy rather than a friend, Judas kept himself upon his guard, without giving any credit to his pretensions; but some credulous people there were yet that went over to them, in confidence that their countrymen and their tribesman Alcimus would do them no wrong; especially under the caution of a solemn oath from both, that no violence should be offer'd, either to themselves, or any of their party: but this confidence deceiv'd them, it seems; for Bacchides, without any regard to the conscience of an oath, caused sixty of them to be cut to pieces upon the place: which barbarous perfidy serv'd for a warning to the rest not come near him. Bacchides, after this, removed his army from Jerusalem, and went to Bethzeth, where he found several deserters, and other disaffected people thereabouts, which he put all to the sword. This being done, he commanded all the Jews in his absence to obey Alcimus; and leaving part of his army with him for the security of the province, he himself returned with the rest to king Demetrius at Antioch.

ALCIMUS had in his head all this while, the settling himself in the dignity of the pontificate; and reflecting upon it, that it was an honour hardly to be compass'd but by the favour and good-will of the people, he presently betook himself to the popular arts of courtesy and affable address, to ingratiate himself with the multitude: so that by the flatteries of obliging speech and behaviour, he quickly doubled the number of the forces that were left him; but it was with a band of impious fugitives that listed themselves in his service: and with these he ravaged the country up and down, putting all the Jews to death wherever he came, that were friends to Maccabeus. Judas, upon this, laying it to heart to see what a rabble of an army Alcimus had gotten together, and the havock they made of all the men of honour and conscience that came in their way; he himself took up a resolution also of going the same way to work with the faction of Alcimus; who finding that he was not strong enough to hold it out, betook himself to Demetrius at Antioch, for support and succour, where he did all that was possible, to irritate that prince against Judas, with tales and stories of the indignities he had put upon him already, and of the danger of greater yet to come, unless he sent a powerful army in time to call that bold and wicked man to an account for his misdemeanours.

Demetrius grows jealous of Judas. Alcimus advises him to send Nicanor with an army against him. A treacherous practice to surprize him. Judas fights Nicanor; kills him, and destroys his army. Alcimus cut off by a judicial vengeance. Judas succeeds him in the pontificate, and enters into an alliance with the Romans.

Demetrius grows jealous of Judas. V. 26.

JUDAS was now become so formidable, that Demetrius was very uneasy himself to think what the consequence of things might be, if he suffer'd him to go on increasing at this rate in strength and credit; so that he call'd Nicanor to him, formerly his companion in his departure from Rome, and his particular confident and friend over and above; assigned him the command of such a body of an army as he reckon'd sufficient for the reducing of Judas, with positive orders to make war upon the whole nation, and give no quarter. Upon his setting out for Jerusalem, he propounded to himself to dissemble his intensions, and to try if he could inveigle Judas under a countenance of peaceable purposes and inclinations, into a credulity that would certainly be his ruin. So Nicanor suggested the matter to him by way of expostulation. "Why "should we, (says he) expose the sum of our "well-being and happiness to the uncertain "chance of war, and not rather adjust the "points in controversy by an amicable treaty? "or if you apprehend any danger in it, I am "ready to give you the most sacred oath for "security, that one man can give to another; "for peace, and nothing else, is my business: "as you may judge by the friends I have "brought along with me, only to possess you "with the knowledge of my master's mind "and pleasure, and of his hearty love and "good-will to the whole nation of the Jews." This declaration wrought so far upon the brothers, that without any further thought, or jealousy of treason, or treachery, they interchangeably pass'd their oaths, and with great frankness received Nicanor with his whole army. After the first greeting betwixt Judas and Nicanor, the latter gave a signal to his people to lay hold of Judas; but the plot being discovered in time, he made his escape immediately to his own people: and after the detecting of this treachery, both parties prepared to decide the quarrel by open force, without any more talk of a treaty. The armies drew out, and it came to a battle near Capharsalama, where Judas was worsted, and forced into the castle of Jerusalem.

and very narrowly escapes the snare. V. 30.

IT happen'd one day, as Nicanor was passing by the temple, that several of the priests and elders met him upon the way, and shew'd him the sacrifices that they were about to offer to God, for the prosperity and welfare of Demetrius. But Nicanor threaten'd them, and not without blasphemous revilings even against God himself, that if the people did not deliver up Judas

Judas to him, he would return to their sorrow and cost; destroy the temple itself, and leave it in rubbish. And with these menaces he went his way; but the priests were so dejected at this declaration, that they forthwith addressed themselves to God with prayers and tears, to protect his own house, and his ministers that belong'd to it, against the outrages of the enemy. Nicanor departed from Jerusalem, and pitch'd his tents in Bethoron, where he was join'd with a great enforcement out of Syria. Judas at the same time encamped at Adasi, within * thirty furlongs of the enemy, and with a body only of a † thousand men. He told them that the enemy indeed was numerous, but that the cause was God's, whose power was above that of a multitude, exhorting them not to trouble themselves how many they were to encounter, but to consider the bravery of those that were to encounter them, with the honours or rewards that would most certainly attend them: "Wherefore fall on, (says he,) like men of "courage and resolution, and commit the is-"sue to God." It came, in fine, to a battle; and the first encounter was vigorous and sharp; but upon the fall of great numbers of the enemy, and of Nicanor himself too, who did all that could be done by a great commander and a brave man, the whole army scatter'd immediately; and upon the loss of their general, cast away their arms to make them lighter for their flight: Judas, in the mean time, pursuing the fugitives without mercy or quarter; making proclamation by sound of trumpet through all the towns and cities where he pass'd, of the victory he had obtain'd. Upon this signal, the country-people gathered together every where, and fell so unmercifully upon the soldiers in their flight, that of nine thousand men, which was the precise number of their army, there was not a man that escap'd. This was upon the thirteenth of the month, which the Jews call Adar, the Macedonians Dystrus; and in memory of this mercy we celebrate an anniversary thanksgiving upon it to this very day. The Jews after this victory had a little breathing while, from the restless importunities of their former war and troubles, and some hopeful glimmerings of a comfortable peace too, but it lasted not long neither.

ALCIMUS the high-priest had a mind to have the old wall of the sanctuary pull'd down, and the works of the antient prophets demolished; but in the very instant of his ordering it to be done, God struck him with so judicial a distemper, that he fell down upon the ground speechless, where he lay languishing a while in miserable torments, and then died, after being four years in the office of the pontificate; the people, upon his decease, chusing Judas with one voice, for his successor. This new high-priest had heard so much of the fame and power of the Romans, and of the overthrows they had given the Gauls, Spaniards, Carthaginians, nay to Greece itself, and king Perseus, Philip, and Antiochus, that he had a mighty desire to enter into a league with them; so that he sent Eupolemus, the son of John, and Jason the son of Eleazar, two singular friends of his, to Rome upon that embassy, soliciting to be receiv'd into the number of their allies, and that they would write to Demetrius, to forbear making war upon the Jews for the future. The senate was so well pleased with the propolals and the terms, that they consented to the league, and pass'd an order soon after in favour of it, which was written in tables of brass; the copy of it sent to Jerusalem, and the original deposited in the capitol. The articles were in substance to this effect: "That "no people whatsoever, under the jurisdic-"tion of the Romans, should presume to "make war upon the Jews, or to be comfort-"ing or assisting to any of their enemies with "corn, shipping, money, or the like; and "the same obligation to lie reciprocally upon "the Jews, in case of any war made upon the "Romans. If there should be any thing af-"ter this, which the Jews would have to be "added or taken away, that it be first ratified "by the common consent of the people." This resolution of the senate was written by Eupolemus the son of John, and Jason the son of Eleazar, Judas the high-priest, and his brother Simon, general of the army. This was the first alliance that ever was made betwixt the Jews and the Romans.

Bacchides makes an inroad into Judea, with twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Judas resolves to encounter him with only eight hundred men. The generous bravery of Judas and his companions.

UPON the tidings of Nicanor's death, and the defeat of the army, Demetrius sent Bacchides a second time into Judea, who advanced with fresh troops to Arbela, a town in Galilee, and there encamp'd, forcing a great many Jews out of the caves there, where they hid themselves. From thence he hasten'd away to Jerusalem; and upon intelligence that Judas and his people were at Berzeth, he posted away immediately with twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse, to encounter him, who had at that time but a bare || thousand of men about him, and but eight hundred of those to stand by him neither; for two hundred of them deserted him, for fear of being overpower'd. In this strait for want of men, and neither time nor place for recruiting, Judas kept up his heart still to a resolution, in despite of all difficulties, of putting it to the fate of a battle, only desiring his men to stand by him, and follow his example. They told him how vain and rash a thing it would be to contend with such insuperable odds, advising him rather to attempt an honourable retreat, by which means possibly he might re-inforce himself. "No, no, says he, it shall never be said, "that the sun ever saw Judas turn his back "upon an enemy. If it should be our lot "now to die, God's will be done, provided "that we do not blast the reputation of a "glorious life, with an ignominious death." With these words he raised the courage of his

Judas encounters Bacchides, and gets the better of him at first; but being oppress'd afterward by numbers, was slain, having behaved himself to his immortal honour.

Bacchides's order of battle, 1 Mac. ix. 11, 12

BACCHIDES having rang'd his army, the horse upon the two wings, whereof he himself commanded the right, his light-arm'd men and archers in the front, supported by a Macedonian * Phalanx in the body: In this order of battle, he advanced up to the enemy, sounded a charge; and with a military shout, according to custom, gave the onset: Judas encountring him on the other hand after the same manner. It was hard fought on both sides from morning till toward sun-set; when Judas taking notice of the danger his men were in to be over-power'd by the enemy's right wing, where Bacchides, with the flower of the army fiercely assail'd them, came in with a band of valiant and courageous youths to their relief; and breaking their line, pierc'd into the very body of them; routed, and gave them chace as far as mount Aza. The enemy's left wing, upon this, follow'd Judas so closely, that he was now beset on all hands, and out of all possibility of escaping; so that he and his people stood their ground, and fought it out, to sell their lives as dear as they could; till in the conclusion, after a great slaughter of their enemies, Judas and his companions were so spent and weary'd out, that they seem'd at last to be rather tir'd than overcome: Nor did they fall unrevenged. And thus did this glorious hero finish the character of a great man, by making his life and death all of a piece. It could not be expected that the soldiers, after the loss of so brave a general, could dispute the point any further without a leader: So that they presently dispers'd and fled, while the two brothers, Simon and Jonathan, treated with the enemy for the body of their brother, which they carry'd away, and laid it at Modin in the sepulchre of his fathers, with all funeral magnificence, and with the solemnity of a publick mourning for several days, in honour of his memory, according to the custom of the place upon so extraordinary an occasion. This was the end of Judas Maccabeus, a generous and a valiant man; the true son of the virtue, as well as of the blood of Matthias; for he never forgot the precepts of his dying father; who enjoyn'd him upon his blessing never to decline any labour or hazard for the liberty and welfare of his countrymen. In pursuance of this charge, he got himself everlasting honour, by the rescue of his friends out of the hands of the Macedonians, and by his three years administration in the office of high-priest.

The ſpite of the revolted Jews. Jonathan ſucceeds Judas. He and Simon withdraw into the wilderneſs, and Bacchides follows them. John and his company cut off by the ſons of Amaræus. The death of John reveng'd upon the ſons of Amaræus. Bacchides puts fifty of the Jewiſh deſerters to death. The brothers fortify themſelves in Bethalaga. Bacchides lays ſiege to it, and is beaten off.

WE have ſufficiently ſet forth in the former book, how the Jews came to be deliver'd from their ſlavery under the Macedonians; and how Judas, their great captain and protector, after ſeveral bloody battles fought in that righteous cauſe, loſt his life at laſt in a magnanimous action and conteſt for their vindication and defence. This illuſtrious perſon was no ſooner taken away, but the whole party of the profligate Jews, that contrary to conſcience, faith, and honour, had abandon'd the religion, laws, and cuſtoms of the nation, reſumed their former animoſities, and perſecuted their honeſt countrymen afreſh, more ſpiteſully than ever. There happened alſo at the ſame time a general famine over the land; which, in conjunction, doubled the other calamity; for betwixt want of bread for their livelihood, on the one ſide, and want of power to defend themſelves againſt their enemies on the other, the miſery lay ſo heavy upon them, that a great many of the Jews found themſelves under ſome ſort of neceſſity to comply with the faction of the Macedonians. Upon this juncture Bacchides convened all the apoſtate Jews that were gone over to ſtrange gods, and committed the care of the government principally into their hands, who made it their buſineſs in the firſt place to ſeize all the friends and late partizans of Judas, and ſo to deliver them up to Bacchides, to torture them at pleaſure, and in the end to put every man of them to death. The condition of the Jews was never ſo deplorable ſince their captivity in Babylon, as it was at this time; inſomuch, that all thoſe who had wiſh'd well to Judas, join'd in a requeſt to Jonathan, not only to follow his brother's example, who had ſo frankly ſacrificed his blood for the liberties of his country, but to take upon himſelf his command alſo, the whole nation lying under ſuch deſperate circumſtances, that they muſt be all inevitably loſt without a leader. Jonathan's anſwer was, that he was ready to do or to ſuffer any thing for the publick good; whereupon, with the unanimous conſent of the people, he was declared their general.

WHEN Bacchides came to be inform'd of this election, and to reflect upon it, that Jonathan was a man as likely to give as much trouble and disturbance to the king and Macedonians, as ever his brother Judas was before him, he fell to bethinking himself of some way to take him off by treachery: But he himself and his brother Simon were both so well aware of such a design in hand, that they provided for themselves betimes, by withdrawing immediately into the neighbouring desart, with what strength they were able to get together upon that warning, and pitched their tents by the pool of Asphar. Bacchides look'd upon this retreat of theirs into the wilderness, to be the effect of fear, and no other than a direct flight from the face of an enemy; marched away presently towards them with all his troops; and encamping beyond Jordan, made choice of that place for his rendezvous. When Jonathan came to hear of this motion, he sent his brother John (otherwise Gaddis) to the Arabian Mabathites, being in friendship with them, for leave only to depolite their baggage in their custody, till the battle with Bacchides should be over. But as John was upon the way, the sons of Amaræus made a sally out of Medaba upon the convoy; took all their carriages, and whatever else they had about them; kill'd John himself upon the place, and all his people: But the brothers had their revenge upon them not long after, as will be shew'd in its due place.

BACCHIDES having intelligence how Jonathan lay encamped in the senny grounds near the river Jordan, pitch'd upon the sabbath-day for the attack, in confidence of the superstitious reverence they had for that festival: but Jonathan laying before his soldiers the absolute necessity of fighting; for the enemy being before them, and the river behind them, there was no saving their lives without it: They considering the exigence of the case, call'd upon God for victory, and in the same instant made a resolute charge upon the enemy; killing great numbers of them upon the place. In the heat of the action, Bacchides press'd furiously upon the person of Jonathan, who at the same time made a blow at him; but the other evading it, Jonathan and his company took the river, and the enemy not daring to follow them, they got safe to the other side. Bacchides, after this withdrew into the citadel of Jerusalem, with the loss of near * two thousand of his men, where he fortified several strong cities and places that had been demolished before; as Jericho, Emmaus, Bethoron and Bethel, Thamnatha, Pharathon, Techoa and Gazara: And these places he strengthen'd with walls and towers, and with strong garisons, to be ready for excursions to fall upon the Jews: But care was taken above all the rest, to make the citadel of Jerusalem impregnable. In which place the chief men's sons of the country were secured for hostages.

THERE was brought intelligence about this time, to the two brothers Jonathan and Simon, that there was a splendid wedding in hand betwixt one of the sons of Amaræus, and the daughter of an illustrious Arabian; the sons of Amaræus to be at the wedding, and the bride to be conducted in great pomp from the city of Gabatha. The brothers laid hold of this opportunity to revenge themselves for the death of their brother, and so hasten'd away towards Medaba to way-lay the people who were to assist at this wedding, by an ambush that they had planted in the mountains. Upon the coming up of the bridegroom with his bride, and a long train of their friends, as is usual in such cases, the party sally'd out upon them, and cut them all off, without saving so much as one person, together with their wives, children, and friends, to the number of four hundred; carry'd off the booty entire, and did justice at the same time to the memory of their brother: After which exploit they returned to their quarters at Jordan.

and put 400 persons to the sword; bride, bridegroom and all, in revenge of their brother John, Ver. 39---42.

WHEN Bacchides had settled garisons in Judea, he went back to his master; and so for a matter of two years, the Jews were in some tolerable state of quiet: But the apostates, and the dregs of the people were gall'd at the very souls of them, to see Jonathan, and his people so much at ease in Judea, by reason of the tranquility of the times. So that they fell to plying and soliciting Demetrius by their proxies, that Bacchides might be order'd to reduce Jonathan absolutely into his power; which was a thing so easy to be effected, they said, that it required no more than one night's work to rid themselves both of him and all his soldiers by surprize. The king yielded immediately to the proposition, and dispatch'd Bacchides away into Judea upon the commission, where he sent his letters up and down to all the king's friends and officers in the country, to give their assistance towards the seizing of Jonathan. So they laid their heads together how to entrap him; and finding upon several trials one after another, that all proved ineffectual; (for Jonathan was cautious and forewarned) the Macedonian, in a transport of rage, imputed the whole miscarriage to the treachery of the apostate Jews; who, he said, did but make sport with the king's orders, and thereupon put fifty of their chief men to death. Jonathan and his brother finding themselves too weak for Bacchides, withdrew into the wilderness, to a village called Bethalaga, and fortify'd it with works and walls, to serve them in case of need for a retreat. Upon this intelligence, Bacchides marched away against them with all the power he was able to make, upon the conjunction of his own troops, with the auxiliary faction of the Jews. He open'd his trenches immediately against the place, and for some days carried on his approaches: Jonathan, on the other side, making a very stout resistance. While matters were in this posture, he left the defence of the place to his brother Simon; and with such a body of men as he was able to draw together out of the neighbourhood, he himself stole away by night, and fell upon Bacchides in his quarters; kill'd a great many of his men; and by the havock and confusion that ensu'd upon it, Simon came quickly to understand that it was his brother's doing: Upon which discovery, he made a sally, burnt their machines, cut off a great many of their people, and so return'd. Bacchides was so amaz'd at this assault upon him front and rear, and the miscarriage of an attempt he thought himself so sure of, that it put him quite beside his reason; but all the mischiefs of this miscarriage were imputed to the Jewish impostors, who had prevailed with the king,

The apostate Jews press Demetrius to the reducing of Jonathan; pretending by the help of of Bacchides, to make but one night's work of it, Ver. 58.

An alliance betwixt Jonathan and Bacchides. Bacchides leaves Judea in peace. Jonathan takes up his reſidence at Machmas.

WHILE Bacchides had this difficulty under deliberation, Jonathan took the opportunity of falling in with him upon that neceſſary point, having gotten ſome intelligence of what he had in his thought at that time. So he ſent him an honourable meſſage, with propoſals of a mutual league and friendſhip, upon condition of releaſing all priſoners on both ſides. This was a motion ſo reaſonable for Bacchides to agree to, and ſo fair an occaſion given him to quit the ſiege without loſs of reputation, that he immediately ſtruck up an alliance with Jonathan; with a mutual exchange of oaths to deliver up, and reſtore all priſoners on both ſides, and not to do any act of hoſtility one to the other. This being ratified, Bacchides returned to the King at Antioch, without ever coming back again with his army to Judea. Jonathan being now ſettled in a condition of peace and ſafety, took up his abode in Machmas, where he gave himſelf up to the buſineſs of the government, in the adminiſtration of law and juſtice. He was a bitter enemy to all deſerters, a zealous aſſerter of the laws, and he purged the land from all foreign abominations.

Ptolemais deliver'd up to Alexander (call'd Ballez) out of an averſion to Demetrius; who upon the news of this ſeizure, draws his troops together to give him battle.

Alexander the ſon of Antiochus ſeizes Ptolemais in Syria, 1 Mac. x. 1.

IN the year one hundred and ſixty, Alexander, the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, took poſſeſſion of Ptolemais in Syria, by the confederacy of the ſoldiers that were there in gariſon, out of an averſion they had to Demetrius, as a man over proud and haughty; for he had the humour of mewing himſelf up in a certain fortify'd caſtle that he had, not far from Antioch, where no body was admitted to come at him; but there he doz'd away his time, and left the government to ſhift for itſelf; which ſtirr'd up a great many male-contents againſt him, as we have ſaid elſewhere. But now upon the news of Alexander's poſſeſſing himſelf of Ptolemais, he preſently drew his troops together, and march'd with an army againſt him.

Upon Alexander's taking Ptolemais, Demetrius marches againſt him with an army, Ver. 2.

An alliance betwixt Demetrius and Jonathan. The articles of the treaty. Jonathan puts Jeruſalem into a ſtate of defence. The Macedonians remove to Antioch; but the revolted Jews in Bethſura, and the tower of Jeruſalem, keep to their ſtrong holds.

Demetrius writes to Jonathan, and propounds an alliance with him, V. 3--5.

DEMETRIUS, upon this occaſion, ſent an embaſſy to Jonathan, with propoſals of a league and alliance betwixt them; and this he did, to prevent Alexander in the propoſal, for fear he might otherwiſe pre-engage him, tho' but in revenge for injuries and indignities formerly receiv'd. The purport of the meſſage was, in ſhort, an authority to levy men, to provide arms, and to ſet hoſtages at liberty, that Bacchides had committed priſoners to the caſtle.

The conditions of the treaty, V. 6.

Upon the receipt of this letter from Demetrius, Jonathan went away preſently to Jeruſalem, where he read it publickly, in the hearing both of the gariſon, and of the people. The profligates and fugitives in the citadel were very much ſtartled to ſee Jonathan all on a ſudden ſo much in favour. But he went on however with his levies, ſet the hoſtages at liberty, and remanded them ſafe back again to their own parents. He made Jeruſalem for the preſent the place of his reſidence; where he fortify'd, alter'd and repaired at pleaſure; rebuilding and ſtrengthening the walls with ſquare ſtones of a mighty bigneſs for the better defence of the place. Now the Macedonians that were diſperſed up and down in ſeveral gariſons, quitted their ſtations upon this change at Jeruſalem, and went away to Antioch; but for thoſe that were in Bethſura and the tower at Jeruſalem, the greater part of them being Jewiſh deſerters, it was not ſafe for them to ſtir out of their holds.

Jonathan reads the letter publickly at Jeruſalem to both ſoldiers and people, V. 7.

He takes up his reſidence in Jeruſalem; where he fortifies, repairs and rebuilds at pleaſure, Ver. 11.

Alexander Ballez endeavours to make Jonathan his friend; creates him high-prieſt and ſucceſſor to his brother Judas; preſents, and adopts him into his family, obliges the Jews. A bloody battle betwixt Alexander and Demetrius. The death of Demetrius by the fall of his horſe.

ALEXANDER was no ſtranger to the character of Jonathan, or to the hiſtory of his courage and exploits; particularly againſt the Macedonians; nor to the indignities that had been put upon him, both by Demetrius and Bacchides; ſo that being told of the fair promiſes and pretenſions of Demetrius, he diſcourſed the matter with his friends, and brought it to this point, that he could not at that time do better than to enter into an aſſociation and alliance with Jonathan; a perſon of eminent valour, and a mortal enemy to Demetrius, and lying under the higheſt provocations of old grudges and wrongs imaginable. Wherefore, ſaid he, this ſeems to me the critical minute of an opportunity for the making of this man my friend; but pray let me have your opinion along with me. His council were all of the ſame mind, and a letter was immediately diſpatch'd away upon the ſame ſubject in the terms following:

Jonathan enters upon the pontificate, after a vacancy of four years.

JONATHAN, immediately upon the coming of this meſſage to his hand, put on his ſacerdotal robe upon the day of the feaſt of tabernacles. This was four years after the death of his brother Judas, the pontifical ſeat having been ſo long vacant; and from thence forward he applied himſelf to the advancing of troops, and making a large proviſion of arms. Demetrius was by this time ſenſible of the error of his delay, in ſlipping the opportunity of being beforehand with his competitor for an alliance with Jonathan. But this anticipation of Alexander's did not yet hinder him from carrying it as far as it would go, in this following letter:

UPON this juncture of time king Alexander drew out a mighty army, partly of his own mercenaries, and partly of thoſe that went over to him from Demetrius in Syria, and marched with them againſt the enemy. They came to a battle, and the left wing of A battle betwixt Alexander and Demetrius, Ver. 48, 49.
Demetrius being too hard for the right wing of Alexander, they purſued their advantage ſo far, that they got the pillage of the camp, but the right wing, at the ſame time, where the king himſelf fought in perſon, was forc'd to give way, and fell preſently into a direct rout. horſe plunging into an impaſſable bog, he was over-power'd by the multitudes that preſs'd in upon him, and conſequently loſt, beyond all hope or poſſibility of relief. He fought it out, however, on foot, to the laſt extremity, till his body was cover'd all over with arrows and darts. Demetrius had now reigned eleven years; and this was his end, as we have ſet it forth elſewhere.

country, with Ptolemy Philometor, at Alexandria, as we have ſaid heretofore. This ſame Onias finding Judea ſo terribly ravag'd by the Macedonians and their kings; and out of an ambition to get himſelf immortal fame, reſolv'd to try if he could obtain leave from king Ptolemy, and his queen Cleopatra, to build another temple in Egypt, after the project and model of that of Jeruſalem, and ſo to ſupply it with prieſts and Levites of his own family. The thing that put this thought in his head, was a prediction of the prophet Iſaiah, of at leaſt ſix hundred years before; preſaging that in time to come there ſhould be a temple erected in Egypt, to the honour of the great God, and that it ſhould be the work of a Jew. Onias was ſo poſſeſſed with the impulſe of this revelation, that he wrote a letter to Ptolemy and Cleopatra, to this following effect: "At the time when I had "the honour to ſerve your majeſties in the "field, I paſſed through ſeveral countries, and "obſerved, that in the provinces of Cele-"Syria, Phenicia, and Leontopolis, in the "land of Heliopolis, and in ſeveral other "places, the Jews had no uniformity in their "temples, and therefore could not agree "among themſelves about it; and it is the "ſame thing with the Egyptians too, by rea-"ſon of the multitude and variety of temples, "and the diverſity of religions. Now for "ſo much as I have found out a certain place "near the caſtle of Bubaſtes upon the plain, "where there are great ſtore of materials for "building near at hand, and plenty of beaſts "appointed for ſacrifice, it is my humble re-"queſt, that you will give me leave to purge "and demoliſh a ruinous temple there, that "was never conſecrated to any deity, and in "the place of it to erect another, after the "model of that of Jeruſalem, with a dedi-"cation of it to the moſt high God, upon con-"dition, that prayers be there offer'd up for "the ſafety and proſperity of your royal per-"ſons and family; to the end that all the "Jews in your dominions may by this means "be more united among themſelves, and bet-"ter enabled to do your majeſties ſervice. "This is no more than what the prophet "Iſaiah had foretold, that God would have "a holy place in Egypt, and ſeveral other "things upon that ſubject."

The petition of Onias to Ptolemy and Cleopatra.

Onias begs leave to build a temple in Egypt, after the model of that of Jeruſalem.

Grounding his petition upon the prophecy of Iſaiah.

IT was very remarkable, the piety that the king, and his queen Cleopatra (his wife and ſiſter both in one) expreſſed upon the receipt of this letter, as will appear by their anſwer thereunto, wherein they diſcharged themſelves of having any hand in the impious violation of the law, and caſt the whole blame of it upon Onias in theſe terms:

King Ptolemy and queen Cleopatra to Onias, joy and health.

"WE have read and conſider'd of your "letters of requeſt, wherein you de-"ſire to cleanſe and purify an old ruinous "temple at Leontopolis near Bubaſtes upon "the plain, within the juriſdiction of Helio-"polis, and can hardly conceive how a tem-"ple in a place ſo unclean, and haunted with "ſuch varieties of deteſtable animals, ſhould "be in any meaſure acceptable to God. But "yet for ſo much as you refer yourſelf for "your juſtification to the predictions of the "prophet Iſaiah, we do hereby grant unto you "full licence and permiſſion, ſo far as in us "lies ſo to do, provided it be done without "giving offence to God in the breach of his "laws."

The king and queen grants his requeſt.

ONIAS had no ſooner obtained this conceſſion of the place, but he fell preſently to work upon the raiſing of the temple and the altar, according to the draught of that at Jeruſalem, though much ſhort of it both for bulk and ſtate. As to the dimenſions of the fabrick, and the holy veſſels thereunto belonging, having ſpoken ſufficiently of it in my ſeventh book of the hiſtory and captivity of the Jews, a repetition of it in this place would be needleſs. This being done, Onias did not want prieſts and Levites of his own fancy and perſuaſion to aſſiſt him in the offices of divine worſhip, and in the ſervices of the temple; to ſay no more of it in this place.

Onias falls to work immediately upon the temple, and employs prieſts and Levites in it of his own fancy.

THERE happen'd at Alexandria ſo fierce and ſo ſeditious a diſpute, betwixt the Jews and the Samaritans that erected the temple at Garizin, in the days of Alexander the Great, about the temple itſelf, and the manner of worſhipping, that the king was forced upon an appeal to take the matter into his own cognizance, and ſo to paſs judgment upon the merits of the cauſe. The point was this: The Jews inſiſted upon it that the temple at Jeruſalem was the only temple extant that was warranted and authoriz'd by the laws of Moſes. The Samaritans ſtood up for the temple of Garizin, and both parties by conſent remitted themſelves to the judgment and arbitration of the king, with his miniſters and friends, deſiring only that council might be heard on both ſides, and that ſentence of death might paſs upon the party that ſhould be found guilty. Sabbeus and Theodoſius were for the Samaritans, and Andronicus the ſon of Meſſalan, for the Jews; binding themſelves in an oath on both ſides, in the preſence of God and the king, to offer nothing in proof, but what was according to the law, and deſiring that the breach of that oath might be made death to the violator of it. The king call'd his friends and counſellors about him to try the cauſe. The Jews of Alexandria were mightily troubled, for fear of their advocate, and were extremely concern'd to find the ſacred authority of the temple at Jeruſalem, the moſt antient and noble frame and inſtitution in the whole world, brought into queſtion. Upon a debate who ſhould ſpeak firſt, Sabbeus and Theodoſius gave the precedence to Andronicus, who opened the cauſe, and made a deduction of the ſanctity, practice, and venerable antiquity of the temple of Jeruſalem, even from the very original, according to the law; ſetting forth the uninterrupted ſucceſſion of the prieſthood through all ages, with the honour and majeſty of the place, as it was celebrated from time to time, with the magnificence and bounty of all the kings of Aſia; whereas the temple of Garizin, then in queſtion, was ſo obſcure in all reſpects, that little more notice was taken of it than if there had been no ſuch thing. With theſe and the like reaſonings the king was prevail'd upon to give ſentence in favour of Jeruſalem, and to adjudge Sabbeus and Theodoſius to death, according

After the death of Demetrius, Alexander marries Cleopatra the king of Egypt's daughter, and does all things highly to the honour of Jonathan.

1 Macc. x. AFTER the death of Demetrius, (as we have ſaid already) Alexander took upon himſelf the government of Syria; and by a letter to Ptolemy Philometor, ſent him a propoſal of a match with his daughter, ſuggeſting by-the-bye, that it would be no diſhonourable or unreaſonable thing, after the overthrow of Demetrius, and, through God's favour, the recovery of a kingdom that belong'd to him in the right of his father, to receive him into his alliance. Ptolemy was ſo well pleas'd with this overture, that he immediately wrote him a letter back again to congratulate him for all his victories and ſucceſſes, and likewiſe to promiſe him his daughter in marriage, appointing Ptolemais for the place of meeting; where he would wait upon him with his daughter Cleopatra, and there conſummate the wedding. Ptolemy ſtaid not long after his own letter, but went directly to the place with his daughter, where he found Alexander, and diſpatch'd the marriage, with ſuch a treaſure of gold and ſilver for her portion as might become the magnificence of ſo great a prince. Jonathan the high-prieſt was invited by Alexander to the wedding, where both the kings bad him welcome, with great honour and preſents on both ſides; Alexander appointing him to change his habit, and put on a purple robe, and to take his place next to himſelf upon the throne, commanding alſo the chief of the officers to attend him into the heart of the city, and to make publick proclamation that no man ſhould preſume, upon his uttermoſt peril, either to calumniate or accuſe him, or otherwiſe to give him any the leaſt moleſtation. Upon this gracious demonſtration of eſteem the king had for him, his malicious enemies that were come thither on purpoſe to do him ill offices by defaming him, ſneak'd out of the way for fear the mitchief they meant him ſhould fall upon their own heads. So particular, in fine, was the kindneſs and reſpect that Alexander had for Jonathan, that he reckon'd him among the choiceſt of his friends.

Alexander was not a little ſtartled at the tidings of this expedition; ſo that he preſently haſten'd away from Phenicia to Antioch, to put his affairs in a poſture of ſecurity before Demetrius could get thither; committing the government of Cœle-Syria, in the mean time, to the care of Apollonius, who march'd with an army to Jamnia, and thence ſent Jonathan the high-prieſt a ſchooling and expoſtulatory meſſage, to know "what privilege he had to live at eaſe and liberty, and to withdraw himſelf from the "ſervice of the publick: and the ſcandal (ſays "he) is laid at my door for ſuffering this affront without reducing you to your duty. Apollonius, the governor of Syria, ſends Jonathan a contemptuous challenge. V. 69-73.

JONATHAN was ſo nettled with the inſolence of this challenge, that he marched away out of Jeruſalem with a ſelect band of ten thouſand choſen men, and his brother Simon along with him; and coming up to Joppa, he encamped there: but Apollonius having a gariſon in the town, they ſhut their gates againſt him; ſo that Jonathan put himſelf in a poſture for an aſſault; whereupon the inhabitants, for fear of a ſtorm, deliver'd up the place. So ſoon as Apollonius underſtood that Jonathan was poſſeſs'd of Joppa, he betook himſelf with three thouſand horſe and eight thouſand foot to Azotus, and thence by eaſy marches to Joppa; where he drew off a little to engage Jonathan in the open plain, depending upon his odds of horſe to over-power him. Jonathan, upon this, advanc'd and follow'd Apollonius towards Azotus; who, when he found the enemy in a plain field, turn'd back upon him, and gave him battle. Apollonius had planted a thouſand horſe in an ambuſh near a brook there, to fall upon the enemy's rear; which Jonathan was well aware of, and without any difficulty provided againſt it: for caſting his men into a ſquare figure that fronted every way, they were ready on all hands to receive the charge, front, flank, and rear. They fought it out till toward evening, when Jonathan order'd his brother Simon, with part of his army, to take his time, and charge in upon the enemy's body; having given orders to his own men only to receive receive the darts and arrows of the horſe upon their bucklers, without any other reſiſtance. They kept themſelves upon their guard, till the enemy had ſpent all their offenſive arms, without doing any execution; for they ſtood ſo thick and cloſe, that their darts fell all upon their bucklers, and there was no piercing them through. The enemy was ſo ſpent and tir'd out with this way of fighting, to no purpoſe, from morning till the afternoon, that Simon took that opportunity of attacking their main body; and was ſo bravely ſeconded by his ſoldiers, that he broke and put them to flight. The horſe, upon this rout, betwixt the fatigue of the day, and the hopeleſs condition of the army now the foot was broken, fled and diſperſed themſelves in the greateſt confuſion imaginable: Jonathan cloſely purſuing them as far as Azotus, killing great numbers of them upon the chace, and forcing the reſt into the temple of Dagon there, for ſanctuary. But he took the city in the ſame heat, ſet fire to it, and to ſeveral neighbouring villages; and burnt them all to the ground, together with the temple of Dagon itſelf, and all the people that fled to it for protection, without any regard to the religion of the idol or of the place. The number of thoſe that were either burnt, or fell by the ſword, was computed to be a matter of eight thouſand men. After the defeat of this army, Jonathan advanced with his troops to Askalon, and pitch'd his tents before the city, the inhabitants coming out to him, and treating him with preſents and other tokens of hoſpitality and reſpect; which was all taken very kindly, and as an inſtance of their good-will and affection to him. After this he return'd to Jeruſalem, laden with booty, and victorious. Upon this defeat of Apollonius, Alexander pretended to be wonderfully pleas'd at the miſcarriage, as a thing done entirely againſt his approbation, and without his privity, and a moſt barbarous practice upon a friend and ally: ſo that as a mark of the honour and eſteem he had for him, he ſent him a golden claſp or buckle for a preſent, an honour peculiar only to the royal family; and he gave him alſo the government of Accaron.

Alexander pretends a deteſtation of Apollonius for what he had done; joys Jonathan of his victory, and treats him with preſents, Ver. 88-89.

IT happen'd at the ſame time, that Ptolemy Philometor, with both land and ſea-forces, came into Syria, to the aſſiſtance of his ſon-in-law Alexander, where he was received in all places with great honour and reſpect according to the king's order, ſave only in Azotus; and there he was entertain'd with nothing but lamentable ſtories and complaints of the burning of Dagon's temple, every body exclaiming againſt Jonathan as the author of that outrage, beſide the havock he had made in the country by fire and ſword, and the deſtruction of a great many of their people. Ptolemy gave only the hearing to theſe complaints, and that was all. Jonathan met him at Joppa, and was received with all magnificence and honour; and after conducting the king to the river Eleutherus, he returned to Jeruſalem.

Jonathan meets him at Joppa, and is honourably receiv'd. V. 6.

UPON Ptolemy's coming to the city of Ptolemais, he was within a very little of being deſtroy'd by the treachery of Alexander, which was manag'd by his friend Ammonius. This practice being diſcover'd, he wrote to Alexander to demand juſtice upon him, according to his deſert; but Alexander's refuſing to deliver him up, gave him to underſtand that he himſelf had a hand in it. Upon which preſumption he contracted a mortal hatred againſt him; and he had forfeited the good-will of the people of Antioch before, upon the account of the ſame Ammonius, who had done them many indignities: but at laſt he came to an infamous end; for he loſt his life in the habit of a woman, as he was ſneaking away to ſhift for himſelf under that diſguiſe, as we have ſhew'd in another place.

Alexander and Ammonius contrive the death of Ptolemy. Ver. 10.

The infamous end of Ammonius.

PTOLEMY was by this time ſo ſick of the relation he had to Alexander, and to think of the aſſiſtance he had brought him againſt Demetrius, that he preſently took away his daughter from her husband, and ſtruck up a league with Demetrius againſt Alexander, upon condition of giving him Cleopatra in marriage, and putting him in poſſeſſion of his father's kingdom; who, on the other hand, was well enough pleas'd with the terms, both of the alliance and of the woman. But the people of Antioch had ſuch an averſion to Demetrius upon his father's account, that Ptolemy had a hard task of it to perſuade them to receive that man for their king, whom they look'd upon as their enemy. Yet ſuch was their hatred however to Alexander upon the ſcore of Ammonius, and to Ammonius himſelf alſo for his own ſake, that they were eaſily prevail'd upon to diſcharge the city of Ammonius; who thereupon eſcap'd into Cilicia from Antioch. Ptolemy, upon this, made his entrance into the place; where he was ſaluted, proclaim'd, and crown'd king in two capacities, both by the burghers and the ſoldiery: that is to ſay, in the right of Aſia, and of Egypt. But being a perſon naturally juſt, temperate, and diſcreet, he manag'd his buſineſs to the entire ſatisfaction of his own people; and likewiſe without giving any cauſe of jealouſy or envy to the Romans: ſo that he forthwith call'd a general council of the Antiochians, entertaining them with a diſcourſe upon the ſubject of receiving Demetrius for their king; with large aſſurances on that prince's part, that the ſenſe of the preſent obligation would utterly extinguiſh the memory of all unkindneſs and miſunderſtandings gone and paſt: beſide that I myſelf, ſays he, will take care that in the adminiſtration of the government he ſhall not ſo much as offer at any thing unworthy of his royal dignity and truſt. As for my own part, the kingdom of Egypt ſhall content me abundantly. Upon this mediation, the whole body of the people was prevail'd upon to take Demetrius for their king.

ALEXANDER was at this time ravaging Syria, and the country about Antioch, putting all things to the extremities of fire and ſword, with a numerous and powerful army that he brought out of Cilicia; when Ptolemy, with his ſon-in-law Demetrius (the nuptials being now over) encounter'd and routed him, forcing him to fly to Arabia. It happen'd in that battle that Ptolemy's horſe, upon a fright taken at the braying of an elephant, caſt his rider, and gave his enemies the advantage of giving him many grievous wounds upon the head while he was down; which misfortune would certainly have coſt him his life upon the place, if he had not been luckily reſcu'd by a party of his guards: but ſuch was his condition, however, that he lay ſpeechleſs for four days, without ſpeaking one word himſelf, or underſtanding ſtanding what was ſaid to him. Upon the fifth day, when he was coming a little to himſelf, one Zabelus, an Arabian prince, having cut off Alexander's head, ſent it to Ptolemy, who was wonderfully pleaſed both with the report of the action, and with the ſpectacle itſelf. But when he had entertain'd his paſſion a while with the ſight and thought of a dead enemy, he quickly put an end to that ſatisfaction by dying himſelf. This Alexander was otherwiſe call'd * Balles. He reigned about five years, as was noted elſewhere. Demetrius, who was known alſo by the name of Nicanor, ſucceeded Alexander; a man of a rough rugged temper, as appear'd by his barbarous uſage of Ptolemy's ſoldiers, without any regard to the obligations and ſervices he had receiv'd from them, upon the credit of an affinity with Cleopatra. The ſoldiers had ſuch an indignation for this ungrateful way of proceeding, that they quitted him themſelves, and went away to Alexandria, leaving only the elephants behind them.

JONATHAN, the high-prieſt, having at this time drawn together all the force he was able to raiſe out of Judea, ſet himſelf down before the citadel of Jeruſalem, with a reſolution to diſlodge the Macedonian gariſon, and the fugitive Jews that had taken ſanctuary there. They were ſo bold and confident in the ſtrength of the place, that they bid Jonathan, at firſt, a moſt contemptuous defiance; but after a while they were glad to ſend ſome of their wicked inſtruments by ſtealth out of the town to Demetrius for ſuccour. This intelligence put him into ſuch a chafe, that he immediately march'd out with his army from Antioch toward Jonathan; and upon his arrival at Ptolemais, he ſent for him by a letter to come to him. Jonathan, upon this invitation, took with him ſeveral rich gratifications in gold, ſilver, glorious garments, and other precious curioſities, and, attended with the prieſts and elders, made a compliment of them to Demetrius; the ſiege going forward all this while nevertheleſs. The king's heart was ſo ſoften'd by this generous way of reſpect, that he receiv'd both the preſents and preſenters with great honour, confirm'd and continued Jonathan in the pontificate conferr'd upon him by his predeceſſors; and was, upon the main, ſo far from giving any credit to the calumny and ſuggeſtions of the rabble of the fugitive Jews againſt their countrymen, that upon Jonathan's ſingle requeſt for an abatement of the tribute of Judea, together with the dependencies of Samaria, Joppa, and Galilee, to the rate of only three † hundred talents upon the whole, he cauſed this following declaration to be diſpatch'd away upon the firſt word, in their favour.

Demetrius to Laſthenes in favour of Jonathan and the Jews, V. 32-37.

MATTERS were now brought into ſo quiet and peaceable a ſtate, that Demetrius, flattering himſelf into an opinion that there was no longer any danger, diſcharg'd his army without their full pay, retaining only a body of mercenaries that he had gotten together in Crete, and other of the neighbouring iſlands: ſo that diſmiſſing his father's old troops, without any ſtipend, contrary to the practice of his anceſtors, who paid them as well in peace as in war, and ſo kept them in readineſs to ſerve upon any occaſion, he quite loſt the hearts of his own people.

Malchus was at firſt a little diffident and ſcrupulous; but by the force of prayers and preſſing inſtances, he was in a ſhort time drawn over to a compliance.

Jonathan proſecutes the ſiege of the citadel, Ver. 41.

JONATHAN the high-prieſt laid cloſe ſiege all this while to the citadel at Jeruſalem, with a reſolution to clear, not only that caſtle, but other ſtrong holds alſo in the country, where the fugitive Jews ſhelter'd themſelves in gariſon; ſo that he ſent an embaſſy to Demetrius with more preſents upon this occaſion, deſiring him to withdraw all his men that were in any of the fortreſſes of Judea; whoſe anſwer was, that he was ready to gratify him, not only in that, but in a greater matter, ſo ſoon as ever he could diſpatch the preſent war, which found him ſo much work at that time, that he was not at liberty to do any thing elſe; but adjuring Jonathan by all that was ſacred in friendſhip, to ſend him a ſupply of men; for his own troops, he ſaid, were gone over to the enemy. Jonathan ſoon after this ſent the king a ſuccour of three thouſand choice men.

Jonathan ſends Demetrius three thouſand choice men upon the revolt of his army, Ver. 44.

THE people of Antioch were ſo enrag'd againſt Demetrius, both for his father's ſake and his own, that they deſir'd nothing more than an opportunity for a revenge; wherefore upon the news of this relief from Jonathan, and conſidering the hazard of his growing ſtill ſtronger and ſtronger, if they were not beforehand with him, they betook themſelves to their arms in a hurry, and immediately begirt the palace with ſuch a countenance and poſture, as if they were juſt ready to give the aſſault. But their chief buſineſs was rather to ſecure the avenues, and ſeize him as he was coming out. Demetrius finding himſelf thus beſet, drew up his foreign mercenaries, together with Jonathan's auxiliaries, and made a charge upon the enemy, but met with a ſmart repulſe from the numerous enemy, and was obliged to retreat. The Jews, upon this repulſe, retir'd into the palace, where they mounted the battlements; and from thence with darts and arrows ſo gall'd the enemy, that they forced them from one houſe to another, without much danger to themſelves. The next thing they did, was to fire the city; which, being for the greater part of wooden buildings, and the houſes ſtanding cloſe, was preſently all in a flame. The inhabitants, finding that the fire was not to be maſter'd, ſhifted for themſelves as well as they could, the Jews ſtill purſuing them from houſe to houſe, and doing wonderful execution upon them. This rout put an end to their fighting; and all they had now to do, was to ſave their wives and children; but the Jews all this while made advantage of their confuſion; and falling upon them at every turn according to the king's order, they killed great numbers of them upon the purſuit, and forced the reſt to throw down their arms, and deliver themſelves up at mercy. This victory put an end to the war; the rebellion being pardon'd, and the booty given to the Jews, whom Demetrius ſent back again to Jonathan, with a moſt honourable teſtimony of their valour, acknowledging that it was to their courage he ſtood indebted for that ſucceſs; but this ſpirit of gratitude did not poſſeſs him long; for he did afterward not only break his promiſe, but threaten Jonathan with a war, if he ſhould not for the future make good thoſe tributes to himſelf, which the Jews had formerly paid to his predeceſſors; and he had done as he ſaid too, if Tryphon had not diverted him, by forcing him to make uſe of that army againſt himſelf, which he had deſign'd againſt Jonathan, who being now return'd out of Arabia into Syria, with young Antiochus, ſet the crown upon his head, and by the help of the ſoldiers before ſpoken of, who had been defrauded of their pay, he made open war upon Demetrius, worſted him in a pitch'd battle, made himſelf maſter of his elephants, and of the city of Antioch, and forc'd him back into Cilicia.

ANTIOCHUS upon this reſolution ſent an embaſſy to Jonathan, acknowledging him for his friend and ally, eſtabliſh'd him in the pontificate, put him in poſſeſſion of the four governments that were aſſign'd to Judea, and gave his brother Simon the command of all his forces, from Tyre to the borders of Sidon; preſenting Jonathan over and above, with ſeveral drinking cups of gold, purple garments with a golden buckle, and the privilege of uſing and wearing theſe enſigns of ſtate, adopting him alſo into the roll of his choiceſt friends. Jonathan was ſo ſenſible of theſe multiplied bounties, and marks of honour he had received from Antiochus, that he forthwith diſpatch'd away an expreſs to Antiochus and Tryphon, both in one; with a moſt affectionate tender of his friendſhip and ſervice, with all readineſs to join againſt Demetrius as a common enemy; reflecting upon him alſo at the ſame time as the moſt ungrateful of men, in returning ſo much evil for ſo much good.

No ſooner had Jonathan his commiſſion for the raiſing of men, but he preſently fell to raiſing of levies in Syria and Phenicia, and from thence to all the neighbouring towns and cities, where he was received with great honour in appearance, but got no ſoldiers among them. Upon his coming afterward to Askalon, the people entertain'd him with formalities and preſents, where he took occaſion to lay before them, (as he did at other places in Cele-Syria,) how much it was their intereſt and their duty to take up arms againſt Demetrius for Antiochus, having ſo fair an opportunity to be revenged of him for the injuries he had done them. He wrought upon them ſo far by his advice and reaſoning, that they promiſed ſupplies; but advancing afterward to Gaza upon the deſign of the ſame good office to Antiochus, he found, to his great admiration, the gates ſhut againſt him, and the people obſtinately reſolved to abide by Demetrius. Jonathan took this affront ſo heinouſly, that he forthwith divided his army upon it, aſſaulting the town with one part, while the other went up and down to burn and lay waſte the country. any relief from Demetrius; nor, in truth, ſo much as the hopes of any at ſo remote a diſtance, they came at laſt, laying things together, to conſult their neceſſities, and upon ſecond thoughts judg'd it moſt adviſable to make a ſeaſonable and a ſubmiſſive application to Jonathan by their deputies, who were as frankly received on the other hand into his intereſt and friendſhip. It were better if men would govern themſelves by a proſpect of the reaſons and conſequences of things beforehand, and to do what they ought to do willingly, before they came to be forc'd to it; but ſome people are altogether for the after wit, that comes by woful experience. Jonathan, in fine, accepted of their propoſals and hoſtages, and ſo ſent them away to Jeruſalem, paſſing himſelf through the country to Damaſcus.

Upon ſecond thoughts they court and embrace his friendſhip. 1 Mac. xi. 62.

DEMETRIUS in the mean while had a ſtrong army encamped before * Cedaſa upon the borders of Tyre and Galilee, with a deſign to draw Jonathan out of Syria by way of diverſion, to the aſſiſtance of Galilee, upon a preſumption that he would look to his own country in the firſt place; but this did not hinder Jonathan from advancing with all the ſpeed he could to encounter him, leaving his brother Simon behind him in his abſence to take care of Judea. Simon at the ſame time, with what men he could get together out of that country, marched up to Bethſura, and aſſaulted it, though accounted the ſtrongeſt and moſt defenſible place in all Judea, and in the hands, as we have ſaid before, of the faction of Demetrius. So ſoon as the gariſon found themſelves ſo preſs'd with works and engines, that the place ſeem'd to be in ſome danger, they ſent a meſſenger to Simon, only for leave to quit the place, and, without any moleſtation or violence, free liberty to march away to Demetrius. They were brought to theſe terms, by the apprehenſion of being all put to the ſword, if the place were taken by force. Simon granted them their own conditions, and put another gariſon in the place of what was there before.

JONATHAN at this time moving from the place in Galilee, near the lake of Genezer, where he had firſt encamped, advanced into the plain of Aſor, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting any enemy upon that quarter; but a party of Demetrius's having gotten intelligence of his deſign the day before, plac'd an ambuſh under a mountain, and marched toward him with their body in the plain field. So ſoon as Jonathan ſaw them in order of battle, and ready to make a charge, he gave his men the beſt orders he could in ſo ſhort a time, how to govern themſelves in the action; but when the Jews came to diſcover the ambuſh, they turn'd their backs immediately, for fear of being coop'd up betwixt the two bodies, and all cut off. The terror was ſo general, that Jonathan had hardly a man to ſtand by him, ſaving only two captains of his guards, Mattathias the ſon of Apſalom, and Judas the ſon of Chapſeus, who, with a band of fifty brave fellows, ſtood their ground, and made ſo deſperate a charge upon the enemy's front, that they fought rather like mad men than ſoldiers.

Jonathan's deſerters finding the ſoldiers of Demetrius in confuſion, and almoſt ready to run away, made haſte and rallied; and falling in upon them afreſh, kill'd a matter of two thouſand upon the place, put to flight the reſt, and purſued them to Cedaſa, up to their very tents.

The deſerters rally upon it, and carry the day, Ver. 73, 74.

JONATHAN, after this glorious victory, returned to Jeruſalem; and in this height of his ſucceſſes ſent his ambaſſadors to Rome, with a commiſſion to renew an alliance with them, and with orders to go to Lacedemon in their return, upon the ſame account. Jonathan's propoſals were entertain'd, and his ambaſſadors honourably treated, and diſpatch'd away with letters recommendatory to the kings of Europe and Aſia for their ſafe paſſage. They called likewiſe upon the Lacedemonians, in their way back again, and preſented them with letters, as follows:

Of the three ſects among the Jews, Phariſees, Sadducees, and Eſſenes.

THE Jews were at this time divided into three ſects or factions, upon the ſubject of fate and free-will. The three parties were Phariſees, Sadduces, and Eſſenes. The Phariſees held that men were concluded under a fatality in ſome caſes, and left at liberty in others, either to do, or not to do, as they pleaſed. The Sadduces did not allow of any fatality at all, in what caſe ſoever; but that every man has it in his own power to make his condition better or worſe, according as he takes right or wrong meaſures; whereas the Eſſenes, on the other hand, acknowledg'd no other power than that of an over-ruling deſtiny, working according to the predeterminations of an irreſiſtible fate: but we have ſpoken more particularly to this point in our hiſtory of the Jewiſh wars, B. ii.

Demetrius's troops march toward Jonathan, and Jonathan advances to oppoſe them, 1 Mac. xii. 24, 25.

DEMETRIUS's commanders were now advancing toward Jonathan, at the head of a better army than they had before, in hopes of retrieving the reputation they had loſt by their late overthrow; but Jonathan having intelligence that they were approaching, made all the haſte he could to meet them at Amathis, with a reſolution to oppoſe their paſſage into Judea, encamping himſelf within * fifty furlongs of the enemy, and ſending ſcouts abroad for diſcovery how they were poſted, and which way they bent their deſign. Upon the return of the ſpies with the beſt information they could get, and ſome priſoners they had taken that night, Jonathan found that the deſign was to ſurprize him in his quarters; ſo that he put every thing immediately into a poſture of defence, planted his watches and out-guards to the beſt advantage, and kept his men in arms and in heart all that night; telling them the whole matter beforehand, to the end that if they ſhould be attack'd, they might not be ſurpriz'd. When the officers of Demetrius came to underſtand that the plot was diſcover'd, it put them to their wits end what to do next; for their ſtratagem being diſappointed, they were not in a condition to encounter him by open force. Upon this pinch they could find no better ſhift than to ſlip away by night, and under the countenance of ſeveral fires, to cover their retreat. The next morning by dawn of day Jonathan march'd up with a reſolution to force the camp; when finding it abandon'd, he poſted away after the fugitives as faſt as he could, but to no purpoſe; for they had gotten over the river Eleutherus, into a place of ſafety, before he could reach them. He took his courſe next into Arabia, ravaged the country of the Nabatheans; took a great many cattle and priſoners, and ſold them at Damaſcus.

SIMON at the ſame time took a progreſs through Judea and Paleſtine, as far as Askalon, where he gariſon'd all places of defence; and after fortifying and ſecuring the country, marched to Joppa, took poſſeſſion of the place, and clapt a ſtrong guard upon it, to keep the inhabitants in awe, that would otherwiſe have betray'd the town to Demetrius.

Jonathan and Simon fortify the city and temple, Ver. 35--38.

MATTERS being in this diſpoſition, Jonathan and Simon returned to Jeruſalem, where the high-prieſt ſummoning the people together into the temple, put them upon repairing the ruinous walls, both of the city, and thoſe about the holy place; fortifying them, upon the main, with high and ſubſtantial towers; adviſing them alſo to erect another wall to cut off all communication betwixt the caſtle and the city; recommending it to them, over and above, to put good gariſons into other convenient places up and down, and keep the country in a defenſible condition. The people were highly pleaſed with the reaſons of all he ſaid; ſo that he made it his own province to take care of the city, and committed the reſt to his brother.

Demetrius makes war upon Arſaces, loſes his army, and is taken priſoner, 1 Mac. xiv. 1--3.

DEMETRIUS, being gotten over the river, advanced into Meſopotamia, with a deſign of making himſelf maſter, not only of the country, but of Babylon itſelf; propoſing alſo, upon the reducing of the upper provinces, to make that quarter the ſeat of the war; for the Greeks and Macedonians thereabouts had ſent him ſeveral embaſſies and invitations to come over to them, with aſſurances, that upon his appearing, they would range themſelves under his obedience, and aſſiſt him with their arms againſt Arſaces the king of Parthia. Encouraged by theſe hopes Demetrius moved immediately toward them, concluding it would be an eaſy matter to beat Tryphon out of Syria, after one home blow given to the Parthians. In the ſtrength of this confidence Demetrius poſted away immediately towards him, and was received upon his arrival by the people of that country, with all the cheerfulneſs imaginable, where he put himſelf at the head of a brave army, and made war upon Arſaces; by whom he was utterly routed, his whole army deſtroy'd, and himſelf taken priſoner, as we have ſaid formerly in another place.

The fall of Demetrius encourages Tryphon to ſet up for himſelf, 1 Mac. xii. 39.

THIS miſcarriage of Demetrius put an end to Tryphon's pretended faith and allegiance to Antiochus: his buſineſs being now only to conſider how he might remove his maſter out of the way, and ſet up for himſelf. This could not be effected, he thought, ſo long as Jonathan (a true friend to Antiochus) was in a condition to oppoſe it: ſo that the firſt thing to be done, was to contrive how to take off Jonathan. To which end he went from Antioch to Bethſan, (in Greek, Scythopolis) where he found Jonathan with forty thouſand choice men, ready at hand to ſerve him in caſe of need. Tryphon, finding him in this ſtrength and poſture, made uſe of preſents and fair words to inveigle and impoſe upon him, when he ſaw there was no good to be done by downright force. He gave it in charge to his officers, to pay the same respect and obedience to Jonathan that they did to himself: propounding, by these ways of insinuation, to cover the treachery of his false heart, and to create in him such a trust and confidence as might probably expose him, for want of caution, to a mortal credulity and surprize. Passing from one thing to another; till at last, in regard all things were now at peace, he said, and the war at an end, he put it into Jonathan's head to discharge his army, as a burden there was no occasion for; but still advising him to retain a competent guard about his person, and that they might go together to Ptolemais, for he was resolved to put him in possession of that city, and all the fortresses thereabouts; "for (says "he) I am now come hither on purpose to "deliver those places into your hands." Jonathan was too innocent to suspect so base a villany; insomuch that casting himself wholly upon the sincerity and good faith of Tryphon, he dismiss'd his army, all but three thousand men, whereof he left two in Galilee, and carry'd the third along with him in company with Tryphon to Ptolemais. He was no sooner enter'd the town with his people, but the inhabitants, according to their instructions, shut their gates upon him, took Jonathan alive, and cut off all his soldiers, every man of them. Part of the army was afterwards sent to Galilee, with an intent to massacre the other two thousand there, as they had done their fellows; but they having timely notice of their treachery to Jonathan, betook themselves to their arms immediately upon the report, and so made their escape. Tryphon's soldiers were so well satisfy'd in the resolution of these men as to the contempt of death and danger, that they let them go off without any interruption; and so return'd back again as they came.

Jerusalem in sorrow and consternation for Jonathan's imprisonment and disaster, V. 52.

THE news of Jonathan's imprisonment, and the massacre of the people that attended him; the loss, in fine, of so great a man, and a person so necessary to the Jews, both for his valour and conduct, struck the inhabitants of Jerusalem, not only with an inconsolable affliction, out of the love they bore him, but with a terrible apprehension over and above, of the miseries they lay expos'd to in the consequence of his death: even to the hazard of the whole nation, by letting loose those enemies upon them, on this occasion, that stood in awe of them before. This was the thing they fear'd; and they were not much out in their conjecture: for so soon as they came afterward to hear that Jonathan was put to death, their neighbours all associated against them, as men without a head, and utterly destitute; the general being lost, and no other commander qualify'd to exercise his charge. Nay, Tryphon himself got an army together to make an inroad with it upon Judea. But Simon observing what a consternation the people were in, for fear of new broils, and out of an affectionate zeal to keep up their hearts against the practices of Tryphon, he call'd the people together, and address'd himself to them in the following manner:

Tryphon prepares for an incursion into Judea, 1 Mac. xiii. 1-2.

"I NEED not tell you, (says he) my friends "and countrymen, how vigorously and frankly "I myself, my father, and my brethren, have "exposed ourselves to the uttermost difficul-"ties and hazards for our common liberty; "so that it is no new thing in our family, to "lay down our lives in the defence of our "laws and our religion; neither am I so in-"sensible of the authority of these domestick "examples, as to be wrought upon by any ter-"ror to the sacrificing of my honour and my "duty, for the saving of my life. Wherefore, "without looking any farther for a leader, "you have a man here before you, that is "ready to do or to suffer all things that are "great and glorious, for your preservation "and welfare; do but you only follow where "I shall lead you. I do not reckon myself "to be better than my brethren, neither do I "value my life at a higher rate than they "have done theirs before me; nor am I so de-"generate, as to think of saving that life by "cowardice, when my country and my reli-"gion are at stake; which our family has ever "accounted as the most heroical of their ad-"ventures, to part with upon the same occa-"sion. No, no, my friends and brethren, it "shall never be said that I have derogated "from the dignity of our family. I make no "doubt at all yet, but that God in his good "time will, even by my hand, avenge you "upon the heads of your enemies; deliver "you, with your wives and children, from "your oppressors, and vindicate the holy tem-"ple against all the abominations and violen-"ces of your malicious persecutors. And what "is it, in fine, that encourages this present "confederacy against you, but that they look "upon you as sheep without a shepherd; that "is to say, an army without a leader?"

Simon animates the people to stand up for their liberties, and offers himself for their general. Ver. 3-6.

THE multitude were so inflam'd at this speech and declaration of Simon, that they presently took courage and confidence upon it; suspended their fears, and reviv'd their spirits with the hope of better things: so that they all cried out with one voice, "None so "fit as Simon to succeed to the command of "his brave brothers, Judas and Jonathan; and "therefore let Simon be our general, and what-"ever he commands shall be obey'd." The new general got as many of his people together as were fit to bear arms, and so fell to work upon the walling of the city, and the fortifying of it with strong and stately towers; and that being over, he sent Jonathan the son of Absalom, a particular friend of his, to Joppa, with order to turn the inhabitants out of the town, for fear they should deliver it up to Tryphon: while he himself continued at Jerusalem to look to the city.

TRYPHON

Tryphon marches into Judea, and takes Jonathan along with him in bonds, 1 Mac. xiii. 12.

TRYPHON was now upon his march with a great army from Ptolemais; and coming into Judea, he brought Jonathan with him in bonds. Simon met him with his troops near the city of Addida, upon a mountain that overlooks the plain. When Tryphon came to understand that the Jews had chosen Simon for their general, he sent messengers to him to try if he could circumvent him also by a trick. And so he sent him word, that if he had a mind to have his brother Jonathan discharg'd, let him send him a * hundred talents of silver, and two sons of Jonathan along with it for hostages, that when he should be set at liberty, he should not seduce Judea from their allegiance to the king; Tryphon suggesting that he was now to be kept in custody, only till the king's money should be paid. Simon knew well enough there was a cheat in it: but considering, on the one hand, though he run the danger of losing the money without obtaining his brother's release, beside the delivery of his sons to the mercy of an enemy, yet there occurred difficulties on the other hand no less perplexing; for he was afraid that upon his denial of the money for a ransom, or the sons for hostages, he should be branded with the calumny of his brother's death. Upon this deliberation, he call'd a council, told them Tryphon's demands; giving his opinion also beforehand, that there was treachery in the bottom: but intimating, however, that it would be better to send both the money and the sons, at a venture, than to incur a suspicion, upon not hearkening to Tryphon's conditions, of being less zealous than he ought to be for the safety of his brother.

Tryphon takes the money and the hostages, and keeps Jonathan still a prisoner, Ver. 19.

So the resolution was taken to send both: tho' Tryphon, after he had receiv'd them, broke his faith, and refused to release Jonathan; ranging up and down with his army, and ravaging the country, till he came at last to Dora, a city of Idumea, with an intention to make that his way to Jerusalem; Simon keeping up with him still wherever he went, camp against camp.

The citadel of Jerusalem is hard press'd, V. 21.

WHILE Tryphon was upon the way, word was brought him from Jerusalem, that the garison was sore distress'd for want of provisions, and that they desir'd he would immediately hasten to their relief. Upon this intelligence, he order'd his horse to be in readiness, for he would march without any delay to their succour; but there fell so great a snow that night, that the ways were all cover'd and impassable, especially for horse. care however to remove Jonathan's bones to his father's sepulchre at Modin, with the solemnity of a publick mourning, where he erected a glorious monument of white polish'd marble to the honour of his family. It was raised upon an eminence that overlooks the whole country thereabouts, and encompassed with arched walks, resting upon admirable pillars, each of one entire stone. He raised also seven pyramids for his father, mother, four brothers, and himself, one for each: a work so wonderful, both for the state and beauty of it, that it is yet to be seen, and hath the reputation of a celebrated piece even to this day.

THIS may suffice to shew the care and zeal of Simon in doing right to the honour of his family, by so magnificent a monument; and most particularly to the memory of Jonathan †, who had now governed the people in the quality both of prince and of high-priest for the space of four years, his brother Simon, by the universal suffrage and consent of the people, succeeding him. In the first year of his promotion, he deliver'd them from the tributes he formerly paid to the Macedonians; and this was in the year 170, from the coming of Seleucus Nicanor to the kingdom of Syria. Now Simon had gain'd so great an esteem and authority among the people, that they dated their writings, as well private as publick, in such or such a year of Simon the governor of the Jews, with this addition, And the most deserving patron of the nation. For under his administration all things succeeded well, both in war and peace, by the advantages he brought to his friends, and by the victory he obtain'd over the common enemy; destroying the cities of Gazara, Joppa, and Jamnia; laying the citadel of Jerusalem level with the ground; and taking it moreover into his care, how to prevent the same inconveniences again for the time to come: that is to say, by putting it out of condition of either annoying the town, or of serving for a place of protection to fugitives and rebels. In order to this end, he gave his advice for the digging up and plaining of the mountain itself that the castle stood upon, so as to leave the temple upon the advantage of the higher ground. Upon this consideration, he call'd a congregation, and laid before them what damage they had already suffer'd from this castle, and what Inconveniences they might reasonably expect from it over again for the time to come, if ever it should fall into the hands of an enemy prince. This plain and short way of reasoning wrought so effectually upon the multitude, that they were presently, one and all, for demolishing the mountain. They fell immediately to work upon it, and ply'd it so hard night and day for three years successively, without intermission (doing duty by turns) that in the end, by the force of indefatigable labour, they brought it under the command of the temple.

pupil Antiochus, the ſon of Alexander, (whom they treated with divine honours) in the fourth year of his guardianſhip, giving it out that it was only an unlucky accident in his exerciſes, that brought him to his end. While this rumour was freſh, Tryphon made an intereſt among the ſoldiery, by the force of friends and money, to diſpoſe them toward the choice of himſelf for their next governor. Demetrius, they ſaid, was a priſoner to the Parthians, and Antiochus would never forget the deſerters of his brother. By this artifice of inſinuation, Tryphon prepar'd his way to the crown; and there needed not much argument in the caſe, when all people judg'd it would be the making of every man's fortune, that ſhould give his voice for the making of this man king; ſo that they advanc'd him to the throne without any more ceremony. This elevation made a diſcovery of that ill-nature in him, now he was a king, which he had concealed all this while in the capacity of a private man, the better to compaſs his ends by diſſembling with the people. So ſoon as ever he had gain'd his point, the mask was taken off, and he ſhew'd himſelf to be a true Tryphon (or a diſſolute wretch) in his manners, as well as in his name; and his adverſaries laid hold of it very much to his diſadvantage; for the ſoldiers grew quickly weary of his humour, and went over to Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius who had then ſhut up herſelf in Seleucia with her children, while Antiochus, (otherwiſe called Soter, and the brother of Demetrius,) went skulking up and down from place to place, and ſcarce any body daring to receive him, for fear of Tryphon. Now Cleopatra, what with the encouragement of the military men that deſerted him, the inſtance and perſuaſion of friends, and the apprehenſion ſhe herſelf had of the Seleucians giving up the town to Tryphon, ſhe ſent a meſſenger to Antiochus, with a propoſal of marriage, and a tender of her kingdom to him, as well as of her perſon. Antiochus forthwith embraced the propoſition; and upon cloſing with Cleopatra on thoſe terms, the people came in to him in ſuch numbers, that in a ſhort time he was maſter of a marching army, and made war upon Tryphon, overcame him in a battle; and beating him out of Syria, purſued him to Phenicia, begirting him at laſt in Dora, a very ſtrong and a well-fortified hold. He ſent ambaſſadors alſo to Simon the high-prieſt of the Jews, upon a treaty of amity and alliance, who frankly accepted of his terms, and ſoon after ſent him a ſupply of proviſions and monies for the carrying on of the ſiege, which was a ſervice at that time ſo acceptable to Antiochus, that he look'd upon him as the beſt friend he had in the world; but Tryphon, in the end, made an eſcape out of Dora, and fled to Apamia, where the town was taken, and himſelf ſlain, after he had held the government three years.

ANTIOCHUS being naturally covetous, and conſequently ungrateful, was now ſo far from acknowledging the good offices Simon had done him, that he ſent an army under the command of Cendebeus, to lay Judea waſte, and to ſeize upon his perſon. The ſenſe of this perfidious indignity put the good old man ſo far out of patience, that forgetting the infirmities of his age, he marched immediately at the head of an army with the reſolution of a hero in the prime of his youth and vigour, to engage the enemy; ſending his ſon before him with ſome of his choiceſt troops, and himſelf following by ſeveral ways with the reſt, planting his ambuſhes every where up and down in the avenues, and all things ſucceeding to his heart's content; for he had ſtill the better of it upon every encounter; renew'd his league with the Romans, and liv'd at peace afterward all the days of his life.

Jericho,

Hyrcanus ſucceeded his father in the pontificate.

Jericho, called Dagon. Hyrcanus at the ſame time enter'd upon the pontificate, and officiated in it as ſucceſſor to his father. The firſt thing he did, was to offer up prayers and ſacrifices in due manner and form; and that duty being over, he marched away to the aſſault of the fort; where the only difficulty he met withal, was to contend with the natural piety and tenderneſs he had for his mother and his brethren, whom Ptolemy expoſed from the top of the wall, whipping and tormenting them in the ſight of all the people, with menaces to caſt them headlong from the battlements, unleſs Hyrcanus preſently quitted the ſiege. Now the other computing with himſelf, that the eaſier he was to the town, the eaſier Ptolemy would be to his relations, this thought put him to a little ſtand upon the firſt impreſſion, which way to incline; but his mother ſeeing him look and act as if he were deliberating and relenting, called out to him aloud, and encourag'd him both with her hand and voice, to make a right uſe of that barbarous ſpectacle, and without any regard to her's and her children's ſufferings, to do himſelf and his family right, in a juſt vengeance upon the head of that execrable monſter; for ſhe herſelf deſired nothing more than to expire in her torments, upon condition that that unnatural tyrant might be plagued and puniſhed according to his deſert. The generous and provoking bravery of this woman raiſed the ſpirits of Hyrcanus to the higheſt degree of reſolution to puſh forward the aſſault. But finding that the more they preſs'd upon the fort, the fiercer Ptolemy was upon his mother, all other reſentments of rage and revenge gave way to the over-ruling ſoftneſs of a dutiful ſon; ſo that by theſe pauſes and intervals, irreſolution and diſtraction, the ſiege was drawn out at length till the ſabbatical year came on, the ſeventh year being a year of reſt to the Jews, as well as the ſeventh of days; ſo that Ptolemy was now deliver'd from the war and the ſiege; and thereupon putting to death the mother and the brother of Hyrcanus, he withdrew to Zeno, ſirnamed Cotyla, a tyrant who had at that time uſurped to himſelf the government of Philadelphia.

CHAP. XVI.

Antiochus beſieges Hyrcanus in the fort at Jeruſalem. He grants the Jews a ſeven days truce. Hyrcanus moves him in favour of the Jews, who comes to terms with him, and raiſes the ſiege. Hyrcanus makes an alliance with Antiochus; and, according to Nicolaus of Damaſcus, does him great ſervice in the Parthian war. Antiochus is defeated and ſlain, and the kingdom of Syria deſcends to his brother Demetrius.

Antiochus breaks into Judea, forces Hyrcanus into Jeruſalem, and beſieges him in it.

ANTIOCHUS had not as yet either forgotten or forgiven the repulſes and diſgraces he had formerly receiv'd from Simon the father of Hyrcanus; ſo that he made an inroad into Judea in the fourth year of his reign, the firſt of Hyrcanus *, and the hundred and ſixty ſecond Olympiad, where he firſt ravaged the country, and then drove Hyrcanus into the city itſelf, dividing his army into ſeven bodies round about it. They advanced little or nothing at the beginning, the walls being very ſtrong, and the defendants valiant. The camp was for ſome ſhort time diſtreſs'd for want of water; but that defect was plentifully ſupplied by a great fall of rain. Upon a thorough conſideration of the matter, they found the town moſt acceſſible upon the north ſide of it, and therefore bent their force principally upon that quarter, raiſing a hundred turrets of three ſtories high againſt them, which were well lin'd with ſoldiers to carry on the attack. They had likewiſe drawn a double circumvallation of a great length and depth, to cut off the means of communication and relief. But this did not hinder the defendants yet from making frequent ſallies, and doing execution too, when at any time they ſaw the beſiegers looſe or careleſs upon their guard; or, however, if they found them in a poſture to receive them, they could make their retreat good at pleaſure. There were a great many unprofitable mouths in the town, that only waſted their proviſions, without doing any manner of ſervice; ſo that Hyrcanus taking this into conſideration, ſeparated thoſe that were fit to bear arms from the reſt, and turn'd all the uſeleſs people out of the city; where, betwixt Antiochus on the one hand, that ſtopt them from going any further, and Hyrcanus on the other, that would not let them come in again, the poor wretches ſaunter'd away their time under the wall, till many of them periſhed for want of bread.

The enemy's approaches and attacks.

All unprofitable people turn'd out of town.

IT ſo fell out, that it was now the time of feaſt of tabernacles; and upon the occaſion of this feſtival, theſe miſerable creatures were admitted into the town again; whereupon the inhabitants addreſs'd themſelves to Antiochus, only to grant a truce for ſeven days, in honour of the ſolemnity; which out of a conſcience of religion, he allow'd them at firſt word; and he did not only gratify them in their requeſt, but ſent them magnificent preſents of beaſts over and above for ſacrifices; as bulls with gilded horns, cups of gold and ſilver, repleniſh'd with all ſorts of precious ſpices and perfumes; and, in fine, treated them with an entertainment much different from that of Antiochus Epiphanes; who, in affront to their religion, upon the taking of the temple, ſacrific'd hogs upon the altar, and prophan'd the holy place with porridge made of ſwines fleſh, in a flat defiance and contempt of their laws and ceremonies, which prov'd the ground of an animoſity betwixt them never to be reconcil'd; whereas the preſent Antiochus had the character and ſirname of the Pious given him by all ſorts of people, in honour of the reverence he had for religion.

Antiochus ſirnamed the Pious.

HYRCANUS took encouragement upon this inſtance of the king's juſtice and goodneſs, to move him by an embaſſy on the Jews behalf, for the liberty only of living one with another, according to the laws and cuſtoms of their own country. The court faction, on the contrary, were for having them wholly cut off and rooted out, as an inſociable ſort of people, that would be thought holier and wiſer than their neighbours, and valued themſelves upon a ſingularity from the reſt of the world, in

But the king had too great a reſpect for their piety and behaviour, to put them to extremities; ſo that he ſent word back to Hyrcanus, that upon condition the beſieged ſhould deliver up their arms, undertake for the taxes of Joppa, and the reſt of the cities about Judea, and receive a gariſon into the town, of his appointment, he was ready to put an end to the war upon their own terms. The Jews agreed to all, but the receiving of the gariſon, in regard of the ſcruple they made of intermixing with ſtrangers; but for a compoſition to be eaſed of that article, they propoſed rather to give the king hoſtages for the performance of covenants, and five * hundred talents over and above, which the king accepted of; three hundred of them being paid down upon the nail in part; and the brother of Hyrcanus one of the pledges. Upon the finiſhing of this treaty, the works and the battlements were thrown down, the city diſmantled, and the ſiege rais'd.

Hyrcanus takes three thouſand talents out of David's tomb.

HYRCANUS after this cauſed the monument of David to be open'd, (the richeſt prince that ever was upon the face of the earth,) where he made a ſeizure of † three thouſand talents to his own uſe, and furniſh'd himſelf with foreign mercenaries, being the firſt of the nation that ever entertain'd an army of ſtrangers. In the next place he enter'd into a league with Antiochus, invited himſelf and his army into the city, where he gave them a ſplendid and a moſt magnificent reception, and follow'd him afterward with his auxiliaries into the Parthian war, as we have it upon the authority of Nicolaus Damaſcenus in terms to this purpoſe: "Antiochus, upon the routing of Indates the "Parthian general, erected a triumphal arch "upon the bank of the river Lycus, where "he reſted two days at the requeſt of Hyr-"canus a Jew, being juſt at the time of one "of their feſtivals, upon which day they "made a conſcience of travelling." The hiſtorian was in the right as to this particular; for the feaſt of pentecoſt fell out at that time, to be juſt the next day after the ſabbath, and it is not lawful for us to take a journey upon either of thoſe two days.

He ſtrikes a league with Antiochus, and follows him into the Parthian war.

ANTIOCHUS, in fine, came to a battle with Arſaces, the king of the Parthians, in which action he left both his life and his army. His brother Demetrius, after him, ſucceeded to the kingdom of Syria, being now ſet at liberty by Arſaces, upon this invaſion of Antiochus, of which we have ſpoken heretofore.

*Hyrcanus makes himſelf maſter of Idumea, and brings over the people to the Jewiſh laws and diſcipline, and contracts a new alliance with the Romans. Upon the death of Antiochus, Hyrcanus marches immediately into Syria.

HYRCANUS, after the death of Antiochus, march'd away immediately with his army into Syria, preſuming within himſelf, as afterward it prov'd, that he ſhould find the country in ſome meaſure deſerted and unmann'd. In ſix months time, though with ſome difficulty, he took in Medaba; and after that, Samega, and other places thereabouts; and then Sichem and Garizin, with the land of the Chuthites, where the temple ſtood, that with Alexander's leave, was built after the model of that at Jeruſalem by Sanballat, one of his governours, to gratify his ſon-in-law Manaſſes, the brother of the high prieſt Jaddus, as we have ſaid before; which temple was deſtroy'd about two hundred years after. Hyrcanus took alſo ſeveral ſtrong places in Idumea, as Adora and Mariſſa; and at laſt, when he had ſubdued the whole province, made proclamation for all people to depart the land that would not ſubmit to be circumcis'd: So that rather than quit their country, they not only comply'd in the point of circumciſion, but in a conformity alſo to all the other rites and ceremonies of the Jews: And that was the firſt time they were reckoned among the Jews.

He ſubdues the whole province of Idumea.

HYRCANUS the high prieſt, being now about to renew a league with the Romans, ſent his ambaſſadors to the ſenate, with letters upon that ſubject. Theſe letters being read and debated, an amity was concluded in manner, and upon the conditions following: "Fanius "the ſon of Marcus Prætor, called a ſenate "in the field of Mars, on the eighth of the "ides of February; preſent Lucius Manlius "the ſon of Lucius Mentina, and Caius Sem-"pronius the ſon of Caius Falerna, upon the "buſineſs of the embaſſy of Simon the ſon of "Doſitheus; Apollonius the ſon of Alexan-"der, and Diodorus, the ſon of Jaſon, perſons "of honour and probity, and deputed by the "nation of the Jews to treat about an alliance, "and other publick matters with the ſenate of "Rome: Whereupon it was agreed that Jop-"pa, and the ports Gazara with the foun-"tains, and other places that had been taken "away by Antiochus contrary to a decree of "the ſenate, ſhould be all reſtored, and the "king's ſoldiers not to paſs thorough either "that, or any other part of the Roman terri-"tory without leave: That whatever had been "done by Antiochus in the late war, ſhould "be declared void, and commiſſioners apoint-"ed to take an eſtimate of what the people "had ſuffer'd in their lands and goods by his "depredations; and to ſee ſatisfaction made "for all loſſes." As to the matter of returning an answer in form, it should be done, they said, at their first leisure, and care taken that no wrong should be offer'd them for the future. Fanius had orders likewise to furnish the embassadors with money for their charges back again, out of the publick stock; which he did accordingly, with recommendatory letters over and above, to all governours and officers in their way, for the convenience and security of their passage.

Ptolemy sends Alexander Zebina to make war upon Demetrius.

WHILE matters stood thus with Hyrcanus the high-priest, there was no want of good-will in Demetrius to pick a quarrel with him, if he had but had seconds to stand by him in it; but for the Syrians, and his own soldiers, they hated him to that degree for his lewdness, that they join'd in a confederacy against him, making it their request to Ptolemy, otherwise called Physcon the king of Egypt, only to send them some branch or other of Seleucus's family, and they would make him king. Upon this application, Ptolemy sent them one Alexander, sirnamed Zebina, with a considerable body of men. It came to a battle, and Demetrius being routed, he fled to his wife Cleopatra, who was then at Ptolemais, for protection; but the gates being shut against him, he fled to Tyre, where he fell into the hands of his enemies, who kept him a while in the anguish of a miserable life, and then put him to death.

A league betwixt Alexander and Hyrcanus.

ALEXANDER ZEBINA being now possessed of the kingdom of Syria, enter'd into a league with Hyrcanus the high-priest, who was engaged some short time after, in a war with Antiochus Gryphus, the son of Demetrius. They brought it to a battle, and it was Alexander's hap to be slain in the engagement. Antiochus, by this providence, came to be king of Syria; but durst not as yet make any attempt upon the Jews; for he heard that Antiochus Cyzicenus (a brother he had of his own name) was at that very time drawing an army together against him at the town of Cyzycus. Wherefore without attempting any thing against the Jews, he thought it most advisable to keep himself upon his guard against his brother, who was called Cyzicenus, from the name of the place where he had his education. The father of this man was Antiochus Soter, who lost his life in an expedition against the Parthians. Now Cleopatra, as we have said already, had been wife to the two brothers. Upon the coming of Antiochus Cyzicenus into Syria, the brethren were perpetually at war the one with the other, and Hyrcanus consequently in the possession of a profound peace; for after the slaughter of Antiochus he fell off from the Macedonians, and had no more to do with them, either as an ally, or as a subject. But in the days of Alexander Zebina, affairs prospered with Hyrcanus according to his own heart's content, and more yet in the reign of the two brothers: For while they were harassing one another, Hyrcanus enjoy'd the revenues of Judea to himself, whereby he hoarded up an inestimable mass of treasure; beside that while Cyzicenus lay ravaging the country, on the one hand; and his brother had no relief all this while out of Egypt on the other, he fairly left them to themselves to confound one another; which was the very thing he aimed at, and so despis'd them both.

Hyrcanus besieges Samaria. A miserable famine there. Antiochus Cyzicenus presses to relieve it. Aristobulus puts him to the rout, and then goes back to Samaria to continue the siege. Ptolemy sends Antiochus six thousand Egyptians, that ravage the country of Hyrcanus. Antiochus commits the war to Callimander and Epicrates. The former is routed and slain, and Scythopolis betray'd by the other. Samaria taken and laid waste. Chelcias and Ananias are Cleopatra's confidents and captains. Hyrcanus treats the Pharisees. Eleazar affronts him. Jonathan inflames Hyrcanus against him; whereupon he goes over to the Sadducees. The death of Hyrcanus.

HYRCANUS, under these circumstances, marched with an army up to the strong city of Samaria, call'd Sebaste, after its being rebuilt by Herod, of which we shall say more in convenient time and place. Hyrcanus was so irritated against the Samaritans by the indignities they had put upon the people of Marisa, who were inhabitants and allies of Judea, though subject to the king of Syria, that he resolved to attack the place with all the vigour imaginable. Upon sitting down before it, he begirt the town with a large ditch, and a double wall of eighty * furlongs compass, and gave the conduct of the siege to his sons Antigonus and Aristobulus, who plied it so hard, and kept them in so close, that they were forced by extremity of famine to keep life and soul together with carrion and dogs meat; so that in the end they implor'd the assistance of Antiochus Cyzicenus, who came in all haste upon their request; but being routed by Aristobulus, and pursued by him and his brother as far as Scythopolis, he made a very narrow escape. The brethren, after this action, returned to Samaria, and forcing the people into the town again, renew'd the siege, which put them upon an application to the same Antiochus once again for succour, who prevailed with Ptolemy, sirnamed Lathurus, for a matter of six thousand men; but so much against his mother's will and approbation, that he was within a very little of losing his kingdom for it. With this band of Egyptians, Antiochus went at first ranging and ravaging up and down the country of Hyrcanus, not being at that time in a condition to look him in the face. Now the thing he aim'd at, was by this diversion to draw him from the siege; but what with surprizes, desertions, and other casualties, he found his party in a short time so shrunk and weaken'd, that he committed the charge of the Jewish war to Callimander and Epicrates, and went off from thence himself to Tripoli. Callimander, after this, with more bravery than discretion, ventur'd upon a rash encounter, where his people were wholly cut off, and himself slain: Epicrates at the same time treacherously betraying Scythopolis and several other neighbouring towns there, for money, to the Jews; so that, in fine, there was no possibility of relieving the place. Hyrcanus had been a full year before Samaria when he took it, and it was not enough, he thought, to be master of the city, without razing the very memory of it from off the earth; for he not only made it a heap of rubbish, but drew several trenches of water through it, which so disfigur'd the face of every thing, that there was not the least mark left of any building that had ever been there. There goes a wonderful, if not an incredible story of this same Hyrcanus the high-priest; which says, that upon the day of the battle which his sons had with Cyzicenus, it was revealed to him by a voice from heaven, as he was alone in the temple, and offering incense, that his sons had gotten a fresh victory over Antiochus. He went out immediately, and told the people what he had heard, which was confirm'd a while after beyond all dispute. This was computed to be just upon the precise instant of the success; and let this suffice for the state of things at that time with Hyrcanus.

The Jews prosper every where.

THE Jews found this a favourable season for them, not only at Jerusalem, but at Alexandria also, and the rest of Egypt, Cyprus, &c. For the queen Cleopatra, upon a difference with her son Ptolemy Lathur, committed the command of her troops to Chelcias and Ananias, the sons of that Onias who erected a temple in the territory of Heliopolis, after the platform of that at Jerusalem, of which we have spoken before. These two persons were the queen's advisers and directors in all she did, as we have it upon the credit of Strabo the Cappadocian, in words to this effect:

See Strabo the Cappadocian.

"A great many of those, says he, that either "came formerly with us to Cyprus, or were "sent thither afterward by Cleopatra, imme-"diately quitted the queen's interest, and "went over to Ptolemy; only the Jews that "were of Onias's party, stood firm, out of a "reverence they paid the queen for the re-"spect she shew'd to Chelcias and Ananias, "their friends and countrymen." Thus far Strabo.

Hyrcanus envied by the Jews and Pharisees.

Now the credit and good fortune of Hyrcanus drew upon him, in a high measure, the envy of the Jews, the Pharisees especially, who had no great kindness for him before; but this is a point that I have formerly touch'd upon. The authority of that faction, in fine, is so sacred among the common people, that let them treat their king, or their high-priest, at never so coarse a rate, the multitude would be sure to approve their proceedings. Hyrcanus, however, having been train'd up in that school, and being look'd upon as a person much in their favour, took a fair occasion to invite them to an entertainment, where he treated them with all possible humanity and respect. So soon as good company and good cheer had put them into the humour of a free and open conversation, he took the opportunity to make them a short discourse somewhat to this following effect: "I need not tell you, "says he, my worthy friends, that a man of "your own principles, desires nothing more "than to approve himself acceptable to God; "and just to his neighbour, which is but ac-"cording to the result of your own doctrine; "but if you shall find, however, that I have "in any thing departed from my duty, as it "is your part to admonish and instruct me, I "shall account it mine to amend and reform." This generous candor was received with such applause, that Hyrcanus did not a little value himself upon the reputation of so honourable a testimony.

AFTER some short pause, Eleazar, one of the guests, an ill-natur'd malicious man, stood up and broke silence. "Since you are pleased, "says he to Hyrcanus, to profess yourself so "great a lover of truth and plain dealing, be "but so just also as to lay down your ponti-"ficate, and content yourself with the cha-"racter of your civil administration." "And "I beseech you, says Hyrcanus, why this "proposal?" Because, says the other, we "have been told by our elders, that in the "days of Antiochus Epiphanes, your mother "was a slave." Now the report was false, and so much the more offensive, as well to the Pharisees, as to Hyrcanus himself. There happened to be in the company, one Jonathan, Hyrcanus's particular friend, but a Sadducee, and consequently a mortal enemy to the Pharisees. This Jonathan would needs have it that the calumny of Eleazar was a thing concerted, and that the Pharisees were all privy to it. Now this you will find to be true, says he, if you do but put it to them what punishment they think a man may deserve for so scandalous a defamation. Hyrcanus put the question, to feel how they stood affected, and whether or not they were privy and consenting to the affront. Their answer was, being men generally inclin'd to mercy in such cases, that they did not find defamation to be a capital crime, and so they thought whipping and imprisonment might serve for satisfaction. This way of qualifying the matter put Hyrcanus into a violent passion, and gave him to understand, that they had every one of them their part in this infamous reflection upon his family. Jonathan plied Hyrcanus in this heat, and embitter'd him against the Pharisees to such a degree, that he absolutely renounc'd the sect, and went over to the Sadducees; abrogating all their ordinances and constitutions, with a penalty upon those that should presume to observe them. This was it that put both himself and his sons quite out of credit with the common people, as will be seen in its proper place. We are here to take notice, that the Pharisees had many traditions handed down from father to son, which are not to be found among the laws of Moses. Now these traditions are rejected by the Sadducees, upon a persuasion, that only the written laws are authoritative and binding. We are now come to the very root of the main controversy betwixt the two parties, the Sadducees being supported by men of quality and substance; the Pharisees only by the favour of the multitude. But of these sects, and of the Essenes, a full account may be seen in our history of the Jewish wars, B. II.

The great men side with the Sadducees, and the multitude with the Pharisees.

THE remainder of Hyrcanus's life, after the composing of this sedition, was happy and quiet to the very day of his death, which happened in the year of his government thirty one. He left behind him five sons, and God was pleased to honour him with three eminent dignities; the civil government of the Jews, the high-priesthood, and the spirit of prophecy; foretelling by a divine revelation, that his two eldest sons should not long enjoy the govern-

CHAP. XIX.

Ariſtobulus the eldeſt ſon of Hyrcanus, makes himſelf to be crown'd king. Antigonus, the ſecond brother, is his favourite. He keeps the other three brothers in priſon, and ſtarves his mother. Antigonus is put to death, and his death foretold by one Judas a prophet, both for time and place. Ariſtobulus ſeiz'd with a horror of conſcience, and a vomiting of blood, which he confeſſes to be a juſt judgment upon him.

Ariſtobulus changes the Ariſtocracy into a monarchy.

HYRCANUS being now dead, his eldeſt ſon Ariſtobulus form'd a reſolution of new modelling the government, and turning the principality into an abſolute monarchy; ſetting the crown accordingly upon his own head. This happen'd four hundred and eighty one years and three months after the return of the Jews from the captivity of Babylon. He had ſo great a tenderneſs for Antigonus, his next brother, that he made him a kind of a partner with him in the government. The other three he kept all this while in bonds; caſting his mother into priſon alſo, whom he look'd upon as a rival upon a pretence of claim, Hyrcanus having left her at his death, the miſtreſs of all he could confer upon her. His cruelty, in ſhort, was ſo horrid and unnatural, that he ſtarv'd his mother to death in her confinement, and afterward put his dearly beloved brother and favourite Antigonus himſelf to death, only upon the malicious ſuggeſtions of evil tongues. It was a good while before he would give any heed to thoſe invidious ſtories, in regard both of the affection he had for Antigonus, and that in his conſcience he look'd upon them all to be only the inventions of malevolence and envy; but Antigonus happening once to return from the army in great pomp and glory, juſt upon the ſolemnity of the feaſt of tabernacles, Ariſtobulus at the ſame time lying ſick in his bed, his brother Antigonus went up to the temple, with his guards about him, in mighty ſplendor and ſtate; only upon the account of religious worſhip, and in the firſt place to offer up his prayers and vows for the health of his brother. The fame and reputation of Antigonus, and the magnificence of his parade upon this occaſion, furniſhed as fit matter for a faction of ſycophants and court-paraſites to work upon, as they could wiſh; ſo that they went immediately to the king, with all the virulent pretences and aggravations they could think of. "This was not a beha" viour, they ſaid, that became the condition
" of a private man, but rather a moſt notorious " evidence of a deſign upon the crown; and
" that the guards he had then about him,
" would in a ſhort time advance from this in-
" vaſion upon his royalty, to a violence upon
" his perſon; and he was not ſo impolitick
" neither as to ſtop at a part of the govern" ment, when he might have it whole to him-
" ſelf." Ariſtobulus was ſo divided betwixt the fear of being either too ſecure, or too credulous, that though he could not believe every thing they told him, he could not yet but ſuſpect there might be ſomething in it upon the main, and ſo took a middle courſe of providing for his ſafety, without ſeeming to be jealous of any danger. He had his apartment in a tower that hath been ſince known by the name of Antonia, where he poſted a guard in a dark place under ground, with particular orders, that they ſhould watch his brother in his paſſage, and that if he came without arms, no body ſhould meddle with him; but if he came armed, they ſhould kill him. So Ariſtobulus ſent for his brother to come to him, charging the meſſenger to bid him come without arms; but the queen, and the reſt of the conſpirators tamper'd with the meſſenger, and bad him tell Antigonus on the contrary, that his brother had heard of a very brave ſuit of armour he had gotten, and that he had a great mind to ſee how they became him. Antigonus depending wholly upon the good faith of his brother, and ſuſpecting no treachery, went immediately armed, juſt as the meſſenger found him, to ſhew himſelf. Upon his coming to the tower of Straton, the ſoldiers fell upon him in a dark paſſage, and ſlew him. This diſaſter may ſuffice to ſhew the force of envy and ſlander, and how the very beſt of natures may be corrupted by thoſe temptations. But the moſt wonderful circumſtance of all was the prediction of one Judas, a famous prophet of thoſe times, whoſe preſages never fail'd. This Judas, upon the ſight of Antigonus, coming to the temple, broke out into exclamations among his diſciples, that he was now weary of his life; for Antigonus, whoſe death he had preſag'd upon that very day at Straton's tower, was yet alive; the place ſix * hundred furlongs off, and the day more than half ſpent; ſo that he had utterly loſt the credit of a prophet for ever. While he was in this perplexity for the reputation of his oracle, came the news of Antigonus's being ſlain in a ſubterranean paſſage under the tower. Now this was call'd Straton's tower, it ſeems, as well as that upon the coaſt, which was afterwards known by the name of Ceſarea; and this ſalvo ſet the prophet right again.

THE thought of this execrable murder wrought upon Ariſtobulus immediately a conſcientious deteſtation of the fact, and enflamed his diſtemper, inſomuch that his agonies increaſing upon him, he fell at laſt into a vomiting of blood; and as one of his ſervants was carrying part of it away in a baſon, by a ſtrange providence he made a ſtumble upon the way, and ſpilt it upon the very blood of his maſter's brother. There was ſuch an outcry upon this accident, (as if the ſervant had done it on purpoſe,) that Ariſtobulus himſelf over-hearing it, could not be eaſy till they told him the meaning of it; and the more unwilling they were of owning the truth, the more eager was he to know it, as men are naturally more curious in ſuch caſes. But in the concluſion, betwixt importunity and menace, he extorted it from them, and in the horror of an afflicted conſcience, enter'd with groans and tears into an anxious expoſtulation upon it to this purpoſe: " No, no, ſays he, the " all-ſeeing eye of God hath found me out
" in my wickedneſs, and my brother's blood
" hath already brought down a vengeance up-

He had no sooner uttered these words than he gave up the ghost, having govern'd only one year, under the surname of Philellen; that is to say, A lover of the Greeks. He brought many advantages to his country; made war upon Iturea, and laid a considerable part of it to the territory of Judea, forcing the people, upon pain of banishment, to submit to circumcision, and to live in a conformity to the other rites and practices of the Jews. He was accounted to be otherwise a person of modesty and justice, as Strabo vouches for him out of Timagenes, in these words: " He was a " righteous man, and in many respects a friend

CHAP. XX.

Salome, the widow of Aristobulus, sets the three brothers at liberty, and places Janneus Alexander upon the throne. Alexander puts one of his brothers to death, and provides for the other. He besieges Ptolemais: Ptolemy Lathur advances to relieve them; but they shut their gates upon him. Alexander quits the siege, and plays a politick game betwixt the interest of Cleopatra and Ptolemy. Ptolemy sets down before Ptolemais, and takes the city Azochis by assault.

Salome sets the three brothers at liberty, and advances the eldest to the throne.

AFTER the death of Aristobulus, his wife Salome, (by the Greeks called Alexandria) set the brothers at liberty, whom her husband had made prisoners (of which already) and placed Janneus, otherwise called Alexander, upon the throne; the eldest, and the most temperate of the three. It was his ill hap to incur his father's aversion, almost as soon as he was born, to the degree of not being suffer'd to appear in his sight. The reason, they say, was this: Hyrcanus had a dream one night of God's appearing to him, and that upon his enquiry who should succeed him in the government, he was answered with the lively representation of the person, and so the vision disappear'd. Aristobulus and Antigonus were his favourites; and Hyrcanus finding that neither of them was design'd by this figure, he apply'd it to Alexander, under the affliction of a double disappointment, in regard both of the dignity and of the fortune, falling, as he accounted it, into a wrong hand. Upon this occasion, Alexander was sent away to be brought up in Galilee; but the event however answer'd the prediction; for Alexander, upon the death of Aristobulus, enter'd upon the administration; and taking off one of his brothers that would have supplanted him, treated the other with great honour in the contented state of a private life.

Hyrcanus contracts a mortal aversion for Alexander, upon a dream.

Alexander puts off one of his brothers, and provides for the other.

So soon as he had settled the state to his mind, he marched with an army to Ptolemais, where he encounter'd a body of the enemy in the field; beat them into the town, and then coop'd them up in it. There was only this place and Gaza, of all the sea-coast towns that stood out, beside Dora, and the tower of Straton, in the hands of Zoilus. As for Antiochus Philometor, and his brother Antiochus Cyzicenus, they were so engaged and wasted in a war one with another, that there was no thought of any relief to the people of Ptolemais from them. But Zoilus, that play'd his own game all this while, and lay upon the catch to make advantage of these divisions, sent them some sort of assistance, though not much to the purpose. It was at this time with the two enemy-kings as it is with a couple of sword-men fighting a prize: they were so intent upon cutting one another down, that they never thought of any thing else; and let them be never so much batter'd and weary'd, there must be no yielding at last; but when they have fought as long as they can stand, their way is to lie down by consent to take breath, and to it again. The besieged, in fine, had no prospect of any hope or possibility of relief, but from Egypt, and especially from Ptolemy Lathur, that had been driven out of his kingdom by his mother Cleopatra, and was now withdrawn into Cyprus: so that they presently sent away embassadors to Ptolemy to desire his aid against Alexander; making no doubt, they said, but as soon as ever he should set foot in Syria, the people of Gaza and Ptolemais would all declare in his favour; beside that, Zoilus, the Sidonians, and other people thereabouts, would be sure to join with him over and above. The king was so elevated with these assurances, that he sent his people immediately upon the equipping of a fleet for the expedition: but while this was a doing, one Demenetus, a person of great credit with the citizens of Ptolemais, brought the people, upon second thoughts, to a better understanding of the matter, by reasoning with them about it after this manner. " The question, says he, in " short, will be this; whether you had not " better stand to the fate of the war you are en-
" gag'd in with the Jews, and venture the " uncertain issue of it, than by calling in and " delivering yourselves up to the protection of
" a foreign power, to incur a certain slavery;
" and not only become involved in a present
" broil, but run the risque of a more dangerous
" incumbrance that threatens you from Egypt;
" for you cannot think that Cleopatra will " ever stand still, to see Ptolemy form his " troops into a body; but the queen will ra" ther get beforehand with him, and have a " potent army at his back, before he is ready
" for it; beside the hazard he runs of being " driven out of Cyprus too. Or to take it an" other way; suppose Ptolemy should fail in " his design, and be forced back again to Cy" prus, there are you left to shift for your-

An embassy to Ptolemy Lathur for relief.

Ptolemy upon this equips a great fleet.

Demenetus puts off the people from treating with Ptolemy.

THIS discourse brought them quite off from their opinion of the embassy, and Ptolemy was told as much at sea upon his passage; but however, since he was now in motion, he continu'd his course to Sycamin, where he landed an army of about thirty thousand horse and foot, marching thence to Ptolemais, with an intent to send an embassy to the city; but when he found that they would have nothing to do with him, either by message, or by word of mouth,

Ptolemy lands with 30000 horse and foot; but citizens will have nothing to do with him.

it put him to his wits end what to do next. While he was in this perplexity, there came to him Zoilus, and ſome deputies from Gaza, to implore his help againſt the Jews and Alexander, that were making havock in their country. Alexander, upon this, was forc'd to raiſe the ſiege for fear of Ptolemy: and when he ſaw there was no good to be done by downright force, he marched his army back again, and betaking himſelf to his politicks, play'd his game another way. He treated with Cleopatra under-hand againſt Ptolemy, and at the ſame time kept fair with Ptolemy, in appearance, under the countenance of a friend and an ally; propoſing to give him four * hundred talents of ſilver, upon condition of delivering up the uſurper Zoilus into his hands, and reſtoring to the Jews thoſe lands of theirs, which he had in poſſeſſion. Ptolemy, without any heſitation, embraced the friendſhip of Alexander, and ſeized upon Zoilus; but coming to underſtand, that there was an intrigue carry'd on all this while betwixt Alexander and Cleopatra, he look'd upon the league as broken, and without more ado, laid ſiege to Ptolemais, where the gates were ſhut againſt him. Upon this, he divided his army, leaving one part of it before the town to make good the ſiege, and marching off with the remainder of it himſelf, to deſtroy the country of Judea. Now, Alexander, on the other hand, to encounter this deſign of Ptolemy, levy'd an army of his own people; ſome ſay of fifty, others of eighty thouſand men, and ſo advanced with it againſt the enemy. Ptolemy, in the mean time, taking the advantage of a ſabbath-day, fell upon Aſochis, a city of Galilee, at unawares, and took it by aſſault with about ten thouſand priſoners, and a vaſt booty.

Alexander quits the ſiege, and betakes himſelf to ſtratagems.

AFTER the taking of Aſochis, Ptolemy went and attack'd Sepphoris, a place a little way off; where he was repulſed with a conſiderable loſs, and from thence marched directly away to try a battle with Alexander, whom he found about * Aſophus near the river Jordan, and encamped juſt over againſt the enemy. Alexander had in his van eight thouſand of thoſe they call Hecatontomachi, armed with brazen bucklers, and Ptolemy's men in the front had the ſame ſort of ſhields; but the generality of his people not being ſo well armed as their adverſaries, were not over-eager of engaging, till one Philoſtephanus, an excellent officer who had the ordering of them, and underſtood ranging an army perfectly well, led them on and encourag'd them. The firſt word of command was to paſs the river that parted the two armies; which Alexander did not pretend to oppoſe, in confidence of getting the day, if he could but engage the enemy with river behind them to cut off their retreat. When it came to the ſhock, the fortune of the battle was a while doubtful, and it was fought with great loſs on both ſides; till (upon the ſhrinking of a diviſion of Ptolemy's) the victory ſeemed to incline to Alexander: But Philoſtephanus coming up to their relief with a ſeaſonable enforcement, that wing of the Jews was overlaid by numbers, and broken; and no ſuccour appearing, they were forced to ſhift for themſelves, and the whole field preſently followed their example; Ptolemy's men preſſing ſo hard upon the fugitives that their arms were tir'd, and their ſwords blunted with the execution. They ſpeak of thirty thouſand men ſlain in that battle. Timagenes in his hiſtory makes them to be fifty; the reſt either taken priſoners, or ſaving themſelves by flight.

Alexander put to the rout, with the loſs of 30000 men.

AFTER the purſuit of this bloody victory as far as mercileſs rage and day-light could carry it, Ptolemy, in the evening, went into ſome of the Jews villages and habitations; and finding them well ſtock'd and crowded with women and children, order'd his ſoldiers to cut their throats, one with another, promiſcuouſly, and then hack them into goblets and quarters, and ſo boil them in pots and kettles over the fire, for a terror to thoſe that eſcap'd from the battle, when they ſhould find themſelves fallen into the hands of an enemy that liv'd upon human fleſh. Strabo and Nicolaus make mention of this barbarous cruelty. The ſame people took Ptolemais alſo by aſſault, as we have ſaid elſewhere.

CLEOPATRA was ſo ſenſible of the overgrown greatneſs of her ſon, he having reduced Gaza, and laid waſte the land of Judea, that ſhe thought it now high time to put a ſtop to his ambition; eſpecially being come to the gates of Egypt itſelf, with a deſign upon the kingdom too. Upon this precaution, ſhe muſter'd without any delay, all the ſtrength ſhe was able to make, both at ſea and land; conſtituting Chelcias and Ananias, two Jews, for generals. She ſent the greateſt part of her treaſure with her grandchildren, and her laſt will and teſtament into the iſle of Coas; and order'd her ſon Alexander with a powerful navy into Phenicia, to keep that province in obedience, while ſhe herſelf went to Ptolemais; and being refuſed admittance, ſhe order'd an aſſault upon the town. Ptolemy forced quite away out of Egypt.

UPON Ptolemy's miſcarriage in this attempt upon Egypt, the queen ſent a ſtrong detachment after him, that drove him quite out of his country, now a ſecond time, and forced him to take up his winter-quarters in Gaza: ſhe herſelf, in the mean time, taking the city and gariſon of Ptolemais by aſſault, where ſhe was highly preſented by Alexander, and the preſenter alſo received with a dignity becoming ſo great and generous a queen, to an unfortunate prince under the perſecution and oppreſſion of a common enemy, and that had no other ſanctuary to repair to. Some of the queen's friends were for perſuading her to follow different meaſures, ſuggeſting to her to make the beſt advantage of her opportunity, by ſeizing Alexander, urging how impolitick it would be to leave ſuch a number of Jews under the command of one ſingle man: but Ananias loudly declaim'd againſt the unreaſonableneſs of ſuch a proceeding, as highly injurious to all the ties and duties of hoſpitality and common faith; eſpecially to a friend and a kinſman, under ſo ſacred a truſt: beſide, that one ſuch act of injuſtice would turn againſt her the hearts of all the honeſt Jews upon the face of the earth. The queen was ſo mightily pleaſed with this plain-dealing ſimplicity of Ananias, that ſhe did not only forbear preſſing any thing that was hard upon Alexander, but renew'd a league of friendſhip with him, at Scythopolis, a city of Cele-Syria.

NO ſooner did Alexander find himſelf out of the power and fear of Ptolemy, but he immediately undertook an expedition into Cele-Syria; where, after a ſiege of ten months, he took Gadara, and after that, Amathus, by much the ſtrongeſt fort upon the river Jordan, and the place where Theodorus the ſon of Zeno, in an outrage of revenge, fell upon the Jews by ſurprize, cut off ten thouſand of their men, and took Alexander's baggage: but this unexpected diſaſter did not yet divert the king from his deſign upon Raphia, a ſea-coaſt town, and Anthedon, which was afterwards by Herod called Agrippiades; both which he reduced by force. Ptolemy had by this time left Gaza, and betaken himſelf again to Cyprus, his mother Cleopatra alſo being gone back to Egypt: ſo that Alexander took this occaſion of revenging himſelf upon the people of Gaza for calling in Ptolemy to their ſuccour againſt him; laid ſiege to the town, and at the ſame time ravaged their country. While Alexander was before the place, Apollodotus their commander made a ſtout ſally one night with two thouſand mercenaries, and ten thouſand of the citizens well armed, upon the camp of the Jews; and ſo long as it was dark, the beſieged had the better of it, upon an apprehenſion of Ptolemy's being come up with relief: but ſo ſoon as ever they had day-light to ſhew them the truth of the matter, the Jews rally'd, and made ſo furious a charge upon the gariſon, that they deſtroy'd a thouſand of their men: but the courage of theſe people was proof ſtill againſt all the difficulties of number, force, nay, and famine itſelf; being reſolved among themſelves rather to abide all extremities, than to ſhrink, or yield to an enemy. And for a further encouragement to this obſtinacy, they were held in hand by Aretas an Arabian king, with the promiſe of a timely ſuccour. But all came to nothing; for before any ſupply could be brought, Apollodotus was kill'd, and the town taken. This Apollodotus was murder'd by the hand of Lyſimachus, his own brother, out of mere ſpite and envy, for the reputation he had gained among the people. After the fact committed, he got a party together, and ſo deliver'd up the city to Alexander. This prince, upon his firſt entrance, behaved himſelf as if he meant them nothing but moderation, good-will, and fair quarter. But this peaceable humour did not laſt long, for he turn'd his ſoldiers looſe among them immediately after, with a commiſſion at large to kill, burn, and deſtroy at pleaſure. This licence they extended to a direct maſſacre, though it coſt them dear enough too; for there died as many of the Jews, as of the townſmen. Some, in ſhort, ſet fire to their own houſes, that the enemy might not be the better for them; others laid violent hands upon their very wives and children, chuſing rather to have them die free, than live ſlaves. The magiſtracy of the town happen'd to be in council when theſe barbarous troops came into the city, and the ſenators, to the number of five hundred, fled immediately to the temple of Apollo for ſanctuary; but they were all ſlaughter'd to a man, the town ſack'd and levell'd; and Alexander, after a year ſpent before it, returned to Jeruſalem.

MUCH about this time it was that Antiochus, otherwiſe called Gryphus, was kill'd by the treachery of Heracleon, in the year of his life forty five, and the nine and twentieth of his reign. His ſon Seleucus ſucceeded him, who waged war with his uncle Antiochus, call'd Cyzicenus, whom he worſted and took priſoner in a battle, and put him to death. Antiochus, the ſon of Cyzicenus, whoſe ſirname was Euſebes, came a while after to Arad, where he was crown'd; and making war after this, upon Seleucus, he beat him at one battle out of all Syria, whence he fled for ſafety to Celicia: And in requital for the protection he receiv'd among the Mopſeates, he laid heavy taxes and impoſitions upon them, which they took in ſuch indignation, that they put fire to his palace, and burnt maſter and ſervants all together alive.

WHILE Antiochus Cyzicenus was in poſſeſſion of the government of Syria, there was another Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, who made war upon him, wherein he loſt his life and his army; after which his brother Philip took the crown to himſelf, and govern'd part of Syria. Ptolemy Lathur upon this ſent for his fourth brother Demetrius Eucerus, to Gnidus, whom he conſtituted king of Damaſcus. THERE was about this time a moſt ſeditious affront put upon Alexander by his own people. It was a cuſtomary thing among the Jews to march with boughs of citron or palm-trees in their hands upon the celebration of the feaſt of tabernacles, and as Alexander was upon his preparation to ſacrifice, and aſſiſt at the ſolemnity, the multitude fell to pelting him with citrons, and with ſuch provoking language of ſlave, and the like, that in a rage he cauſed a matter of ſix thouſand of them to be put to death, and was forced to ſet up a partition of wood about the temple and the altar, to the very place where only the prieſts were admitted, to keep off the crowd. He made uſe of Piſidians and Cilicians for his mercenaries; but for the Syrians, he did not love them, and durſt not truſt them. He got the better, in fine, of the Arabians; laid the Moabites and Galaadites under contribution, and deſtroy'd Amathus without the leaſt oppoſition from Theodorus. He made war alſo upon Obed the king of Arabia, but falling into an ambuſh near Gadara in Galilee, he was forced by a preſs of camels into the mouth of a narrow craggy paſſage; from whence, with infinite difficulty, he made a ſhift to clear himſelf, and ſo got ſafe to Jeruſalem. This diſaſter of Alexander's was follow'd with a ſix years rebellion, which coſt the Jews no leſs than fifty thouſand lives. The king was weary of the war, and would fain have been at quiet; but the more he ſought for a reconciliation, the further were they from it; inſomuch, that asking them at laſt what it was poſſible for him to do to content them, they bad him with one voice cut his own throat; and thereupon he invited Demetrius Eucerus to their aid.

Demetrius Eucerus marches againſt Alexander, and defeats him in a battle. His auxiliaries are all ſlain to a man. Six thouſand Jews repair to him in the mountains. Demetrius retires, and the Jews make head againſt Alexander, who ſhuts them up in Bethama, and carries them priſoners to Jeruſalem. Eight hundred Jews put to death for a ſpectacle. Alexander nick-nam'd Thracidas, for his butcherly cruelty. Philip beſieg'd in Berea by his brother Demetrius, who is himſelf aſſaulted in his camp by Zizus and Mithridates, and carried away priſoner to the king of the Parthians. Demetrius dies, and his brother Philip enters upon the government of Syria.

DEmetrius Eucerus, in conjunction with thoſe who called him in, marched to their aſſiſtance with an army of three thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand foot, and encamped near Sichem, where Alexander, with about ſix thouſand and two hundred foreign mercenaries, and ſome twenty thouſand of his own faction, went out to meet him. The armies being now drawn up, it came to a trial of skill upon the point of ſtratagem and addreſs betwixt the two parties, whether Demetrius could bring over more of Alexander's foreigners to him, (being all Greeks,) or Alexander, on the other hand, gain over more of Demetrius's Jews to himſelf. They ſpent ſome time in making uſe of this ſort of policy, but finding that there was no good to be done on either hand that way, they brought it to a battle, and Demetrius got the day; Alexander's auxiliaries doing as much however as it was poſſible for brave men to do; for they died every ſoul of them upon the ſpot with ſword in hand; and the loſs on the other ſide was alſo very conſiderable. Alexander, upon this defeat, was forced to fly to the mountains for refuge; where, by a ſtrange turn of compaſſion for his misfortune, a matter of ſix thouſand Jews came up to him, and join'd him. Demetrius took ſuch an apprehenſion at this enforcement, and the inclinations of the people, that he preſently quitted, and retir'd. But the Jews, after all this, ſtood their ground ſtill, nevertheleſs, and carried on the war againſt Alexander upon the ſtock of their own reſolution and credit; notwithſtanding that they were perpetually baffled and cut to pieces as often as they fought. They were forced in the concluſion, with the beſt of their men, to betake themſelves to Bethama for protection, where Alexander coop'd them up; and taking the town, carried the people priſoners to Jeruſalem, where he committed the moſt execrable barbarities that can be imagin'd. As he was feaſting himſelf, and his concubines, in a turret that had the advantage of a large proſpect, he made it part of his entertainment, to treat his company with the ſpectacle of the gibbeting of eight hundred Jews, with their wives and children, and the cutting of their throats in the ſight of one another yet living. It was a terrible provocation, 'tis true, for ſubjects not only to rebel, but to join alſo with ſtrangers againſt their lawful prince, to the extreme hazard of his life and dignity, as this was the caſe; and then to reduce him at laſt to the neceſſity of giving up again to the king of Arabia, what he had taken from the Moabites and Galaadites, as a compoſition not to aſſiſt his revolted ſubjects againſt him; to ſay nothing of other outrages innumerable of the ſame kind. Theſe were all very great provocations, but not ſufficient yet to warrant ſo unnatural an inhumanity. The rigour, in ſhort, was ſo deteſtable, that the Jews gave Alexander the name of * Thracidas for it. There were about eight thouſand of the army, however, that made a ſhift to get away by night, and ſpent their days afterward in a kind of baniſhment, ſo long as Alexander liv'd; but this tumult once over, he had a peaceable reign of it ever after.

DEMETRIUS went from Judea to Berea, where his brother PhIlip was, and with an army of ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, laid ſiege to the town. Straton, the prince of the place, and a friend of Philip's, called in to his aſſiſtance Zizus an Arabian prince, and Mithridates Sinaces, the Parthian general, who with a powerful army attack'd Demetrius, and diſtreſs'd him ſo hard both with darts and arrows, and with drought for want of water, that Demetrius with his people were forced to surrender, himself being kept a prisoner, and afterwards sent for a present to Mithridates, a Parthian king. What Antiochians were found in the tents, were left at liberty to go back to Antioch. The king of Parthia treated Demetrius with great honour and respect; but he soon after fell sick, and died. Alexander deplores her condition to her husband, who advises her to cast herself wholly upon the Pharisees, and so he dies.*

ANTIOCHUS, otherwise call'd Dionysius, and the brother of Philip, took the opportunity of his brother's being then engaged with his army in an expedition against the Parthians; and having an eye upon Damascus, got possession of the place, and himself declared king there. The tidings of this adventure brought his brother Philip immediately in all haste to Damascus, where, by a secret intelligence with Milesius, the governor of the fort, he was quietly received into the town; but to disguise the matter, he gave the officer no reward, for fear he should be thought to come in rather by treachery, than by the force of his authority and credit; but Milesius was even with him for it afterward; for Philip being abroad once at the Circus for his exercise and diversion, Milesius shut the gates upon him, and reserv'd the city for Antiochus; who, upon the first news of it, posted instantly back again out of Arabia, and with an army of eight thousand foot, and eight hundred horse, marched directly into Judea. Alexander, upon this incursion, drew a large and deep ditch from Caparsaba, now called Antipatris, up to the very sea of Joppa, which was the only accessible way to the town. He erected a wall also with intervals of several wooden towers, which he carried on for an hundred and fifty * furlongs in length, and there he waited for Antiochus, who, without more ado, set fire to these wooden contrivances, and so pass'd his army into Arabia, where the enemy gave way upon the first encounter; but advancing afterward with a body of ten thousand horse, Antiochus charging in directly upon them, it came to a bloody dispute; but pressing in too eagerly to the relief of one of his wings that he found over-power'd, it was his fortune to be kill'd, when he was as good as sure of the victory. The death of the general discouraged the hearts of the whole army, who instantly upon his fall fled in a rout to Cana, where the greater part of them perish'd for want of bread.

ARETAS next obtain'd the government of Cele-Syria, being call'd and invited thereto by the people of Damascus, out of a pure spite and opposition to Ptolemy the son of Menneus. He enter'd Judea with an army, overthrew Alexander near Addida; and then upon conditions betwixt them two, return'd back from whence they came.

Aretas succeeds to the government of Cele-Syria.

ALEXANDER went on, and took Dion by assault; marching thence to Esla, where Zeno's treasure lay, and all he had that was rich and precious. He ran first three walls about it, and then made himself master of it by storm, as he did afterwards of Gaulana, and Seleucia, the vale of Antiochus, and the fortress of Gamala. And in regard that there were many grievous misdemeanors laid to the charge of Demetrius, formerly the master of these places, he divested him of his royal authority. When he had spent some three years in this course of action, he carried his army back again, to the great satisfaction of the Jews, in regard that they saw every thing succeeded so well in his hands.

Alexander takes Dion, Essa, and afterwards Gaulana, Seleucia, the vale of Antiochus and Gamala.

THE Jews were at that time in possession of Syria, Idumea, and Phenicia; the tower of Straton upon the sea, Apollonia, Joppa, Jamnia, Azotus, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, Rhinocura; and in the midland, of Idumea, Adora, and Marissa; all Samaria, and the mountains of Carmel and Itabyr. And beside these, of Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulanitis, Seleucia, and * Gabala. And in the land of the Moabites, of Essebon, Medaba, Lemba, Oron, Telithon, Zara; and in Cilicia, Aulon and Pella. This last they demolished for refusing to conform to the laws and customs of the Jews. They had likewise other considerable places in Syria, that came but lately to be under their jurisdiction.

The Jews have a large command.

Pella demolished.

ALEXANDER deliver'd up himself toward the end of his reign, to intemperance and debauch, and drank himself into a quartan ague, that held him for full three years; but yet at the same time he attended the affairs both of his army and government, which betwixt the distemper of his wine, and the fatigue of his cares, brought him quickly to his end. He died upon the frontiers of the Gerasens, at the siege of the castle of Ragaba, on the further side of the river Jordan.

Alexander, betwixt debauch and fatigue, dies of a quartan ague before Ragaba.

WHEN the queen Alexandra found him reduced to the last extremity, and out of all hope of recovery, she fell into a passionate transport of weeping, beating her breasts, and lamenting the miserable condition of herself and children, in terms to this effect: "Alas, "my dear, says she, what will become of "your poor helpless wife and children now, "without so much as one friend in the world "to trust to, and left in the hands too of "your mortal enemies." As soon as he had given this advice to his wife he died, in the nine and fortieth year of his age, and the twenty seventh of his reign.

Hyrcanus is made high-priest. The Pharisees govern in the queen's name. Aristobulus remonstrates against them. Hyrcanus and the elders complain of him to the queen. The death and character of Alexandra.*

SO soon as the castle was taken, Alexandra applied herself immediately to the Pharisees, according to her husband's directions, leaving the whole affair of the body, and of the government, to their disposal. Upon this insinuation, the Pharisees, who before had been the greatest enemies she had in the world, became her greatest friends; addressing themselves presently in an harangue to the people upon the glorious exploits of Alexander, the irreparable loss of so just a prince; and by these rhetorical flourishes of condoling, rais'd the passions of the multitude to such an extreme pitch of sorrow, that they thought him worthy of a funeral solemnity beyond all that ever went before him.

Alexandra commits all to the Pharisees.

THIS prince left at his death two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, but devolved the regency by his last testament to his wife Alexandra. Hyrcanus, the elder brother, was a lover of his ease, and a man not qualified for the cares and administration of publick affairs. Aristobulus, on the contrary, was naturally daring and industrious; but the mother all this while was the favourite of the people, for the dislike she shew'd in her husband's life-time to his male-administration. By her assistance and advice, Hyrcanus was promoted to the pontificate, not for seniority or parts, but upon the account of his natural indolence. Upon the whole matter, the queen did but execute the Pharisees orders; and at the same time when she sign'd and seal'd, the other govern'd; nay, and the common people had it in charge to pay them all obedience. She appointed also the revival of the Pharisees ordinances and traditions, which her father-in-law had aboliſh'd; and at this rate every thing was done in the queen's name by the others power; for at their instance exiles were recall'd, prisoners set at liberty, and the like. In some few cases, 'tis true, she acted by her own proper authority; that is to say, she kept a mercenary army in pay, and augmented her forces to such a degree, that the kings, her neighbours, stood in awe of her, as appear'd by the security they gave her in hostages for their good behaviour. Her reign, in short, would have been quiet enough, but for the troublesome importunities of the Pharisees, that would still be putting her upon one mischief or another. As when they press'd her for justice upon those that advised the death of the eight hundred persons before mentioned; upon which instigation, Diogenes was cut off in the first place, and so one after another, till at last several of the most eminent men concern'd went directly in a body to the queen herself, with Aristobulus at the head of them, who shew'd in his countenance, the disgust he had at such proceedings, and that he wanted only power and opportunity to bring his mother to reason. His followers took this occasion of remonstrating to the queen, what proofs they had given their late master of their faith and loyalty, through all extremities and hazards, acknowledging also the generous returns they had received in honours and rewards for their services; and they were now in hopes, they said, that all this should not be turn'd to their disadvantage; and after escaping the swords of their enemies in an open war, to be deliver'd up for sacrifices like beasts, to the malice of treacherous enemies at home in a time of peace, and there to perish without any manner of redress. Nay, they said further, that if their adversaries would but stop there, and content themſelves with the blood they had ſpilt already, ſuch was the reverence they had for their ſuperiors, that they would patiently ſit down without ſo much as complaining of any thing that was paſt; but if they ſhould be allowed ſtill to perſiſt, they would only beg leave to withdraw, which, without the queen's permiſſion, they durſt not preſume to do, though they were ſure otherwiſe to loſe their lives, even in the palace itſelf: To ſay nothing how highly it would reflect upon her majeſty's honour to countenance the ſworn enemies of her dead husband, againſt his tried friends: or how welcome a hearing it would be to Aretas the Arabian, and other enemy princes, to find that Alexandra had clear'd her court of a ſort of a people, whoſe very names had been formerly a terror to them. But, ſaid they further to the queen, if this be yet too much, and that you are abſolutely reſolv'd to indulge the pride and ambition of the Phariſees, in preference to all other conſiderations, you may be pleaſed to diſpoſe of us only into caſtles and gariſons elſewhere; for if this be the fate that attends Alexander's friends, we ſhall be content for the remaining part of our lives to live in privacy and obſcurity.

THESE words and many more to the ſame purpoſe, drew tears from all that were there preſent, partly out of grief for thoſe that were ſlain already, and partly out of an apprehenſion for the reſt that were yet in danger, calling out, in general, upon the ghoſt of Alexander. There was no man ſpoke ſo freely as Ariſtobulus, both upon the main cauſe, and in particular reflections upon his mother. But all this was their own fault at laſt, in gratifying the impetuous paſſion of a malicious woman againſt all right and reaſon, with the reins of government, eſpecially where there was no danger of a failure for want of a ſucceſſor.

Alexandra puts Ariſtobulus in poſſeſſion of ſeveral ſtrong places, ſaving three caſtles to herſelf.

THE queen was ſo hard put to it for an anſwer to theſe expoſtulatory propoſals, that ſhe could not do better than to put the malecontents into ſtrong holds and gariſons, upon condition that Hyrcania, Alexandrias, and Macherus, where ſhe depoſited her jewels, treaſure, and rich goods, might be none of them. She ſent her ſon Ariſtobulus a little while after this, with an army toward Damaſcus againſt Ptolemy, ſirnamed Menneus, a very troubleſome prince to his neighbours; but he returned ſoon after from that expedition, without doing any thing of moment.

Tigranes threatens Judea with an army of five hundred thouſand men.

WHILE things were in this poſture, came a report that Tigranes the king of Armenia was fallen into Syria with an army of five hundred thouſand men, and with a deſign to march ſuddenly into Judea. Alexandra was ſo ſurpriz'd at this intelligence, (as indeed ſhe had reaſon to be,) that ſhe forthwith ſent ambaſſadors with a compliment and preſents to Tigranes, who was at that time before Ptolemais. The queen Selene, otherwiſe called Cleopatra, who had then the government of Syria, animating her ſubjects to ſtand upon their guard, and to oppoſe Tigranes's entrance into the country. The ambaſſadors acquitted themſelves ſo well toward the king on the behalf of Alexandra and the whole nation of the Jews, that with great inſtances of acknowledgment and good-will for the honour and reſpect of the embaſſy, (and at ſuch a diſtance too,) he gave them an aſſurance of all good offices in return. In ſhort, he took Ptolemais, and was no ſooner maſter of it, but word was brought him of the rout of Mithridates by Lucullus, his eſcape upon the purſuit into Iberia; and that when Lucullus ſaw he could not overtake him, he ſtruck off into Armenia, where he was at that time ravaging and deſtroying the country. Upon this intelligence, Tigranes immediately marched off with his army, and returned home again.

Tigranes goes home again.

THE queen Alexandra fell ſome time after this into a dangerous fit of ſickneſs, which gave Ariſtobulus as fair an opportunity of playing his own game as his heart could wiſh; ſo that ſlipping out in the night, attended only by one ſervant, he arriv'd privately at the forts and caſtles, where his father's friends were in gariſon, as hath been ſaid already. Ariſtobulus had been a long time very much unſatisfied with his mother's way of government; but conſidering her preſent indiſpoſition, and the danger of the whole family's lying at the mercy of the Phariſees, in caſe of her death; Hyrcanus, the next in ſucceſſion, being their property and creature to all manner of purpoſes, and utterly unqualified for the exerciſe of any publick charge, he found himſelf more uneaſy under theſe circumſtances than ever. No mortal knew any thing of his deſign but his own wife, whom he left behind him at Jeruſalem, with his children, and ſo went to Agada, where he was very generouſly received by Galeſtes, a perſon of eminent quality there. Alexandra miſs'd him the very next day after his departure, but not ſo much as ſuſpecting what he was about, till they came to underſtand by one meſſenger after another, that this, and that, and t'other fortreſs were gone over to him; and there was no more in it at laſt neither, than as one led the way, for the reſt to follow. This turn put the queen and the people into a deſperate confuſion; for they look'd upon Ariſtobulus as a perſon likely enough to ſet up for himſelf, and in as fair a poſſibility of carrying his point; beſide the diſmal apprehenſion of being call'd to a bloody account for the outrageous barbarities they had committed upon ſeveral of his particular friends. In this conſternation they could think of no better expedient than to ſecure the wife and children of Ariſtobulus under a guard in the citadel, near the temple. While this was in agitation, the people came flocking to him in ſuch throngs, that there ſeemed to be ſomething in it, both of the tumult, and of the pomp of a court. In ſhort, in fifteen days he made himſelf maſter of two and twenty caſtles; and when he had thus ſecured himſelf, both of a ſtand and a retreat, he quickly got an army together from Mount Libanus, Trachonitis, and the princes thereabouts, who were forward enough upon this occaſion to help the ſtronger ſide, in a proſpect of the advantages they might reaſonably expect for the ſervice of raiſing a new king to the throne. Upon this pinch of affairs, Hyrcanus and the elders of the Jews applied themſelves to the queen for advice and directions what to do. They told her that Ariſtobulus, by virtue of the places he had already taken, was as good as maſter of all the reſt; that they found her, to their great grief, in extremity; but, however, ſo long as ſhe liv'd they could do nothing without her, ever tho' they they ſaw themſelves upon the very brink of ruin. The queen's reply was, "That not "being in condition either of body or mind "to charge herſelf with the publick, ſhe had "laid all thoſe cares aſide, and remitted it "wholly to themſelves, to conſult the ne-"ceſſities of the government. They had the "means of defence, ſhe told them, in their "own hands, the ſtrength of the nation en-"tire, and wanted neither men nor money." Theſe were her laſt words; and ſoon after ſhe died, in the ninth year of her reign, and the ſeventy third of her life.

The death and character of Alexandra.

THIS princeſs was a woman of a character even above her ſex, ambitious both of honour and of command, beyond meaſure; but withal, intent upon her buſineſs, and highly induſtrious, to the reproach of the ignorance and male-adminiſtration of but too many maſculine governors. She made the preſent ſtate the greateſt part of her care, without wandering unneceſſarily into the uncertainty of things to come. She kept herſelf ſtrictly to moderation, even in the very ſtretch of her power, and continued living and dying in an untainted reputation for her integrity and juſtice; but in her family ſhe was yet ſo unfortunate, as to leave nothing of that dignity and power to her poſterity, that ſhe had acquired with ſo much difficulty and hazard, only, in truth, to gratify a more than feminine ambition. The thing, in ſhort, that ruin'd all, was the taking of her enemies for her adviſers; by which miſcarriage the government was left without a head. But the miſtakes of her reign appeared more eminently in the calamities that enſued upon them to the royal family after her death. This muſt be ſaid, however, for her, that ſo long as ſhe liv'd, ſhe kept the people in peace. And we are now come to the end of the life of queen Alexandra.

A battle betwixt Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus, wherein the former is defeated. They come afterward to an agreement; Ariſtobulus to govern, and Hyrcanus to enjoy his peace and liberty in a private ſtate of life.

THERE is enough ſaid in the foregoing book, of the reign, life, and death of Alexandra: We ſhall now take the following part of the hiſtory, in order as it lies before us; with all poſſible care, as near as we can, neither to ſuppreſs nor to omit any thing material, for want of recollection or information. The memorials of antiquity are much in the dark, and in many caſes tireſome to the reader, as well as obſcure; wherefore whoever enters upon this office, ſhould do well to make the work as eaſy and as entertaining as he can, in the very ornament of ſtile and language; but with a reverence to truth in the firſt place, for fear of abuſing and miſleading the world, under a pretence of informing them.

IT was in the third year of the Olympiad one hundred and ſeventy ſeven, Q. Hortenſius, and Q. Metellus Creticus, conſuls, that Hyrcanus took upon himſelf the pontificate, and Ariſtobulus immediately made war upon him. They fought a battle at Jericho, and a great many of Hyrcanus's ſoldiers deſerted, and went over to his brother; himſelf being driven into the citadel, where the wife and children of Ariſtobulus were kept priſoners, by the order and direction of his mother, as we have ſaid before; and the remainder of the faction took ſanctuary for a while within the verge of the temple, but render'd themſelves ſoon after. As matters cool'd by little and little, the brothers enter'd upon a treaty of an accommodation, and came in the concluſion to this agreement, that Ariſtobulus ſhould be eſtabliſh'd in the poſſeſſion of the government, and Hyrcanus be allow'd to live at eaſe and liberty upon his own particular fortune, without any moleſtation. This contract was ſign'd and ratified in the temple itſelf, with all the formalities of joining hands, and promiſes reciprocally interchang'd for the performance of covenants, concluding with a mutual embrace in the ſight of all the people, and ſo departing, the one to his palace, the other to his private apartment, under the roof of Ariſtobulus.

Antipater makes an intereſt for Hyrcanus againſt Ariſtobulus, and ſets the people againſt him. Hyrcanus applies himſelf to Aretas for aſſiſtance and protection. Antipater agrees with Aretas about the receiving of him, and ſettles the matter with him at Petra in Hyrcanus's favour.

NOW there was a certain Idumean of Hyrcanus's faction, a man of wealth, yet a very buſy and troubleſome fellow, his name Antipater, and a deadly enemy to Ariſtobulus. Nicolaus of Damaſcus makes him to be of the firſt ſtock of Jews that came out of Babylon into Judea, out of a compliment probably to his ſon Herod, who had the fortune afterward to be advanced to the throne; of which we ſhall ſpeak farther in its proper place. This Antipater was at firſt call'd by his father's name, Antipas, who, they ſay, was prefer'd by the favour of king Alexander and his wife, to the government of Idumea; where by the force of fair words, and large preſents, he made a conſiderable intereſt with the Arabians, Gazeans, and the people of Askalon; in truth, ſtanding in ſome awe of Ariſtobulus, as well for his power to do him miſchief, as for a grudge there was betwixt them. Young Antipater, finding that there was no good to be done upon Ariſtobulus, but by leſſening him in his reputation among the people, betook himſelf by the ſecret ways of calumny and detraction, to the making of parties, and ſtirring up fears and jealouſies againſt him. He would be ſaying now and then, "How unreaſonable "a thing it was for the younger brother to "ſupplant the elder, ſtrip him of his birth-"right, and uſurp the government to himſelf; "nay, and how mean a thing it was for ſo "many noble Jews of power and credit to "look on and ſuffer it." The very ſame words ſerv'd him for Hyrcanus too; but adviſing him withal, to get out of the way in time; for the other party had moſt certainly a deſign upon his life, being all agreed upon it, that Ariſtobulus could never be ſafe ſo long as Hyrcanus was in being. Hyrcanus was an eaſy good-natur'd man, and having no guile in himſelf, was not apt to ſuſpect it in others; ſo that this diſcourſe did not work upon him as it was expected it ſhould; but the ſoftneſs of his nature, and the love he had for peace and quietneſs, was invidiouſly imputed to him as a want of ſpirit and common ſenſe. His brother Ariſtobulus was juſt the reverſe, being of a bold, daring, enterprizing temper. Antipater ſaw well enough, that with all his inſinuations, he had not yet gain'd his point upon Hyrcanus; but this did not divert him however from plying him with freſh cautions and importunities, to have a care of his brother; inſomuch, that he prevail'd upon him at laſt to apply himſelf for protection to the Arabian king Aretas, with the offer of his own friendſhip and ſervice over and above; which propoſals ſeem'd the more plauſible, in regard that Arabia borders upon Judea. The reſolution being taken, Antipater goes his way immediately to Aretas, to treat with him about the reception of Hyrcanus; and upon the ſecurity both of his oath and honour, that he would not upon any terms deliver him up into the hands of his enemies, Antipater went back again to Hyrcanus with an account of his buſineſs. When he had been ſome ſhort time at Jeruſalem, he took Hyrcanus with him one night out of the city, and conducted him by long journies to the city of Petra, where Aretas kept his court; and here he employ'd his uttermoſt credit with the king, (which was very great,) in favour of Hyrcanus, and in order to the eſtabliſhing of him in his paternal right. He follow'd him ſo cloſe, in fine, with preſſing inſtances and gifts, that at laſt he brought him over; Hyrcanus promiſing him at the ſame time, that if ever he came to be ſettled in his kingdom by his means, he would reſtore to him the country and the twelve cities, which had been taken from the Arabians by his father; that is to ſay, Medaba, Nabalo, Livias, Tharabaſa, Agalla, Athone, Zoara, Oronæ, Mariſſa, Rydda, Luſa, and Oryba.

CHAP. III.

Aretas gives Ariſtobulus battle, forces him into Jeruſalem, and beſieges him in the temple. The paſchal feaſt being at hand, the Jews withdraw into Egypt. Onias ſton'd to death by the rabble, for refuſing to curſe Ariſtobulus. God's judgment upon the people for their perfidy and murder.

UPON the encouragement of theſe promiſes, Aretas advanced againſt Ariſtobulus with an army of fifty thouſand horſe and foot; fought, and overcame him; inſomuch, that finding himſelf abandon'd by his ſoldiers going over to Hyrcanus, he was forc'd to fly for refuge to Jeruſalem; where Aretas, with his whole army, attack'd him in the very temple; the people unanimouſly joining with Hyrcanus againſt Ariſtobulus, the prieſts only excepted. Aretas, on the other hand, with his Jews, as well as Arabians, puſhing on the aſſault with the uttermoſt vigour. While this action was in hand, the feaſt of unleavened bread coming on, (that which we call the Paſchal,) the chief men of the Jews withdrew themſelves out of the country, and went into Egypt; at which time, one Onias, a holy and a righteous man, upon the apprehenſion of a civil war at hand, went out of the way, and hid himſelf. The Jews reflecting upon the piety of this man, and how he had obtained rain from God in an extremity of drought, brought him out into the camp, and there made it their requeſt, that as he had formerly deliver'd them from the judgment of a famine, ſo he would now relieve them from a moſt deſtructive war, by denouncing a malediction upon Ariſtobulus and his whole faction. He oppos'd it a great while, till at laſt being overruled by the multitude, he ſtood up in the middle of them, and deliver'd an ejaculatory prayer to this purpoſe: "Lord, ſays he, thou "art the king of kings; and ſince it is ſo, that "both we that ſtand here before thee are thy "people, and they that are beſieged in the "temple, are thy prieſts, I do humbly be-"ſeech thee not to hear the prayer of either "of them one againſt the other." Upon which words ſome of the vileſt Jewiſh rabble that ſtood by, ſton'd him to death. This barbarity barity of theirs was followed immediately by a divine juſtice, and the murder of Onias avenged in manner as follows: While Ariſtobulus with the prieſts were thus beſet in the temple, the paſchal feſtival came on; at which time, according to cuſtom, the Jews offer'd up a great number of ſacrifices; but the beſieged, not having ſo many as they had occaſion for, deſir'd their brethren to ſupply them at their own price; and ſo they agreed at one thouſand * drachma's a head, each beaſt, and the money to be paid down. Ariſtobulus and the prieſts agreed to the price and the conditions, and ſo let down the money to them with a rope and a bag from the temple wall. When the beſiegers had the money, they refuſed to deliver the victims; and ſuch was their ſhameleſs impiety, that they did not only break faith with men, but ſacrilegiouſly robbed God himſelf of a ſervice that was dedicated to his honour. The prieſts upon this perfidy, impoſed upon them under the countenance of a contract, joined in a prayer to God, that this iniquity might not eſcape unpuniſh'd. Their prayers were heard, and the judgment not defer'd; for there fell immediately a violent tempeſt, that deſtroy'd all the fruits of the earth through the whole province; ſo that one meaſure of wheat was ſold for fifteen † drachma's.

A judgment from Heaven overtakes them.

Pompey ſends Scaurus for Syria; who, upon the taking of Damaſcus by Metellus and Lollius, poſts away toward Judea. Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus propoſe an alliance with Scaurus, who cloſes with Ariſtobulus, and bids Aretas withdraw from the ſiege of Jeruſalem at his peril. Ariſtobulus falls upon Aretas and Hyrcanus, cuts off ſeven thouſand of their men, and Cephalio the brother of Antipater among the reſt.

Pompey in war with Tigranes. Damaſcus being taken by Metellus and Lollius, Scaurus advances toward Judea.

POMPEY himſelf was at this time detained in Armenia, by the war he had there with Tigranes; but in this interim ſent Scaurus into Syria. When he came to Damaſcus, he found the city newly taken by Metellus and Lollius; and ſo he poſted forward without any ſtop toward Judea. As he was upon the way, there came ambaſſadors to him from Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus, both of them ſolliciting an alliance offenſive and defenſive. Ariſtobulus offer'd four ‡ hundred talents, and Hyrcanus juſt as much. Scaurus inclin'd rather to Ariſtobulus, as the more generous and ſolvent of the two, beſide the terms he inſiſted upon were more practicable and eaſy; but he look'd upon the other to be poor and ſtingy, his conditions higher than his brother's, and himſelf at laſt not ſo reſponſible; for it was a much harder matter to carry ſo ſtrong and ſo well fortified a city by aſſault, than to beat a vagabond parcel of Nabatheans and fugitives, not well provided nor accouter'd for the carrying on of that war. For theſe reaſons Scaurus agreed with Ariſtobulus, took his money, and diſcharg'd the ſiege; ordering Aretas to withdraw, upon the peril of being accounted an enemy to the Roman people in caſe of refuſal. Scaurus, after this, went back to Damaſcus, and Ariſtobulus advanced with a mighty army againſt Aretas and Hyrcanus; and engaging them in a place called Papyron, he gave them an overthrow, with the loſs of about ſeven thouſand of the enemy, and Cephalio the brother of Antipater among the reſt.

Scaurus enters into a league offenſive and defenſive with Ariſtobulus, and makes Aretas quit the ſiege.

Ariſtobulus gave Hyrcanus and Aretas a great overthrow.

Pompey goes to Damaſcus, and ſo to Cele-Syria. Great court made to him all the way he goes. Ariſtobulus makes him a magnificent preſent. Gabinius and Scaurus charg'd with corruption. Pompey gives them a hearing, and adjourns the trial; but Ariſtobulus goes away in a huff, without waiting for the iſſue.

UPON Pompey's coming to Damaſcus and Cele-Syria, a while after there came ambaſſadors thronging to him from all quarters; that is to ſay, from all Syria, Egypt, and Judea. Ariſtobulus, above all the reſt, ſent him a moſt glorious preſent, a golden vine of || five hundred talents, which Strabo the Cappadocian gives an account of in theſe words: "There was a preſent made to Pom- "pey out of Egypt, of a crown that weighed "four hundred pieces of gold; and another "out of Judea, of a golden vine, or garden, "to which they gave the name of Terpole, "or delight. Theſe preſents were brought "by ambaſſadors, and I myſelf ſaw the vine "at Rome in the temple of Jupiter Capitoli- "nus, with this inſcription, Alexander king "of the Jews. THERE came to Pompey not long after this other ambaſſadors, Antipater on the part of Hyrcanus, and Nicodemus for Ariſtobulus, who charged Gabinius and Scaurus with taking ſums of money, the former  three hundred talents, and the other four, thereby diſobliging them both. Pompey took the cognizance of the cauſe into his own hand, and appointed the parties to attend him about it. The ſpring coming on, Pompey drew out of his winter quarters, and marched to Damaſcus, deſtroying the fort of Apamia, a fortification of Antiochus Cyzicenus by the way, having an eye likewiſe upon the country of Ptolemy Menneus, a wicked man, and worſe, if poſſible, than his kinſman Dionyſius Tripolitanus, who loſt his head by the hand of juſtice. redeem himself for a * thousand talents, which Pompey divided among his soldiers. He raised the fort of Lycias also, where Silas the Jew had gotten possession; and so passing from thence toward Heliopolis and Chalcis, he took the way of the mountain that lies betwixt them, and so pass'd into Cele-Syria, and then from Bella to Damascus, where the controversy betwixt the Jews and their princes was brought to a hearing, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus being at odds one with another, and the common people against them both. "They "were not to be govern'd by kings, they said, "but by God's priests, according to the laws "and constitutions of their country. They "did not deny the sacerdotal extraction of "the two brothers; but they charged them "with a design of enslaving the people, and "subverting the fundamentals of the govern-"ment."

Hyrcanus's plea.

HYRCANUS insisted upon it, that he being the elder brother, Aristobulus had violently, and against all law and justice, seiz'd upon his hereditary dignity and estate; and depriving him of the prerogative of his birthright, reduced him to the condition of a pensioner at his mercy and allowance; setting forth how troublesome and vexatious he was to his neighbours both at sea and land, as a man born for mischief, and that it was only the turbulence of his ambitious humour that animated and transported the people into this revolt. You have here the substance of his plea, and he had at least a thousand of the most eminent Jews that Antipater had engaged in his interest, to stand by him in it.

Aristobulus's defence.

ARISTOBULUS pleaded, on the other hand, that Hyrcanus was not set aside with any thought of usurpation or encroachment, either upon his title, or upon his inheritance, but purely upon the account of his incapacity for the necessary offices of government, being fallen to such a degree of scorn and contempt among the common people, that I had no other choice before me, says Aristobulus, but either to take the administration into my own hands, or venture the translating of it into another family; and for the appellation of king, I only kept it as I found it, in the same stile of dignity that my father Alexander us'd before me. Now this I am ready to make good, says he, by several witnesses here, producing at the same time a company of gaudy foppish young fellows, sparkling in the vanity of their dress and trappings, such as all men of sobriety hated and despised, and fitter in appearance for that we call a ball, or an assembly, than to give testimony in a court of justice.

Pompey gives them a fair dismission for the present, and puts off the trial to another time.

POMPEY, upon the hearing of all parties, was in his judgment against the intemperate proceeding of Aristobulus; but gave them however for the present a fair dismission, with a promise, that so soon as ever he should have reduc'd the Nabatheans into order, he would visit their country, and do somewhat farther in it; requiring them in the mean time to behave themselves peaceably, and so discharg'd Aristobulus with civility and respect, for fear he, being disgusted, might obstruct him in his passage. But he was not to be wrought upon by fair words it seems, for he went away presently to Delion, and so to Judea, without waiting any further upon what Pompey had promis'd him.

Aristobulus goes his way into Judea, without waiting any longer upon Pompey.

CHAP. VI.

Pompey finding himself affronted, sends a summons to him in Alexandrion, to come down, and speak with him. Pompey demands the possession of all the fortresses in his power, and Aristobulus delivers them up; but presently withdraws to Jerusalem, and prepares for a war. While this was a doing, comes the news from Pontus of Mithridates being poison'd by his son Pharnaces.

THE mockery of this way of proceeding provoked Pompey to such a degree, that he took the army he had provided against the Nabatheans, and joining them with the auxiliary troops that he had rais'd at Damascus, and the rest of Syria, together with the Roman legions that he had under his command, and marched with them directly toward Aristobulus, passing by Pella and Scythopolis, till he came to Coreæ, which enters into the heart of Judea; where he found upon the top of a mountain, a strong and a famous castle, call'd Alexandrion: And being told that Aristobulus had made choice of that place for his retreat, he gave him a summons to come down and speak with him; which he was prevail'd upon to do by the people he had about him, for fear of being engag'd in a war with the Romans. There pass'd some discourse betwixt them, upon the subject of the dispute between the two brothers; and after that formality was over, Aristobulus, with Pompey's leave, return'd safely back again to the castle; and this he did over and over again, to keep fair with Pompey, in all reasonable compliances, as the most likely way to compass his end: But this did not hinder him yet from putting himself into a posture of defence in case of the worst, out of a fear and jealousy he had of Pompey's declaring for his brother. Pompey, after this, order'd him to deliver up all the castles that he was master of, and to signify such his will and pleasure to the governors under his own hand, that there might be no place left for scruple or excuse. Aristobulus did as he was appointed; but took it so heinously, that he went away forthwith to Jerusalem, to prepare, as he understood the matter, for a certain war. It was not long before Pompey, marching against him, at the head of his army, was met upon the way with an express from Pontus, giving him an account of the death of Mithridates slain by his son Pharnaces.

Pompey, in an indignation, marches against Aristobulus.

He finds him in Alexandrion, and summons him down to speak with him.

After several discourses, Aristobulus delivers up all the castles in his possession.

Pompey incamps at Jericho, and ſo marches towards Jeruſalem. Ariſtobulus offers him money, and the poſſeſſion of the town. Pompey complies, and ſends Gabinius to receive the money; but the gates are ſhut againſt him. Ariſtobulus is made a cloſe priſoner upon it, and Pompey lays ſiege to the city in perſon.

POMPEY pitch'd his firſt camp at Jericho, a place famous for palm-trees and balſam, which is the moſt precious of gums, and only a diſtillation from a little ſhrub upon an inciſion made in it with a ſharp ſtone. The next morning he moved toward Jeruſalem. Ariſtobulus, by this time repented himſelf of what he had done, and went out to meet him with a compliment of offering him a ſum of money, and the command of the town; and whatever ſatisfaction he ſhould further deſire for the preventing of a war. Pompey accepted of his propoſals, and ſent Gabinius with a body of men into the city to receive the money: But he had only his labour for his pains; for the gates were ſhut againſt him, and he came back empty-handed as he went out; the fault being laid upon the ſoldiers that would not ſtand to the agreement. Pompey had ſuch an indignation for this affront, that he kept a ſtricter guard upon Ariſtobulus, and went himſelf to Jeruſalem, which was very ſtrong by ſituation, and well fortify'd; only it lay a little expoſed toward the north, where there was a large and a deep valley about the temple, and a ſubſtantial ſtone-wall to encompaſs it.

Jeruſalem divided; part for Pompey, part for Ariſtobulus.

WHILE Pompey was before the town, the citizens were mightily divided how to behave themſelves: Some were for yielding; others for holding out, and preparing for a war; eſpecially conſidering that Ariſtobulus was kept a priſoner. So that without more ado they prepoſſeſs'd themſelves of the temple, and broke down the bridge betwixt that and the city; while the other party not only gave entrance to the army, but deliver'd up both city and palace into the hands of Pompey; who preſently ſent away Piſo his lieutenant with part of his army to take charge of both; which he did effectually, by fortifying the houſes and buildings of the temple that were next at hand. When things were come to this paſs, Pompey, in the firſt place, made them a propoſal of peace; but upon their refuſal to treat, he provided for an aſſault; Hyrcanus ſupplying him very frankly with what he had occaſion for. The north-ſide of the temple being the weakeſt quarter, Pompey propoſed to begin his attack there. It was encompaſſed with high towers, and forc'd a ditch, over and above the aforeſaid valley. Upon the city ſide, toward Pompey's ſtation, there was no paſſing, now the bridge was down, for craggs and precipices; but the Romans, with infinite labour and difficulty, made a hard ſhift yet to fill up the ditch with timber, and other materials that they got together, and ſo to raiſe platforms and ramparts to ſuch a prodigious height, that with engines of battery which they brought from Tyre, they play'd great ſtones upon the temple-wall; and yet if it had not been for the advantage they took of our ſeventh day's ſabbath, the Romans would have had much ado to have gain'd their point: For notwithſtanding that in caſe of aggreſſion, the law allow'd us to defend ourſelves upon that day, and to repel force by force, we durſt not do any work upon it however yet, though but to croſs and hinder one work with another. When the Romans came to underſtand this once, and to obſerve, that we made no oppoſition to the advancing of their bulwarks, and the fixing of their machines upon that feſtival, they employ'd the ſabbath wholly upon ſafe and quiet preparations for the action of the next day, without attempting any manner of violence upon us at preſent. This is enough to ſhew the infinite difference we have for the religion and laws of our country, when the dread of death itſelf is not able to divert us from the very rule and method of our devotions; for the prieſts have their ſolemn ſacrifices twice a day, morning and afternoon, with all their preſcript forms of worſhip, without any diſpenſation or excuſe, in what extremity ſoever, for the omiſſion. This temple was taken upon a faſting-day, in the third month of the ſiege, the hundred ſeventy ninth Olympiad; Caius Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cicero, being conſuls. Upon the enemies forcing the place, they put every man to death before them: And all this cruelty was not enough yet to deter thoſe officiating at the altar, from going on with their devotions; accounting it the leſs evil of the two, to fall into the hands of an unmerciful enemy, than to abandon their holy profeſſion, or fail in the leaſt ſcruple of obedience and reſpect to their country's rites and ceremonies. Now for the authority of this relation, and to ſhew that there is nothing in it of fiction, we have it atteſted by all the authors of note that pretend to give any account of the actions of Pompey, and among the reſt by * Strabo, Nicolaus of Damaſcus, and Titus Livius the famous Roman hiſtorian. They fell to work with their engines upon the great tower, till by the dint of repeated batteries they ſhook it to pieces, and brought it down to the ground, carrying away a great part of the next wall along with it in the ruins. This breach was no ſooner made, but the enemy preſs'd in great numbers to enter it. The firſt that mounted was Cornelius Fauſtus, the ſon of Sylla, with his company; and then upon another quarter, the centurion Furius, with his men, and Fabius then betwixt them both with another ſtrong party; the place being all cover'd with dead bodies; ſome killed by the Romans, others by conſent diſpatching one another; ſome again caſting themſelves down headlong from the walls, and others ſetting fire to the houſes over their heads, rather than to be ſpectators of the barbarities that were committed. There were ſlain about twelve thouſand Jews, and not many Romans. Abſalom, the uncle, and the father-in-law of Ariſtobulus, was made a priſoner. Theſe outrages were accompany'd alſo with ſeveral indignities to the very myſteries of our religion, by the admittance of prophane perſons into the place, and to the ſight of thoſe privacies, which none but prieſts had ever been eye-witneſſes of before. Pompey and his train were of the number that came in there, where they found a golden table, a candleſtick, and cups of the ſame metal; varieties of incenſe, and perfumes in abundance, beſide a matter of two * thouſand talents in the treaſury: but he look'd upon all this proviſion as ſacred; and out of a veneration he had for holy things, he did hot only forbear touching or ſeizing any of it, but with a generous piety order'd the officers of the temple next day to purge the place, and to offer ſacrifices according to their own cuſtoms and ordinances. He reſtored Hyrcanus to the high-prieſthood, partly for the good offices he had received from him himſelf, and partly for the ſervice he had done him in hindering the Jews from taking up arms for Ariſtobulus. He cut off the heads then of the incendiaries of the faction that were the promoters of the war, and took care to ſee Fauſtus, and others that behaved themſelves bravely upon the aſſault, rewarded according to their deſerts. As for Jeruſalem itſelf, he made it tributary to the Romans, and reduced all the places that he found the Jews poſſeſs'd of in Cele-Syria, under their allegiance, confining alſo that populous and powerful nation within the compaſs of their antient bounds. He cauſed Gadara, (lately deſtroy'd,) in favour of his freed man Demetrius that was born there, to be rebuilt; and as for Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Mariſſa, Azotus, Jamnia, and Arethuſa, being inland places, he deliver'd them up into the hands of their former inhabitants, together with other places that were ruin'd by the war; but for the maritime towns, as Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and Straton's tower, Pompey made them all free, and laid them to the province. Now this tower of Straton, when it came afterward to be rebuilt by Herod, and beautified with ſtately ports and temples, changed the antient name for Ceſarea.

FROM this feud betwixt Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus, we may date the ruin of Jeruſalem, with the loſs of our liberty to the Romans, we being forced to give all back to the Syrians, which we had taken in a fair war, the impoſition of above ten † thouſand talents which it coſt us in a ſhort time after to the Romans; and the tranſlation of the ſovereign authority, which had ever till then deſcended in the high-prieſthood, to the very dregs of the people. But we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of all this in another place.

SOME time after this, Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, falling into, and harraſſing Judea with frequent incurſions, Gabinius was ſent from Rome into Syria, with the commiſſion of general; and upon an expedition againſt Alexander, wherein he performed many memorable exploits. Hyrcanus the high-prieſt was not now in any condition to make reſiſtance, though he had it in his thought to repair and re-edify the walls of Jeruſalem that Pompey had deſtroy'd; but the Romans would not ſuffer him to go forward with it. Alexander ranging up and down the country, made a ſhift in a ſhort time to get together a mix'd body of Jews, and others, to the number of ten thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe. Alexander drew off to be nearer Jeruſalem, where they came to a battle, in which Alexander loſt about three thouſand men, that were kill'd upon the ſpot, beſides as many that were taken. Gabinius, after this, laid ſiege to the caſtle of Alexandrion, but with an offer and promiſe of pardon to the defendants for all that was paſt, if they would render up the place. The beſieged kept a ſtrong outguard under the walls of the caſtle, which the Romans attack'd, and cut off a great many of them; Marcus Antonius behaving himſelf very bravely upon that occaſion. Gabinius was loth to loſe time; ſo that leaving part of his army behind to attend the ſiege, he went himſelf to take a view of the reſt of the country, and to give order for the rebuilding of what cities had been deſtroy'd; as Samaria, Azotus, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Mariſſa, Gaza, and divers other places. This was done by the direction of Gabinius; and theſe places came to be a very convenient and ſafe habitation, after they had been for a long time deſerted. Gabinius, having put the country into this order, returned to Alexandrion, in proſecution of the ſiege, where Alexander took the opportunity of begging pardon by his ambaſſadors, upon condition of delivering up to him the caſtles of Hyrcania, Macherus, and Alexandrion, which he accepted of, but razed them all three to the ground. After this there came to him the mother of Alexander, who was a well-wiſher to the Romans, her husband and the reſt of her children being then priſoners at Rome. Gabinius denied her nothing; and after the ſettling of matters, Hyrcanus was brought to Jeruſalem, and reſtored to the office and exerciſe of his prieſthood. There were then conſtituted five courts of juſtice, and a diviſion made of the whole province into five equal parts; ſo that ſome went for law to Jeruſalem, others to Gadara, and others alſo to Amathus, Jericho, or Saphora, which is a city of Galilee. They came by this means to be deliver'd from the tyranny they complain'd of, and ſo return'd to the form of an Ariſtocracy again.

Ariſtobulus makes his eſcape from Rome. Commiſſioners are ſent after him. He is routed by the Romans, and taken a ſecond time priſoner. He defeats the Nabatheans; after which he goes to Rome, and Craſſus ſucceeds him.

UPON the flight of Ariſtobulus from Rome to Judea, with an intent to repair and fortify Alexandrion afreſh after the late ruins, Gabinius ſent a body of men thither under the command of Siſenna, Antonius, and Servilius, to maintain the place, and to endeavour the ſecuring of Ariſtobulus himſelf. Betwixt the authority of ſo great a name, and a popular itch of novelty, there came great numbers of the Jews flocking over to him; and in particular Pitholaus the governor of Jeruſalem, with a thouſand men well arm'd; as for thoſe that were not ſo, of which there were a great number, he diſcharged them as unſerviceable and uſeleſs. He marched with a body of eight thouſand men, to attempt the taking of Macherus. The Romans following him very cloſely, came up with him and fought him; and after an obſtinate reſiſtance upon the firſt ſhock, gave him a terrible overthrow; kill'd five thouſand upon the place, while the reſt did what they could to ſave themſelves by flight. Ariſtobulus, upon this rout, with a matter of a thouſand men, fortified the caſtle as well as he could, and kept up his heart ſtill in the extremity of his ill fortunes; but in two days the caſtle was carried by aſſault, himſelf grievouſly wounded, and by a capricious fatality of ill luck, carried away priſoner with his ſon Antigonus his companion in his eſcape, and ſo brought to Gabinius; by whom he was now ſent a ſecond time priſoner to Rome, having been three years and a half, both in the poſſeſſion of the kingdom, and of the pontificate, and acquitting himſelf with great honour and magnificence in both charges. But the ſenate ſet his children at liberty, however, upon the intimation of Gabinius, that he had promis'd the mother as much, upon the delivery of certain caſtles; ſo that they came back again into Judea.

Gabinius propoſes the reſtoring of Ptolemy.

AT his return Gabinius found Syria all in an uproar; for Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, having made himſelf maſter of the kingdom, harraſs'd the country with a powerful army, and forced a great many of the Jews over to his party, killing all the Romans he could come at in his paſſage, and beſieging the reſt upon the mount of Garizin, who fled thither for ſanctuary. Gabinius finding the Syrians in this diſorder, ſent Antipater, being a man of known prudence and integrity, to deal with them, and to try if he could bring them to their wits again. He behaved himſelf in this commiſſion ſo effectually, that he brought off ſeveral of the revolters, but Alexander himſelf he found was not to be mov'd; for having gotten together an army of thirty thouſand Jews, his reſolution was to hazard a battle with Gabinius. They fought, in ſhort, at the Mount Itabyr; and the Jews loſt ten thouſand men in that engagement.

Alexander makes terrible havock in Syria.

MATTERS being thus ſettled in Jeruſalem, the victor, by the advice of Antipater, marched away againſt the Nabatheans, and gave them a notable overthrow, diſcharging two noble Parthians, Mithridates and Orſanes, that came over to him for protection; giving it out that they were fled into their own country. Gabinius having now acquitted himſelf with honour in all his commiſſions, went back to Rome, and Craſſus ſucceeded him in his command.

Craſſus rifles the temple againſt his oath.

CRASSUS, being now upon the preparative for a war with the Parthians, came into Judea, and ſeized not only the * two thouſand talents that Pompey made a conſcience of ſo much as meddling with, but he pillag'd the temple of all the gold he could lay his hands on, to the value of † eight thouſand talents more. He carry'd away with him alſo a wedge of gold of ‖ three hundred mina's, reckoning every mina, according to the Jewiſh computation, at two pounds and a half. Eleazar the prieſt, who had the keeping of this holy treaſure, deliver'd it up to Craſſus; not out of ſpite, or ill-will, for he was a righteous and a juſt man: But this bar of gold being lodged in a wooden beam that was made hollow on purpoſe to receive and conceal it, and no mortal privy to the ſecret but himſelf, Eleazar had no other thought, ſeeing Craſſus's heart ſo wholly ſet upon the money, but to deliver up this wedge as a compoſition for all the reſt; for there were hangings alſo of an ineſtimable value faſten'd to this timber, and other rich ornaments for the ſervice of the temple, which were all likewiſe in Eleazar's cuſtody. And he did not deliver this bar of gold at laſt neither, but upon the declaration of Craſſus, that he was abundantly ſatisfy'd with what he had already; and upon the ſolemnity of an oath and promiſe, that he would not meddle with any thing elſe. But, it ſeems, he made no account of his oath; for he rifled the temple from top to bottom, and ſtript it to the bare walls.

THE maſs of money that was lodged in this temple, how prodigious ſoever it may appear, will not be found ſo great a wonder, conſidering how long the Jews were a getting it together, and that it came from all quarters of the world, wherever the worſhip of the true God was known: Beſide that the report of this immenſe value is ſo far from vanity and oſtentation, that it is a truth atteſted and confirm'd by the authority of ſeveral hiſtorians; as of Strabo the Cappadocian for one. "Mithridates, Strabo the hiſtorian. "ſays he, ſent to the iſle of Coos for ſome money of Cleopatra's, that ſhe had depoſited "there; and for eight hundred talents be-"longing to the Jews." Now we have no publick treaſure, but what is ſacred, and dedicated to God; and it is as clear as day, that the Aſiatick Jews tranſmitted this treaſure from thence to Coos, upon the apprehenſion of a war with Mithridates: For it cannot be imagined that the Jews of Judea, that had ſo much a ſtronger, and a ſafer place near hand, that is to ſay, the temple and city of Jeruſalem, would ever have ſent their money away for better ſecurity to Coos: Neither can it be ſuppoſed, that it came from the Alexandrian Jews; for they were too far off to have any apprehenſion of Mithridates.

STRABO has it in another place, "That "Sylla paſſing through Greece to carry on a "war againſt Mithridates, ſent Lucullus to "Cyrene, that was then torn to pieces with "feuds and factions among the Jews, a people "that had ſpread themſelves over the face of "the whole earth. He ranges the Cyrene-"ans in another place into four diviſions; "burghers, husbandmen, ſtrangers, and Jews. "The laſt ſort of them are ſo univerſally diſ-"pers'd, that there's hardly any habitable part "where they have not got footing, and a con-"ſiderable eſtabliſhment. As for Egypt and See Strabo "Cyrene, while they were under the juriſ-again. "diction of the ſame prince, and ſeveral other "countries alſo, they embraced in many places "the Jewiſh laws, rites, and cuſtoms; gave "them the liberty of populous congregations, "and trained up their children in a confor-"mity to the Jewiſh way of diſcipline. In "Egypt they had whole colonies of them, be-"ſide a right of propriety that they have by "a formality of aſſignment in a conſiderable "part of the city of Alexandria, with ma-"giſtrates, judges, and courts of juſtice of "their own, and ways of deciding differences "in caſes of propriety, peculiar to themſelves, "and all in as good method as if it were in "a form of government. Now Egypt agreed "the better with this nation, both for extrac-"tion ſake and neighbourhood; for the Jews "came out of it, and they eaſily became one "again; ſo that it was but making a ſtep to "either, only as one borderer does to another; "and in this manner, not only as neighbours, "but as formerly members of the ſame body." Thus far Strabo.

WHEN Craſſus had done what he pleaſed in Judea, he advanced againſt the Parthians, and gave them battle, where he was cut off himſelf, and his whole army, as we have related elſewhere. But Craſſus made his retreat into Syria, where he gave a ſtand to the progreſs of the Parthians, that were now grown inſolent upon their ſucceſs. He went afterward to Tyre, and ſo to Judea, where he took Tari-

This Antipater had so generous and obliging a way with him, that all the princes and great men about him had a high esteem for him, the king of Arabia especially, to whose charitable goodness he recommended the government of his children, during the war with Aristobulus. Pelusium taken by Mithridates, and Antipater the first man that enter'd the breach.

Antipater did Cesar eminent service in his war with Egypt.

ANTIPATER was a man of great authority in Judea, and one that after the overthrow and death of Pompey, did Cesar many considerable services, at the instance of Hyrcanus, in his war upon Egypt; for Mithridates the Pergamenian being forced to stop once at Askalon, because there was no passing for him by Pelusium with the succours that he had for Cesar, Antipater join'd him with an armed body of three thousand Jews, and brought in several of the prime men of Arabia, and effectually all Syria, to his assistance; as there was Jamblicus, a prince of the country, and his son Ptolemy; and Tholomy of Libanus, the son of Sohemus; with the cities, almost all in general, who came in a kind of emulation to serve him, and happy was he who could present himself first. Mithridates, being now in a condition to march, advanced out of Syria into Pelusium, where the inhabitants refusing him entrance, he sat down before the place, assaulted it, and batter'd a piece of the wall down. Antipater was the brave man that first enter'd the breach, and was so well seconded in the action, that the town was taken upon it; but as Antipater and Mithridates were hastening away to Cesar, the Egyptian Jews, who live in the country of Onias, as they call it, opposed their passage, till by the power and interest of Antipater, as their countryman, but especially upon the sight of a letter from Hyrcanus the high-priest to them, they were prevailed upon to use Cesar kindly, and to supply him on his march with whatsoever necessaries his army might have occasion for. Upon the credit, I say, of Antipater's mediation and advice, and upon that of the high-priest's letter, they chearfully complied; the people of Memphis, upon this, applying themselves to Mithridates, and espousing the same interest.

Mithridates worsted; Antipater rescues him, and wins the day. Hyrcanus and Antipater highly in Cesar's favour. Antigonus complains to Cesar of Hyrcanus and Antipater, who hears both sides, and determines in favour of the defendants.

Mithridates worsted. Antipater rescues him, and wins the battle.

AT a place called Delta, and upon a particular spot of ground, known by the name of the Jews Camp, Mithridates and Antipater came to a battle with the enemy, the former commanding the right wing, and the other the left. Mithridates was so hard press'd, that his men gave way, and the disorder was very near coming to a total rout; but Antipater, in the very nick of time, came up along the bank of the river, with an enforcement to his relief; rescued his friends, and in one word put an almost victorious enemy to flight, and pursued them with so much fierceness and precipitation, that he made himself master of their camp, calling in Mithridates, who was left a great way behind, to take his part of the booty, who lost a matter of eight hundred men, and Antipater not above fifty. Upon the report of this action, Mithridates gave Cesar frankly to understand, that he was indebted both for the preservation of the army, and for the glory of that day, to the bravery of Antipater; which Cesar was so sensible of, that throughout the whole course of the war, he was sure to be employ'd upon a post of honour ever after; and he carried the marks of it in the many wounds he received in that service.

Hyrcanus and Antipater highly in Cesar's favour.

So soon as this was over, Cesar went back by sea into Syria, treating both Hyrcanus and Antipater with a singular grace and respect; the one he confirmed in the pontificate, and the other he made a freeman of Rome, with all the privileges of the city. Some will have it that Hyrcanus was personally in this war, and came actually into Egypt. Strabo the Cappadocian tells us as much out of Asinius. "Upon the coming of Mithridates into Egypt, says he, Hyrcanus the high-priest of the Jews came along with him." He says in another place, upon the credit of Hypsicrates, "That Mithridates came first thither alone, "and then sent for Antipater, the governor "of Judea, to Askalon, who brought him "three thousand men; and that upon his counsel and persuasion, divers of the princes and "great men of the country went over to him, "and Hyrcanus the high-priest among the rest." Thus far goes Strabo.

Strabo the Cappadocian.

About this time came Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, with a complaint to Cesar, how his father had been poison'd by a faction, for bearing arms in his service, and how a brother of his had his head chopp'd off at Scipio's instigation; setting forth how he was disinherited and ejected, and presented himself as an object of his compassion. He reflected also upon Hyrcanus and Antipater, for usurping upon the liberties of the nation, and particularly for wrongs done to himself; but Antipater, being then present, wiped off these reproaches, by exposing the turbulent and seditious humour of Antigonus, and how busy he was in all factious cabals, to embroil the publick peace; not forgetting neither to mind Cesar by a modest insinuation, of his own merits, appealing only to himself upon the proof he had given of his disposition and integrity, by the service he had done in the late war. As for Aristobulus, he was always known to be a profess'd and an implacable enemy to Rome; so that the Romans, in keeping him a prisoner, did no more than what necessity of state, common prudence, the law of arms, and the practice of nations obliged them to do; and then to the point of Scipio's beheading his brother, he was convict of several robberies, and it was no more than a capital punishment for a capital crime. Cesar, in fine, upon a full hearing of Antipater's discourse, pronounced Hyrcanus to be high-priest, gave Antipater his choice of any command he had a mind to, and conferr'd upon him the lieutenancy of Judea over and above.

Antigonus complains to Cesar of Hyrcanus and Antipater.

Cesar hears both parties, and determines in favour of Hyrcanus and Antipater.

Cesar gives Hyrcanus leave to rebuild Jerusalem. An alliance betwixt the senate of Rome and the Jews. A league betwixt Athens and the Jews. Antipater's exhortation to the people.

Cesar gives Hyrcanus leave to rebuild Jerusalem.

THE walls of Jerusalem lying at this time all in rubbish and ruin, just as they were left upon Pompey's breaking them down, Hyrcanus offer'd up a request to Cesar for leave to re-edify them, which was immediately granted with all the forms of ceremony and respect, and letters dispatch'd away to the consuls at Rome, for the entering of the resolution in the records of the capitol; the copy of the decree running as follows:

A decree of the senate assembled in the Temple of Concord, on the thirteenth day of the month of December, present L. Coponius, the son of Lucius, and Caius Papirius Quirinus.

An alliance betwixt the senate of Rome and the Jews.

"WHEREAS it appeareth unto this "senate, upon the report of Valerius "the son of Lucius, Prætor, that it is request-"ed and proposed by Alexander the son of "Jason, Numenius the son of Antiochus, and "Alexander the son of Dorotheus, ambassa-"dors on the behalf of the Jews, good men, "and our faithful allies, that the antient league "of friendship may be renewed betwixt us; "and that in token of their good-will and "disposition, they have brought a present of "a golden cup and buckler, valued at fifty "thousand crowns; desiring letters also of "recommendation to all governors and free "towns, for a safe passage both by sea and "land, through all their ports and territories. "Be it therefore order'd by this senate, that "the same league of friendship and society be "renewed and established, all the desires of "the said ambassadors agreed unto and grant-"ed, and their presents accepted." This was in the ninth year of the pontificate and principality of Hyrcanus, and in the month of Panemus.

This prince of the Jews had great honour done him also by the republick of Athens, in acknowledgment of their obligations to him; for they sent him a decree to this following purpose:

*A decree of the Athenians, bearing date the twenty fifth day of the month Panemus; Dionysius Asclepiades being president and high-priest, and Agathocles, * Archon; reported by Eucles the Alimusian, the son of Menander the scribe, on the eleventh of the Prytanea, in the month Munichion; a council of the † Probedri being met in the theatre; and after gathering the suffrages of the people by the high-priest Dorotheus, and his assessors, Dionysius, the son of Dionysius, made publication as follows:*

A league betwixt Athens and the Jews

"FOrasmuch as Hyrcanus the son of Alex-"ander, and high-priest and prince of "the Jews, hath upon all occasions, both "publick and private, as well in the generous "reception, entertainment, and accommoda-"tion of our ambassadors, as otherwise, given "proof of a singular affection and esteem, both "for our nation in general, and the citizens "of Athens in particular, whereof we have "received many instances; and forasmuch as "we have received credible information from "Theodosius the son of Theodorus of Sunium, "of the virtue of the said excellent prince, "and of his friendly disposition to do us all "the good offices in his power, we have re-"solved to present him with the honorary ac-

† The Probedri were chief magistrates, who had the direction and regulation of publick affairs, and to whom the rest gave place in sitting.

" knowledgment of a crown of gold, and to " erect a brazen ſtatue to him in the temple " of the * people and the graces, for the ſame " of his memory, and to have it notified by " proclamation at the exhibiting of any new " ſhow, in all theatres and places of publick " exerciſes, and ſpectacles in honour of Bac- " chus, Minerva, Ceres, &c. that we have pre- " ſented him with this crown out of a vene- " ration for his virtue. And we do further " will and require all our governors and ma- " giſtrates to be aiding and aſſiſting in the ef- " fectual improvement of theſe our conceſſions " to the beſt advantage of our friends and af- " ſociates, ſo long as this amity ſhall continue " betwixt us; for the manifeſtation of our " gratitude, piety, and juſtice toward all men " of worth and honour, and the encouraging " of good offices and inclinations toward us " for the future. We do likewiſe order, that " a fit choice be forthwith made of ambaſſa- " dors from among the Athenians, to attend " Hyrcanus in our name, and with this our " decree and preſents, and to provoke an emu- " lation to outdo us in this generous way of " competition." And ſo much for the inter- courſe of friendſhip that paſs'd betwixt the Romans and the Athenians with Hyrcanus.

When Ceſar had order'd his affairs in Syria, he went back again with his navy, and Antipater along with him, who immediately upon his return to Jeruſalem gave orders for the repairing of the walls that Pompey had thrown down; taking a tour at the ſame time up and down the province, to try what might be done with menaces and fair words, toward the keeping of a divided and a factious people quiet. Antipater's exhortation to the people. " He laid before them the bleſ- " ſings of a dutiful obedience to their prince, " in the peaceable enjoyment of their liberties " and poſſeſſions, and the dangerous conſe- " quences of ſeditious practices and innova- " tions, which would force governors to turn " perſecutors, Hyrcanus himſelf to turn ty- " rant, and the moſt neceſſary of their patrons " and allies, even the Ceſars, and the ſenate " of Rome themſelves, to become their im- " placable enemies; for depend upon it, ſays " he, they will be obey'd." With theſe ad- monitions he quieted the whole country.

Phaſael and Herod governors of Jeruſalem and Galilee. Herod's character. Ezekiah a famous rover. Phaſael's character. Antipater's reputation draws envy upon him. Complaints of Antipater to Hyrcanus. Herod cited before the judges. A brave and a bold ſpeech of Simeas. Herod tranſported againſt Hyrcanus. Proclamations publiſh'd in favour of the Jews. Ceſar ſlain in the ſenate-houſe, by Brutus and Caſſius.

Phaſael and Herod governours of Jeruſalem and Galilee. ANTIPATER, under theſe circumſtances, took an occaſion from the natural heavineſs of Hyrcanus to contrive a way for the advancing of his own family and fortunes by putting his two eldeſt ſons Phaſael and Herod into two eminent commands; the former into that of Jeruſalem, with the adjoining country, and Herod his ſecond ſon into the government of Galilee, being at that time † fifteen years of age; but of ſuch a pregnancy of wit, and ſo enterprizing a ſpirit, that his youth did not at all hinder him from ſearching out honourable occaſions for ſo heroical a diſpoſition to work upon. Herod's character. The borders of Syria were in thoſe days very much infeſted with robbers; ſo that the firſt inſtance of his prowеſs was upon that vagabond troop of highwaymen, wherein he took Ezekiah, their commander in chief, priſoner, with ſeveral of their companions, and put them all to death. Ezekiah a famous thief taken, and put to death. This action gain'd him ſo mighty a reputation among the people, that his name was celebrated through all the towns and villages as their deliverer, and the author of their ſecurity and repoſe. By the fame of this exploit, he became alſo known to Sextus, the kinſman of Ceſar the Great; who had then the adminiſtration of Syria: Beſide that it kindled an emulation in Phaſael likewiſe, to do ſomewhat that was great too, after the example of his brother; applying himſelf accordingly to the arts of popularity, as the moſt likely way for the compaſſing of his end. The character of Phaſael. He was a man of a publick ſpirit, and made for buſineſs; affable in his converſation, and ſo temperate in the exerciſe of his power, that never any good man was the worſe for it. By this dextrous way of addreſs, Antipater came to be treated by the whole nation, rather as an abſolute prince than as a proxy; and with a reverence alſo becoming the dignity of ſo great a maſter. And he had this virtue peculiar to himſelf from the reſt of the world, that proſperity never alter'd him, but from firſt to laſt he ſtood firm to his faith and to his friend.

Antipater's reputation draws envy upon him. This over-grown greatneſs of Antipater, and the elevation of his family to ſuch a degree of wealth, credit and power, together with the eſteem the people had for himſelf and his children, and his vaſt revenue in money from Hyrcanus, created ſo malicious an envy againſt him among the great men of the Jews, that they began to look upon him with an evil eye; eſpecially when they came to find what an intereſt he had made, not only among the people of Rome, but in the very hearts and good opinion of the emperors themſelves. They endeavoured to traduce him by ſaying he got money from Hyrcanus for the uſe of the Romans, and then engroſs'd the thanks for it to himſelf, as if it had been a preſent out of his own coffers, without ſo much as naming the other in the caſe. Calumnies rais'd againſt him. This was invidiouſly hinted to Hyrcanus, who was ſo far from taking it ill, that he ſeem'd pleas'd with it. But the thing of all the reſt that gave them the greateſt diſturbance, was the violent, daring, ambitious humour of Herod; inſomuch that in the heat of this indignation, they went to Hyrcanus with a complaint, and openly accuſed Antipater. Complaints of Antipater to Hyrcanus. " How long, ſaid they, ſhall " every thing go to wreck thus, and you take " no notice of it? Do not you perceive all this " while, how the dignities, profits and pre- " rogatives of royal power, are wholly ſhared " betwixt Antipater and his two ſons; and that " you

" you yourſelf have only the empty name and
" title of a prince? Have a care of letting " things go too far, and being over ſecure;
" for moſt certainly the ſafety of your perſon
" and government lies equally at ſtake. You
" miſtake yourſelf, if you look upon theſe
" ſparks to be any longer your deputies, for " they are effectually your maſters. What " was Herod's outrage upon Ezekiah and his " companions, but an affront to publick juſ-
" tice? For it is no better than direct mur" der by our law, to put any man to death,
" let him be never ſo great a villain, without
" the formality of a tryal: But this man had
" the face to exerciſe an arbitrary power, e" ven without the leaſt colour of any power
" at all."

WHAT with this diſcourſe and the clamour of the mothers in the temple, that lay day after day there, calling out both to prince and people for juſtice upon Herod, for the murder of their children, Hyrcanus was at laſt prevail'd upon to appoint a day of hearing, and try the cauſe indifferently betwixt Herod and his accuſers before a bench of Judges. Herod appeared upon the firſt call; though not altogether as a private man, but, according to his father's precaution, with only ſuch a train as might ſecure the priſoner, without affronting the court. Sextus Ceſar, having at that time the command of Syria, wrote a letter to Hyrcanus in Herod's favour, adding menaces, if they did not acquit him; which was no hard thing to obtain; for Hyrcanus lov'd him as his own fleſh and blood. When Herod with his people about him, had ſtood a long time facing the court, and not one mouth open'd againſt him, it put the whole aſſembly to their wits end, what to think of that profound ſilence, till in the concluſion, there ſtood up one Sameas, a man too juſt to be corrupted, and too innocent to fear any thing; and he deliver'd himſelf in terms to this purpoſe:

Hyrcanus ſets a day of hearing, and refers the cauſe to the judges.

Herod appears.

A bold ſpeech of Sameas.

" WITH the favour, ſays he, of yourſelf, Sir,
" and of this honourable court, this is the firſt
" time that ever I ſaw a priſoner at the bar,
" behaving himſelf with ſuch an air of vanity
" and confidence; and I am of opinion that
" you will hardly match this man, all things
" conſider'd, in the whole courſe of your ob-
" ſervation and experience. It has been the " practice formerly of perſons in his condi" tion, to demean themſelves in their habits,
" countenances and behaviour, with ſome re" gard to the ſobriety, ſeverity and reſigna-
" tion that becomes men in the hands of the " law, and under the awe of a legal animad-
" verſion: But we have a criminal here that " values himſelf upon his guards, his orna-
" ments and his purple, and ſtands in a poſ-
" ture to make publick juſtice more dangerous
" to the court than to the criminal. But I " do not blame him ſo much neither, for con-
" ſulting his own ſafety, before that of the " law and the government, as I do thoſe that
" ſuffer'd him to go on in thoſe liberties: that " is to ſay, the king and the judges. Take " notice, however, ſays he, turning to the " judges, of what I am about to tell you: God
" is a God of righteouſneſs and power; and
" the time will come, when this very man
" that you are now ſtickling to bring off in fa" vour of Hyrcanus, ſhall be the ruin of you,
" both king and judges."

AND ſo it came to paſs not long after; for upon Herod's getting poſſeſſion of the government, he put the king himſelf to death, and all the judges, ſave only Sameas; for whom he had a ſingular honour, in regard both of his integrity and juſtice; and more particularly, as the perſon, that, after the beſieging of the city by himſelf and Soſius, was inſtrumental to the admitting of him into the place: With this further declaration, that it was a judgment upon them for their ſins, and a puniſhment not to be avoided. But of this elſewhere.

Herod pays Sameas a great reſpect.

HYRCANUS, finding how the judges ſtood affected, and that it was likely to go hard with Herod, he adjourned the court till next day, and gave him a private hint, by all means to get out of the way, for he was a loſt man elſe. Herod, upon this, withdrew to Damaſcus, for fear of Hyrcanus, as he pretended; and upon ſome diſcourſe with Sextus Ceſar, and the ſettling of his own affairs, he publickly declar'd, that if ever they cited him again to that court, he would diſclaim their juriſdiction. This contempt put the judges in a rage; and they fell preſently to ſuggeſting it to Hyrcanus, that his ruin was the very bottom of the deſign; but though the thing was as plain as plain could be, and that he himſelf was convinced of it, he had not either conduct or reſolution to make any uſe of the precaution to his advantage. Herod was by this time ſafe and eaſy under the care and protection of Sextus Ceſar, and ſettled alſo in a purchaſe for a ſum of money, of the government of Cele-Syria. This was the firſt thing that open'd Hyrcanus's eyes, and gave him terrible apprehenſions of miſchief from that quarter; neither were his apprehenſions groundleſs; for Herod was ſo exaſperated at the indignity of being expos'd to a trial, that he marched againſt him with an army; and if it had not been for the importunities and the interceſſions of his father, and his brother, he had moſt certainly fallen upon Jeruſalem itſelf; but upon their inſtances and entreaties, that he would content himſelf with the fright he had put them in, and ſtop there without offering any farther violence to the author of his dignity and fortune, they pacified and diverted him from his purpoſe. " 'Tis true, they ſaid,
" he had been cited; but he was brought off
" to, and lay under ſome obligation for his
" deliverance." They adviſed him likewiſe to conſider the uncertain chance of war, and how providence gave victories many times beyond and againſt human expectation; and that he had little to hope for in this cauſe from divine juſtice, conſidering that he fought not only againſt his prince, but againſt his very nouriſher and upholder, and one that had deſerved all good from him, without doing him any injury; or if he took any thing amiſs from him at preſent, it was rather to be imputed to the malevolence of evil counſellors he had about him, that had tranſported Hyrcanus into an evil opinion of him. Herod was ſo wrought upon by this way of advice and reaſoning, that he contented himſelf with ſhewing the people what power and reputation he had upon this occaſion; and this was the ſtate of affairs with the Jews at that time.

Hyrcanus adjourns the court.

Herod withdraws.

Herod tranſported againſt Hyrcanus.

CESAR being now return'd to Rome, was preparing for an expedition into Africa, againſt Scipio

Scipio and Cato, and saluted upon the way by ambassadors from Hyrcanus to solicit the renewing of a former league of friendship. It will be proper enough in this place to take notice of the honours our people have from time to time received from the Roman emperors, and the alliances that have pass'd betwixt us, to the end that the whole world may see what opinion the kings of Europe, as well as Asia, have ever had for the faith and courage of the Jews.

The histories of the Persians and Macedonians are not publickly known and dispers'd, 'tis true, and the authority of them may appear the less authentick; so that though we ourselves have their books, and they are to be had also elsewhere, and make honourable mention of us upon many occasions, we shall rather decline making any advantage of it, and cast the credit of our cause upon the decrees and proclamations of the Romans, the monumental inscriptions in their capitols, and upon pillars of brass; which are all testimonies and evidences, beyond contradiction; and so was that memorable inscription of Julius Cesar's, upon the brazen pillar in Alexandria, which serves as a record to perpetuate the privilege of free citizens, which was allow'd the Jews as a prerogative in that famous place. I shall now prosecute my purpose with the particular instances of certain orders and decrees of the senate, and of Julius Cesar, to the advantage of Hyrcanus and our whole nation.

Caius Julius Cesar, emperor, Pontifex Maximus, and the second time dictator, to the magistracy, senate, and the people of Sidon, greeting.

" I Myself, and my army are in health; and " if you are well, all is well. I send you " the copy of a letter of ours to Hyrcanus, " the son of Alexander, the prince and high-" priest of the Jews, to be engraved upon a " brass table, the inscription in Latin and " Greek, and to remain among your registers " for after-times. The letter itself in sub-" stance is as follows:

" C. Julius Cesar, emperor, the second " time dictator, and Pontifex Maximus, hath, " with the advice and consent of the senate, " appointed the publication of this decree.

" Forasmuch as Hyrcanus, the son of " Alexander a Jew, hath in all times, as well " in war as in peace, approved himself to be " our trusty good friend and ally, as appear-" eth by several attestations of unquestionable " credit, and particularly by the supply of " fifteen hundred choice men that he sent to " Mithridates, to my assistance in the late " Alexandrian war: these services and good " offices duly consider'd, I do hereby confirm " and establish unto Hyrcanus, and his heirs, " the perpetual government of the Jews, both " as their prince and high-priest, after the man-" ner and method of their own laws; and " from this time forward, enroll them among " my * trusty and well-beloved friends, and " ratify an affinity with them as my associates. " And it is my pleasure likewise, that all the † " legal pontifical rights and privileges be de-" volved upon him and his sons for ever; and " in case any controversy shall arise among " the people concerning the Jewish discipline, " himself and his family, in the course of suc-" cession, to be the only judges of it. It is " moreover my will and pleasure, that the " Jews be discharged the burden of winter " quarters, and of all publick payments."

We shall come now to some of his particular grants, resolutions, and decrees.

" It is ordered, Caius Cesar being consul, " that the government of the Jews shall de-" scend from Hyrcanus to his heirs for ever, " with all the possessions, grants, and emolu-" ments, belonging or annexed to the ponti-" ficate, the high-priest to have the judgment " of all causes. And it is likewise appointed, " that ambassadors be forthwith sent to Hyr-" canus the son of Alexander, the high-priest " of the Jews, with instructions to treat about " a friendly alliance with him; and that these " particulars be fairly inscrib'd upon brazen " tables in Latin and Greek, to be set up in " the capitol, at Tyre, Sidon, Askalon, and " in the temples, to the end that this our plea-" sure may be duly made known through all " our dominions, and that none may pretend " ignorance; and for the honour of our friends, " and for a recommendation of their agents " and ministers, to a singular respect and es-" teem in all places where they shall come.

" Caius Cesar, emperor, dictator, and " consul, taking into his consideration the ho-" nour, the friendship, and the || good services " of Hyrcanus, doth hereby, for the benefit " and advantage of the senate and people of " Rome, grant unto Hyrcanus, the son of " Alexander, and to his sons after him, by " an hereditary right of succession, the au-" thority and office of princes and priests of " Jerusalem, and of the whole nation of the " Jews, to be by them exercised and enjoy'd, " in such manner as their ancestors enjoy'd " and exercised the said dignities before them.

" Caius Cesar, the fifth time consul, hath " ordained and appointed that the city of Je-" rusalem shall be repair'd and fortified; and " that Hyrcanus the prince and high-priest of " the Jews, and the son of Alexander, shall " have the administration of the government, " with an abatement upon the duty every se-" cond year, of a part of their taxes, and an " exemption from carriages and other tributes.

" Caius Cesar, emperor, hath likewise " ordained, that the inhabitants of Jerusalem " shall pay a yearly tribute for itself and all " its dependencies, saving only the city of " Joppa, with an exemption of all duty from " the seventh year, which they call sabbatical, " or the year of rest; in which they neither " sow, plant, nor reap, either fruit or grain; " and it is his pleasure also, that the Jews in " Sidon pay a tribute of the fourth part of " their fruits every second year for a duty, be-" side the tenths to Hyrcanus and his sons, as " they have paid formerly to their predeces-" sors. And farther, that no governors, mi-" litary officers, or ambassadors, presume to " raise any soldiers, or impose any charges " upon the lands of the Jews, whether for " winter quarters, or upon any other pretext " whatsoever; but that they may hold all their

It is alſo our far- " ther will and pleaſure, that the city of Jop- " pa, which the Jews were poſſeſs'd of at their " firſt entrance into an alliance with the Ro- " mans, remain under the government of Hyr- " canus the ſon of Alexander and his family, " with all the revenues and advantages ariſing " from it, whether upon husbandry, port du- " ties, taxes, cuſtoms, anchorage, impoſitions " upon goods, and exportations of corn for " Sidon, once in two years, ſaving only the " ſabbatical year, wherein (as it is ſaid before) " they neither plow, plant, ſow, reap, nor " gather. As to the villages that Hyrcanus " and his anceſtors formerly poſſeſs'd in the " great plain, it is the will of the ſenate, that " they continue to Hyrcanus and the Jews in " manner as before, and that the ſame laws " and cuſtoms be ſtill preſerved and exerciſed " betwixt them and the prieſts, and all ad- " vantages made good that had been formerly " granted to them by the ſenate and the peo- " ple of Rome, the ſame privileges extending " even to Lydda itſelf. And whereas the " Romans had formerly beſtow'd upon the " kings of Syria and Cilicia, certain lands and " eſtates, in reſpect of an alliance betwixt " them, it is the pleaſure of the ſenate that " they ſtill continue in the poſſeſſion of Hyr- " canus the prince of the Jews. And farther, " that he himſelf, his ſon, and his ambaſſa- " dors, ſhall have places aſſign'd them among " the ſenators, to ſee the gladiators, and other " publick ſpectacles; and that upon any oc- " caſion of applying themſelves to the ſenate, " the dictator, or the maſter of the horſe, " ſhall introduce them to their audience, and " an anſwer to be returned them within ten " days, if the ſenate ſhall come to any reſo- " lution upon the matter.

" CAIUS JULIUS, the fourth time emperor, " the fifth time conſul, and perpetual dicta- " tor, makes this mention of Hyrcanus the " ſon of Alexander, the prince and the high- " prieſt of the Jews.

" WHEREAS application hath been " made unto us at Delos, by great " numbers of the Jews from ſeveral quarters, " complaining againſt you in the hearing and " preſence of your own ambaſſadors, for de- " nying the Jews the liberty of their country " laws, and the free enjoyment of their rites " and ſacrifices, they having likewiſe ſhew'd " us the inſtrument of interdiction itſelf; theſe " are to let you underſtand, that we will not " ſuffer any ſuch unreaſonable rigour to be " practiſed toward our friends and allies; but " our pleaſure is, on the contrary, that they " be let alone in the free and peaceable en- " joyment of their cuſtoms, feſtivals, and ſa- " crifices, being no more than the allowance " of a privilege which they enjoy in Rome " itſelf; for in the edict of Caius Ceſar, con- " ſul, prohibiting all publick meetings and " congregations in the city, the Jews alone " were permitted to meet together, feaſt and " make merry; and I myſelf, in another caſe " of prohibition, excepted the Jews likewiſe " out of that reſtraint, and left them to their " own ways and manners; wherefore if ſo it " be, that you have paſs'd any order to the " prejudice of our allies, in the privileges that " we have thought fit to allow them, it is " but juſt and reaſonable that you revoke, and " make void any ſuch decree out of a reſpect " to us, and to them for our ſakes, as they " are our friends and aſſociates."

AFTER the death of Ceſar, Marcus Antonius, and Publius Dolobella, being then conſuls, call'd a ſenate, and gave an audience to the ambaſſadors of Hyrcanus, upon the ſubject-matter of their inſtructions and deſires, ſtruck up a new league with them, and came to a reſolution at laſt, in favour of all their demands. This Dolobella having received letters from Hyrcanus, took an occaſion from thence to ſend diſpatches all over Aſia, and particularly to Epheſus, the metropolis of that province, in terms much to this effect:

*The * emperor Dolobella to the magiſtrates, ſenate, and people of Epheſus, greeting.*

* The ſtile of generals in thoſe days.

" WHEREAS we are given to under- " ſtand by Alexander the ſon of Theo- " dorus, and ambaſſador of Hyrcanus the " high-prieſt and prince of the Jews, in the " name of the ſaid Hyrcanus, that the Jews " being tied up by the religion, laws, and " conſtitutions of their country, not to bear " arms, travel, or ſo much as provide them- " ſelves neceſſaries for life, upon the day of " their ſabbath, are thereby render'd incapa- " ble of attending the duties and ſervices of " the war, we do therefore order and appoint, " according to what our predeceſſors have " done before us in the ſame caſe, that the " ſaid Jews be from this time forward ex- " empted from all military charges, and per- " mitted the liberty of meeting, worſhipping, " and ſacrificing, according to their own rule " and way. Given in court the 18th day of September.

We might produce ſeveral other imperial reſolutions and decrees of ſenate in favour of Hyrcanus and the Jewiſh nation, with letters recommendatory to the governors of cities and provinces, upon the ſubject of our rights and claims; for which we can ſhew authorities not to be doubted of by any equal and impartial judge, in juſtification of what we have here deliver'd. The proofs, in fine, of an amicable underſtanding of antient date, betwixt us and the Romans, are ſo firm and clear, that the record of it is yet to be ſeen to this day, upon brazen tables and pillars in the capitol, in perpetual memory of that alliance. It would be time loſt to be more particular in a caſe where there are ſo many undeniable evidences extant, in confirmation of the matter here exhibited; ſo that I ſhall rather caſt myſelf upon what I have ſaid already for the credit of what I could ſay farther, than tire out the reader with a tedious ſtory for the clearing of a thing that is indiſputable; wherefore let this ſuffice to ſhew the friendly correſpondence that paſs'd in former times betwixt the Romans and the Jews.

There happened at or about this time a deſperate ſedition in Syria, and it was upon this occaſion: Cecilius Baſſus, a Pompeian, enter'd into a plot upon the life of Sextus Ceſar. He got him treacherouſly murder'd, and immediately drew out his troops upon it, and took poſſeſſion of the province. This outrage was follow'd with a bloody war upon the borders of Apamia. The Ceſareans march'd againſt Baſſus with horſe and foot; Antipater with his ſons joining them, in honour to the memory of his illuſtrious benefactor; accounting himſelf bound both in honour and juſtice to take his revenge upon the murderer of ſo generous a friend. While the war was drawing out at length, * Marcus ſets up for ſucceſſor to Sextus; and in the mean time, Brutus and Caſſius, with a band of other conſpirators, aſſaſſinated Ceſar in the ſenate-houſe. He had now been three years and a half in his government, as appears by the whole current of hiſtorians.

CHAP. XVIII.

The death of Ceſar was follow'd by a civil war. Caſſius enters into a faction, and joins with Herod in horrible oppreſſions. People as well as places expoſed to ſale. Marcus in a plot againſt Antipater, and brings himſelf off by a falſe oath.

The death of Ceſar is follow'd with a civil war.

Caſſius makes a party, and draws Marcus and Baſſus into it.

Upon the death of Ceſar, the ſenators and the chief men of Rome fell preſently all into parties and factions, every man ſhifting and ſetting up for himſelf, till the confuſion broke out into a civil war. Caſſius got poſſeſſion of the army in Syria, which was then before Apamia; raiſed the ſiege, and brought over Marcus and Baſſus into his intereſt; took his progreſs from place to place, picking up men, money, and arms, more or leſs, wherever he came, but oppreſſing Judea above all the reſt, by an impoſition of betwixt † ſeven and eight hundred talents of ſilver. In the hurry of this diſtraction and confuſion, Antipater committed the care of levying one part of this money to his two ſons, and the reſt of it to Malichus, (one who had no great kindneſs for him,) together with ſome others. Herod, who was willing to oblige the Romans at other people's coſt, began with the moſt acceptable preſents to Caſſius, of the contribution of Galilee, as the firſt-fruits of his ſervice; but for ſeveral cities under other governors, they were expoſed to publick ſale, and ſold as by an outcry, people, places, and all, to him that would give moſt; as particularly the cities of Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, and Thamna, where the inhabitants, by Caſſius's order, were ſold by auction; and he was ſo exaſperated againſt Malichus, upon this occaſion, that if Hyrcanus had not pacified him with a compoſition of a hundred ‡ talents out of his own coffers, by the hands of Antipater, it would have coſt Malichus his life. So ſoon as Caſſius was gone off with his treaſure, Malichus enter'd into a practice againſt the perſon of Antipater, infering, that if he were once out of the way, Hyrcanus would find himſelf more eaſy and ſecure in his government. Antipater had ſuch an apprehenſion however of this deſign upon him, that for prevention ſake he forthwith paſs'd the river Jordan, and put himſelf at the head of as many Jews and Arabians as he could gather into a body; but Malichus, who was a bold and a cunning fellow, finding himſelf ſuſpected, went to Antipater and his ſons, bareface'd, and without more ado clear'd himſelf of the jealouſy by the dint of downright perjury. "Can any body imagine, "ſays he, that I ſhould be ſo arrant a fool, as "to entertain ſo much as the leaſt thought of "a plot, or a conſpiracy, when at the ſame "time Phaſael had the command of Jeruſalem, and Herod that of the arms and ma"gazines?" So that by this impudence, failing of his main end, he made his peace with Antipater. Marcus had at this time the government of Syria, who coming afterward to hear of new practices of Malichus in Judea, had certainly put him to death, if it had not been for the interceſſion of Antipater on his behalf.

Horrible oppreſſions under Caſſius and Herod.

People and places all put to ſale.

CHAP. XIX.

Marcus and Caſſius give Herod the command of the lower Syria. Malichus gets Antipater poiſon'd, but forſwears it. A bloody malice well diſſembled.

Antipater's good nature in this act of tenderneſs, was more than his diſcretion; for, as it fell out, he ſav'd Malichus only to deſtroy himſelf. When Marcus and Caſſius had gotten an army together, they gave Herod the command of it both by ſea and land, and at the ſame time made him governor of all Cele-Syria, with a further promiſe of the kingdom of Judea, ſo ſoon as the war ſhould be over with Anthony, and the younger Ceſar, afterward Auguſtus, which they were then engaged in. This promotion of Herod put Malichus into ſuch an apprehenſion and jealouſy of Antipater, that he got him poiſon'd for a ſum of money, by Hyrcanus's butler, one day at his maſter's table; and thereupon, with a guard of ſoldiers about him, took poſſeſſion of the city. This was the end of Antipater; a juſt and a good man, and a true lover of his country. Herod and Phaſael reſented this barbarous practice upon the perſon of their father, as they ought to do; but Malichus had the confidence however to forſwear all upon the main, and ſtand upon his juſtification. The two brothers were both agreed in the determination of a revenge; but the queſtion was, in what manner it was to be effected. Herod was for doing of it at the head of an army; but Phaſael rather by ſtratagem and ſurprize, for fear of embroiling the people in a civil war: So that he behaved to Malichus with an air of complacency, without diſcovering any ſuſpicion he had of him for the murder; employing himſelf at the ſame time upon the erecting of an illuſtrious monument to the honour of his dead father. Herod came about this time to Samaria, and finding every thing in great diſorder, he made it his buſineſs to ſet matters to rights again, and to compoſe all controverſies and diſputes among the inhabitants, by a regular courſe of law and juſtice. There came on ſoon after this, a ſolemn feſtival at Jeruſalem; upon which occaſion, Herod advanced with his army toward the city; where Malichus in a dread on the other hand, earneſtly preſs'd Hyrcanus not to give him admittance; who was accordingly prevail'd upon to refuſe him entrance, upon a pretext, that it would be a prophanation of the holy religion to communicate in their ceremonies and worſhip with ſtrangers. But Herod made light of this interdiction, and got into the town by night. This ſurprize put Malichus under dreadful apprehenſions; but he had the cunning however, to ſtick to his diſguiſe of tears and exclamations for the loſs of his dear friend Antipater, and at the ſame time privately to provide a guard for the ſecurity of his perſon. Herod's friends under theſe circumſtances, had no better expedient than to encounter his pretence of ſorrow and affliction on the one hand, with an artificial ſemblance of friendſhip and confidence on the other.

Malichus gets Antipater poiſoned;

but forſwears it. The two brothers reſolve upon a revenge.

Malice well diſſembled on both ſides.

Upon the taking of Loadicea afterward by Caſſius, and the people thronging to him with money and preſents, Herod made no doubt of an opportunity to gain his point upon that occaſion: But as Malichus was upon the way near Tyrus in Phenicia, his heart miſgave him, and that apprehenſion put him upon other meaſures. He had a ſon at that time an hoſtage in Tyre, and he thought with himſelf that if he could but ſteal him away into Judea, the Jews might be tamper'd to a revolt; and he himſelf take his advantage, while Caſſius was engaged in a war with Anthony, to poſſeſs himſelf of the government. The project was bold, and well enough contrived; if Herod's wonderful ſagacity and precaution had not diſappointed it, by ſending out ſeveral officers beforehand to meet Malichus and his train upon the way in their arms, under a pretext of inviting them into a collation; which they did accordingly, and falling upon him on the ſea-ſide of the town, they there diſpatch'd him with their daggers. The horror and ſurprize of this action ſtruck Hyrcanus ſpeechleſs; but upon coming a little to himſelf, and enquiring into particulars, Herod put a ſhort end to his curioſity, by telling him that it was all done by the command of Caſſius: Whereupon Hyrcanus ſeemed highly to approve the juſtice of the vengeance for the murder of Antipater, upon ſo lewd a man, and ſo treacherous an enemy to his country.

Maſichus ſtabb'd upon the way, under colour of friendſhip.

UPON the departure of Caſſius out of Syria, there follow'd great troubles in Judea. For Felix, with the troops that were under his command in Jeruſalem, made an attack upon Phaſael; and the people betook themſelves to their arms in his defence. Herod upon this, apply'd himſelf to Fabius the governor of Damaſcus, with a deſign to aſſiſt his brother; but was prevented for the preſent by a fit of ſickneſs, that put him out of condition to ſerve him. Phaſael however had the good fortune to do his buſineſs without him, and to force Felix for ſanctuary into a ſtrong hold upon terms: Phaſael reproaching Hyrcanus all this while with ingratitude to the higheſt degree, in ſiding with his enemy, after ſo many obligations as he had laid upon him; for the brother of Malichus had at that time gotten ſeveral fortify'd places into his hand, and Maſada among the reſt, which was look'd upon as a fort in a manner impregnable; but Herod upon his recovery, took them all back again, and ſo diſmiſs'd him upon articles of agreement betwixt them.

Caſſius and Herod join to revenge Antipater's murder. Malichus ſtabb'd under a colour of friendſhip.

Caſſius joins with Herod to revenge Antipater's murder.

THE character of Malichus was ſo well known to Caſſius, that he order'd Herod, immediately upon the news of Antipater's death, to revenge it upon the head of the murderer, privately commanding the troops alſo that were then at Tyre to his aſſiſtance.

Antigonus raiſes an army. Herod's tenderneſs for the Tyrians. He deſeats Antigonus, and marries Mariamne.

ANTIGONUS, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, a near kinſman of Ptolemy Menneus, and for affinity ſake, by him adopted, engaged Fabius for a ſum of money to join with him in the drawing of an army together, taking Marion alſo into his aſſiſtance, who, by the favour of Caſſius, had gotten the command of Tyre, and the power of all Syria into his hand, having ſettled ſeveral gariſons there, and three in in Galilee itſelf, upon his own borders; but Herod quickly reduced theſe places, treating the Tyrians that had the keeping of them, not only with fair quarter, but with reſpect, tenderneſs, and even with preſents too, for the love he bore to the people themſelves. His next buſineſs was immediately to march up to Antigonus, whom he encounter'd and defeated upon his very entrance into Judea, and returning triumphant from thence to Jeruſalem, he was received by Hyrcanus and the whole people, with all poſſible inſtances of honour and eſteem; for being now upon the point of a match with the daughter of Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, and of Alexandra the daughter of Hyrcanus, Herod was conſider'd as a branch of the family; and the marriage being conſummated ſoon after, he had by this wife three ſons and two daughters; having had a former wife of his own country, whoſe name was Dores, by whom he had his eldeſt ſon Antipater.

CHAP. XXII.

Caſſius routed by Anthony and Brutus. Complains againſt Phaſael and Herod. Hyrcanus preſſes Anthony for ſatisfaction againſt Caſſius. Several edicts in favour of the Jews.

AFTER the defeat of Caſſius at Philippi, by Anthony and Auguſtus, Ceſar went his way into Gaul, and Anthony into Aſia, who was complimented upon his march in Bithynia with embaſſies and applications from ſeveral parts; and among others, he was encounter'd with complaints and accuſations againſt Phaſael and Herod, from many eminent perſons among the Jews, ſuggeſting that Hyrcanus, though he had the name of a governor, was in effect, but a mock prince; for that the two brothers had uſurp'd the authority and adminiſtration to themſelves. Herod pleaded ſo well for himſelf, and ſeconded his reaſons with ſo large a ſum of money, that his adverſaries were not ſo much as admitted to be heard againſt him. Upon Anthony's coming up to Epheſus, ambaſſadors were ſent from Hyrcanus the high-prieſt, and the whole body of the Jews, with a crown of gold, ſupplications, and preſents; deſiring that their countrymen, who were carried away priſoners by Caſſius, contrary to the rules of war, might be ſet at liberty, and their lands reſtored to them, that had been wrongfully taken away; deſiring Anthony's letters to the provinces in their favour to this purpoſe. Their requeſt was found to be ſo reaſonable, Anthony preſently granted their petition, and wrote to Hyrcanus, and to the Jews, and likewiſe diſpatch'd an edict to the Tyrians, to this following effect:

Caſſius routed at Philippi by Anthony and Auguſtus.

Complaints to Anthony againſt Phaſael and Herod.

Herod pleads his cauſe with preſents. Hyrcanus and the body of the Jews preſs Anthony for juſtice upon Caſſius.

Marcus Antonius, emperor, to Hyrcanus the high-prieſt, and prince of the Jews, greeting, joy and health.

Anthony to the magiſtrates of Tyre.

"WHEREAS we have received from Lyſimachus the ſon of Pauſanias, Joſeph the ſon of Menneus, and Alexander the ſon of Theodorus, your ambaſſadors, at Epheſus, freſh aſſurances of the continuance of yours and your people's affection for us, according to what hath been formerly exhibited to us at Rome; in which commiſſion they have faithfully and worthily acquitted themſelves; and whereas we are abundantly ſatisfied in the ſincerity of your intentions, and more from the proof we have had of your good faith, piety, and virtue, than by the force of words, we do heartily agree to your propoſals, and embrace your friendſhip. Now ſince ſo it is that the enemies, both of ourſelf, and of the people of Rome, have laid waſte and ravaged the whole country of Aſia, without any regard to ſocieties, laws, or holy places, oaths, promiſes, or contracts, we have turned our arms againſt theſe violaters of all duties, ſacred and civil; not for any particular intereſt of our own, but in vindication of the common cauſe of mankind. As in the caſe of the horrid murder of Ceſar, a villainy ſo black and hideous, that the ſun itſelf was confounded at the ſight of it: the execrable aſſaſſins betook themſelves, ſome of them at leaſt, into Macedonia, as if it had been to fight the old quarrel againſt the gods over again there. Such was their outrageous malice at the battle of Philippi, where having poſſeſſed themſelves of all the faſtneſſes and ſtrong places, up to the very ſea, under the cover of almoſt impaſſable mountains, they were ſo poſted, that there was only one way open to come at them. But theſe difficulties notwithſtanding, divine juſtice gave us ſo entire a victory over the ſacrilegious rebels, that we beat Brutus and Caſſius into the town; where finding themſelves environ'd, they both periſhed together; ſo that having inflicted a juſt vengeance upon the heads of theſe monſters, we are now in hope to ſee peaceable days again, and Aſia, that looks like a body already recovering out of a deſperate diſtemper by the benefit of this relief, deliver'd finally from the outrages of a devouring war. And it ſhall be our care likewiſe to provide that you and your people may come in for an ample ſhare in the comfort of ſo great a bleſſing. To this end we have already diſpatch'd away our mandates from place to place for the immediate diſcharge of all the Jews, as well bond as free, that had been expoſed to ſale by Caſſius, or his order. And it is our farther pleaſure, that you ſhall quietly enjoy to yourſelves and your heirs, all the graces and privileges unto you granted by myſelf and Dolobella, with an expreſs inhibition to the Tyrians, that they give you no ſort of moleſtation, and as poſitively commanding them to make full reſtitution of all the goods and eſtates that had been taken away from the Jews, declaring our acceptance alſo of the crown you were pleaſed to ſend."

Marcus Antonius, emperor, to the magiſtrates, ſenate, and people of Tyre, greeting.

"WHEREAS we have been given to underſtand at Epheſus, by the ambaſſadors of Hyrcanus the high-prieſt, and prince of the Jews, that in the time when our enemies were in poſſeſſion of this province, you enter'd upon the lands of ſeveral of this people for your own uſe, be it now known unto you, that as we engaged in this " war for the good of the empire, and for the " maintenance of piety and juſtice, againſt a " band of ungrateful rebels; ſo we do hereby " will and require you, not only to live in " peace and amity with our allies, but alſo to " reſtore to the former proprietors whatever " you have of theirs that was taken from " them by the hands of our enemies; who, " as they had no manner of right thereunto " themſelves, by any commiſſion or authority " from the ſenate; ſo neither could they con- " vey any right to others, upon whom they " pretended to beſtow it, being only the mer- " cenary inſtruments of their violence and " uſurpation. And now having brought our " adverſaries to condign puniſhment, we find " it reaſonable to re-eſtabliſh our allies in the " full and quiet enjoyment of their eſtates; " wherefore if you have in your hands at pre- " ſent any lands or eſtates formerly belonging " to Hyrcanus the prince of the Jews, which " you came to be ſeized of in the time, or " under the countenance of Caſſius's unrigh- " teous invaſion, it is our will that they be " forthwith deliver'd up to the perſons from " whom they were taken, without any oppo- " ſition or delay; and in caſe of any doubt or " difficulty that may ariſe upon the equity of " the matter, it ſhall be our care when we " come into thoſe parts, to hear both ſides, " and to diſcharge juſtice impartially."

" I HAVE ſent you my mandate, which " you are to ſee carefully tranſcrib'd in " Latin and Greek, and expoſed upon a table " among your records, in a publick place " where all people may take notice of it."

And again.

Marcus Antonius, emperor and triumvir, &c. as follows.

" WHEREAS Caius Caſſius, taking ad- " vantage of our troubles and diſtrac- " tions, broke in with a body of vagabond " troops upon a province where he had no- " thing at all to do, and without the leaſt co- " lour of any warrantable title or pretenſion; " ravaging and deſtroying the country and the " whole nation of the Jews, though our dear " friends and allies; and continuing thoſe out- " rages, till by our arms we brought down " the pride and inſolence of theſe preſump- " tuous uſurpers; it is our expreſs will and " command now for the reparation of all theſe " indignities, (as far as in us lies,) to ordain " and appoint, that reſtitution or ſatisfaction " be forthwith made to our allies the Jews, " for whatſoever hath been forcibly taken " from them, and the perſons of all their pri- " ſoners to be ſet at liberty; and we do like- " wiſe require that this our decree be punc- " tually obſerved, upon pain of our utmoſt " diſpleaſure."

ANTHONY wrote to the ſame purpoſe alſo to the people of Sidon, Antioch, and Arad, which we think reaſonable to give an account of in this place, to the end that poſterity may know how great an honour and reſpect our nation has received time after time from the ſtate of Rome.

CHAP. XXIII.

Anthony's encounter with Cleopatra. Heavy complaints againſt Herod and Phaſael. The cauſe tried, and council heard. Anthony adviſes with Hyrcanus. The ingratitude of Herod's accuſers.

ANTHONY paſſing after this into Syria, was met and complimented by Cleopatra upon the way in Cilicia, where he fell deſperately in love with her. Application was alſo made to him by a matter of a hundred eminent perſons of the firſt quality of the Jews, with complaints and accuſations againſt Herod and Phaſael, bringing along with them a ſelect choice of the beſt ſpeakers they had for their advocates. Meſſala was of council for the two brothers, being likewiſe ſeconded by Hyrcanus, who was at this time by marriage become father-in-law to Herod. The cauſe was tried at Daphne; where, upon full hearing of both ſides, Anthony put it to Hyrcanus, which of the two was the beſt qualified for the office of a governor, who made anſwer, that he took Herod to be the more competent adminiſtrator of the two. Anthony had ſo great a tenderneſs and reſpect for the two young men, upon the ſcore of paſt kindneſs received from their father Antipater, who took him into his protection when Gabinius made war upon Judea, that he confer'd upon them both the dignity of Tetrarchs, and committed Judea to their care. He wrote ſeveral letters alſo in their favour, and impriſon'd fifteen of the moſt violent of their proſecutors, with a reſolution to have put them all to death, if Herod by his mediation had not diverted the execution. But this generoſity of Herod's had no effect at all upon the implacable malice of his enemies; for they were no ſooner diſmiſs'd from their embaſſy, but they entered into new practices againſt the life of their preſerver, immediately upon their return; and drawing together to the number of a thouſand perſons of the faction, they marched in a body to Tyre, to wait for Anthony's coming thither. But Herod and his brother had already made ſo powerful an intereſt by the force of money and preſents, that Anthony ſent his orders to the magiſtracy of the place, to aſſiſt Herod in the ſupport of his authority, and to do juſtice upon the Jewiſh ambaſſadors, as a parcel of ſeditious innovators, that were in a deſign to overturn the government. But Herod gave yet a ſecond inſtance of his humanity and good nature, in repairing to the deputies as they were advancing up to the city, and adviſing them by all means to withdraw themſelves in time; Hyrcanus joining with Herod in the ſame advice, and deſiring them to retire, for fear of what miſchief might befal them if they perſiſted in that appeal. But theſe people, in contempt of all counſels and dangers, kept on their way till they were ſet upon and overborn by multitudes of both Jews and inhabitants; great numbers of them being kill'd and wounded, and the reſt diſpers'd, which put a final end to that controverſy; not but that the common people ſtill perſever'd loudly to exclaim againſt Herod's proceedings, which irritated Anthony to that degree, that he commanded all the priſoners to be put to death.

The ingratitude of Herod's accuſers, which coſt them their lives in the concluſion.

In the year following Pacorus the ſon of the king of Parthia and Barzapharnes, a prince of the country, made themſelves maſters of Syria; and Ptolemy Menneus dying at the ſame time, his ſon Lyſanias ſucceeded him, having contracted a particular friendſhip with Antigonus the ſon of Ariſtobulus, by the means of Barzapharnes, who was held in very great eſteem by him.

Antigonus contracts with the Parthians to depoſe Hyrcanus, and put Herod and his brothers to death.

ANTIGONUS contracted with the Parthians for a * thouſand talents, and five hundred women, upon the depoſing of Hyrcanus, and receiving him for governor in his ſtead; and at the ſame time put Herod to death and all his party. The ſum agreed upon was not depoſited, but the Parthians, however, enter'd upon the undertaking, and marched with an army againſt Judea, Pacorus by the way of the coaſt, and Barzapharnes through the inland. The Tyrians ſtood upon their guard againſt Pacorus, and kept him out of the city; but the people of Sidon and Ptolemais open'd their gates and receiv'd him. He detached, upon this, a party of horſe upon the ſcout, under the command of the king's cup-bearer, whoſe name alſo was Pacorus, to diſcover the ſtate of the country, and to ſecond Antigonus, if there ſhould be occaſion. The Jews of Mount Carmel ſided with Antigonus, who fancied that by their aſſiſtance he might make himſelf maſter of that part of the country which they call Drymœ, and he was perſuaded by others alſo that came over to him, to puſh forward, even to Jeruſalem itſelf; which he did accordingly by the help of ſeveral ſtrong enforcements that join'd him with a reſolution to attack Herod and Phaſael in the royal palace; but while this was in agitation, the two brothers, with a conſiderable body of their friends and party, fell upon them in the market-place; and beating them from their poſt, they fled into the temple. Herod clapt a guard of ſoldiers into the adjoining houſes, for the better ſecurity of the place; but the multitude breaking violently in upon them before they could be reliev'd, ſet fire to the buildings over their heads, and burnt the houſes to aſhes, together with the defendants. Soon after this outrage, Herod had his revenge, in a defeat he gave them with a very great ſlaughter. They continued skirmiſhing from day to day, till toward the feaſt of Pentecoſt, which Antigonus and his party expected with great impatience, becauſe of the mighty confluence of people that reſorted thither upon that ſolemnity. The time being come, there were ſeveral thouſands gather'd together about the temple; ſome with arms, others without, and the city as well as the temple crowded with them, all but the palace, which Herod, with a ſmall party, maintain'd, the charge of the walls and outworks being committed to Phaſael. The enemy having poſted themſelves in the ſuburbs, Herod made a brave and a deſperate ſally upon them, wherein he did great execution, driving ſeveral thouſands before him; ſome into the temple, ſome into the city, and forcing others to take ſanctuary behind a rampart that was there at hand; Phaſael alſo acquitting himſelf in this action like a man of honour. Pacorus, in the mean time, at the inſtance of Antigonus, with a ſmall party, enter'd the city upon a pretence to keep the people quiet, and put a ſtop to the tumult; but with a deſign, in truth, to advance Antigonus to the government. Phaſael, after this, treated them with great reſpect, both upon the way, and at his own palace, and Pacorus requited the civility with a practice upon his life, which was carried on under colour of an embaſſy to Barzapharnes; which Phaſael, being a credulous man, was eaſily prevail'd upon to undertake, though ſo much againſt Herod's opinion, that he was abſolutely for cutting off Pacorus, and the whole crew that came along with him, to prevent a worſe miſchief, being too well acquainted with the infidelity of the barbarous people he had to do withal, to truſt them. But ſo it was, however, that Hyrcanus and Phaſael put themſelves upon their journey with Pacorus to conduct them, leaving a guard of two hundred horſe with Herod, and ten of thoſe people that they call freemen. Upon their arrival at Galilee, the commanders of the neighbouring gariſons came out in their arms to meet them, and none forwarder than Barzapharnes, with fair words and preſents to bid them welcome, though his heart, upon the whole matter was full of treachery. Phaſael and his train were conducted to a quarter upon the ſea ſide, where being given to underſtand, that the Parthians were to have a thouſand talents, and five hundred women, of Antigonus, for this piece of ſervice, he began to have an apprehenſion of foul play, over and above that he had notice given him of a deſign upon him that very night, and that there was a guard of ſoldiers in readineſs to ſeize upon his perſon. And the plot had certainly been put in execution, if they had not waited for the intelligence of Herod's being ſecured at Jeruſalem by the Parthians, as it was concerted among themſelves; for if the other two had been taken up firſt, Herod might have had time enough, they thought, to make his eſcape, and ſecure himſelf. The information of this contrivance was quickly found to be true, by the coming up of the guards that were to do the exploit. Upon this diſcovery ſeveral of Phaſael's people urged him immediately to take horſe and away; Ophellius eſpecially, who by the means of Saramella, (one of the greateſt men for eſtate in all Syria,) had detected the conſpiracy; and living near the ſea, offer'd him the convenience of ſhipping to carry him off; but Phaſael was too generous to abandon his friends in their diſtreſs; ſo that he choſe rather to go directly to Barzapharnes, and charge him in plain terms with the indignity of so dishonourable a practice. "If money, says he, be your business, Phasael, me-thinks, should be better able to gratify you that way than Antigonus, beside the scandalous barbarity of so horrid a violence upon the persons of ambassadors, in opposition to all the laws of good faith, hospitality, and nations." The Barbarian forswore the whole matter from one end to the other, alledging he tormented himself with groundless jealousies, and so went his way to Pacorus.

Hyrcanus and Phasael taken up by the Parthians. A plot upon Herod.

BARZAPHARNES had no sooner turn'd his back, but a party of soldiers seized and put in chains Hyrcanus and Phasael, who highly exclaim'd against so perjurious and so barbarous a practice; an eunuch being dispatch'd away at the same time also for the apprehension of Herod, if they could but inveigle him out of his palace. But he had got such intelligence already of the design they had upon him, and the intercepting of his correspondence with his brother, that he went directly to expostulate the matter with Pacorus, and the leading men of the Parthians, who gave him for answer, that they knew nothing at all of the business, though in truth they were privy to the whole intrigue. They told him, indeed, if he had any doubt of his brother's welfare, he could not do better than to go out of town with them to meet his letters upon the way, for fear of their falling into wrong hands; but having heard so much of his brother's ill usage, and being also confirm'd in his suspicion of the Parthians, by the opinion of Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus, a woman of singular prudence, and whose daughter he was to marry, Herod govern'd himself by her caution and advice, whatever the rest said to the contrary. Upon this occasion the Parthians consulted together what course to take, and gave themselves time till next day to consider of it; for they did not think fit to venture an assault upon so great a man as Herod was, in the face of the sun; but Herod reflecting upon the distraction they were in, with the certain knowledge he had of the perfidious violence they had committed upon his brother, (though the Parthians told him it was all false,) and consequently the desperate hazard of staying any longer among those people, he bethought himself of giving them the slip that very night; and so taking the opportunity of the dusk of the evening, he resolved to attempt his escape. He took along with him all the troops he had about him; provided waggons, and horses, and other beasts of carriage for the women and his train, as his mother, sister, and Mariamne, his contracted mistress, the daughter of Alexander, and the neice of Aristobulus, with his spouse's mother, the daughter of Hyrcanus, the youngest brother, and the rest of his company and family, marching away altogether toward Idumea, and well advanced upon the way before their enemies took notice of it. It was a spectacle to make the most insensible heart to bleed; the sight of the poor women hurrying away with sucking children at their breasts with tears and outcries, leaving their country in misery, and their friends in bonds, and in an hourly expectation of falling under the same fate themselves.

Herod flips away with all his people.

BUT Herod stood as firm as a rock all this while, against the uttermost iniquities of a cross fortune, and did all that was possible to do, both by his example, and by his counsels, to keep up the hearts of his companions. He told them that there was no possibility of safety, or any thought of life, but in flight, encouraging them to hope the best, and not to ruin themselves by fruitless lamentations and despairs, but rather bear up and assist toward their own deliverance. Upon these words they took up a resolution becoming the occasion. There fell out, just upon this, an unlucky accident by the overturning of a waggon, which put his mother in extreme danger of her life. This disaster made such an impression upon Herod, partly out of a filial tenderness for his mother, and in part for fear of being overtaken by the advantage of this stop, that he had certainly cast himself upon the point of his own sword, if his friends about him had not laid hold of him, and prevented it; for this, they told him, would have been the sacrificing of his friends to the fury of his enemies; neither was it the part of a brave man to indulge his own particular to the damage of the publick. He was, in fine, betwixt force and shame, brought to better reason, and thereupon betook himself immediately to the care of his mother, by all manner of good offices that the place and the time would bear, prosecuting his journey to the castle of Massada with all the speed he could; the Parthians pressing upon him in his passage, with whom he had many skirmishes, but always got the better. Nay, the very Jews were upon the pursuit of him too; and coming up with him when he was gotten a matter of threescore * furlongs in his way from Jerusalem, they formally attack'd him, but were beaten back, and put to the rout; and notwithstanding this hurry and confusion, the fight was managed on Herod's part with all exactness of order and discipline. When he came afterward to be king of Judea, he erected a famous palace upon that spot of ground where he obtained this victory, and built a village near the place, which he called by the name of Herodium. Coming afterwards to Resa in Idumea, he was met by his brother Joseph, and they two laid their heads together, how they might ease them-

The caſtle of Maſſada that they pitch'd upon for their retreat, was too little for the whole body: So that they diſmiſs'd about nine thouſand of their people to provide the beſt they could for themſelves up and down in Idumea, with a viaticum for their entertainment, till they could find ſome quarter to ſettle in. As for thoſe that were fit for action, and his near relations, Herod took them along with him into the caſtle, where he diſpos'd of the women and their families to the number of about eight hundred perſons; and ſo leaving them a competence of proviſion of bread-corn, water, and all other neceſſaries, he haſten'd away to Petra, the capital city of Arabia.

Jeruſalem beſieged.

By break of day the Parthians made ſpoil of all that Herod had left in Jeruſalem, as well in the city as the palace, ſaving only three hundred * talents in caſh, of Hyrcanus's, which they left behind them untouch'd, and divers conſiderable pieces of Herod's too, beſide what goods and treaſure he had tranſported before-hand into Idumea, to ſecure them from danger. And the Parthians were not content neither with the wealth and plunder of the city, without depopulating the country alſo; beſide the laying of Mariſſa, a place of great riches and ſtrength, in rubbiſh.

Mariſſa demoliſh'd.

Antigonus put in poſſeſſion of the government. Hyrcanus and Phaſael deliver'd up to him in bonds. Hyrcanus's ears cut off by the order of Antigonus.

ANTIGONUS being now put into the poſſeſſion of the government by the king of Parthia, Hyrcanus and Phaſael were deliver'd up to him in bonds. But the eſcape of the women was yet a great diſappointment to him; for the Parthians were by contract to receive the women with the money. Hyrcanus being at this time a priſoner, Antigonus order'd both his ears to be cut off, deſigning by that maim to put him into a legal incapacity for the honour of the pontificate: Not knowing but that a popular faction ſome time or other, in a freak, might otherwiſe reſtore him to the government.

But there was nothing greater in this extraordinary juncture, than the generous magnanimity of Phaſael; who, when he found that he was certainly to die, was not ſo much troubled at the death itſelf, as at the reproachful circumſtances of lying at the will and pleaſure of an inſulting enemy. Finding himſelf in this extremity, and his hands ſo manacled, that there was no execution to be done that way, he beat out his brains againſt a ſtone-wall; accounting it much more honourable to act that violence upon himſelf, than to ſuffer the ſame thing by the hand of another. Some will have it that the contuſion was not mortal, and that the ſurgeons appointed by Antigonus, under pretence of aſſiſting him, were in truth to diſpatch him; and that they dreſs'd the wound with poiſons inſtead of proper remedies. He liv'd long enough however, to underſtand that his brother Herod was at that time ſafe, and out of the hands of his adverſaries, which made his death welcome and eaſy to him, in the ſatisfaction of leaving one behind him, that would avenge his blood upon the heads of his adverſaries.

HEROD, after all this, was ſo far from ſinking, either in his courage, or in his preſence of mind, though ſurrounded with almoſt inſuperable misfortunes, that his reſolution and his ſenſe of things, ſeemed rather the ſtronger and the ſharper, for the difficulties he had to encounter. His firſt application was to Malchus the king of Arabia, to borrow a ſum of money of him now in his diſtreſs, either upon credit and conſideration, or elſe upon the ſcore of humanity and bounty; not doubting of a fair and friendly return from a prince that was already indebted to him for many ſignal obligations. Now he had heard nothing as yet of the death of his brother; and his preſent buſineſs was to provide himſelf with three hundred talents for his immediate ranſom, taking a ſon of Phaſael's, of about ſeven years old, along with him, as a pawn to the Arabians for the ſecurity of their money. Upon this point of time, there came meſſengers from Malchus with orders to Herod to depart the country, for the Parthians were abſolutely againſt the receiving of him. His anſwer was, that he did not come to be either a trouble or a charge to any body, but only to treat about ſome important affairs of his own. The coarſeneſs of this uſage was look'd upon to be only a trick of ſome of the great ones, to avoid the payment of a juſt debt, and to cozen Herod of the treaſure that Antipater had depoſited in their hands.

HEROD, upon bethinking himſelf, found it his beſt courſe to be gone, how unſatisfy'd ſoever with the indignities they had put upon him: So away he went toward Egypt, taking a certain temple in his way, where he had left ſeveral of his company. He was told next day at Rhynocura of the death of his brother. Malchus was by this time become ſenſible of his ingratitude, and haſten'd all he could after Herod, to make him ſome amends, but could not overtake him; for he was gone a great way before toward Peluſium; and when he came thither, the ſhip that was bound for Alexandria, would not take him in: Whereupon he addreſs'd himſelf to the magiſtrates of the place, who, out of a reverence to the dignity of his former character, conducted him with great reſpect into the city, where he was generouſly entertained by Cleopatra, and not without earneſt invitations to make a longer ſtay there: But his heart was ſo ſet upon going to Rome, that neither Cleopatra's entreaties, nor the difficulties of a winter voyage, nor the general talk of troubles at that time in Italy, nor all this together, was ſufficient to divert him from his purpoſe.

HE went aboard, in fine, for Pamphylia, and after ſo terrible a tempeſt that the mariners were forc'd to caſt their goods and baggage over-board, to ſave their veſſel; with much ado at laſt he got ſafe to Rhodes, where he had the good hap to meet with Sappinas and Ptolemy. He found the town ſo miſerably harraſs'd by the war with Caſſius, that he contributed out of the ſmall remainder of his fortune, more than in truth he could well ſpare, toward the repair of the ruins. ## CHAP. XXVI.

Herod in great favour with Auguſtus and Anthony; choſen king of Judea; and conducted by Anthony and Ceſar to the capitol. Antigonus preſſes hard upon Maſſada. Ventidius ſqueezes money out of him.

THE ſad ſtory of Herod's adventures gave Anthony a compaſſionate tenderneſs for him; and not without juſt reflections neither, how ſoon it might come to be his own caſe, conſidering the power and unſteadineſs of fortune in raiſing up, and caſting down. He call'd to mind alſo the good offices he had formerly receiv'd from Antipater, Herod's father, and the ancient friendſhip that had paſs'd betwixt them; not forgetting at the ſame time the ſum of money he was to have, upon his advancing Herod to be king, as he had before made him a Tetrarch. This was all in Herod's favour; but the thing that ſtruck the main ſtroke at laſt, was the averſion he had for Antigonus, whom he look'd upon as a buſy turbulent ſpirit, and a profeſs'd enemy to Rome: So that even out of ſpite to Antigonus, he reſolved to befriend Herod all he could. Auguſtus alſo join'd his intereſt with Anthony in the promoting of Herod's pretenſion and requeſt; partly upon the ſcore of acknowledgment for former ſervices, and partly for old acquaintance ſake betwixt the two families; for his father and Antipater had been fellow-ſoldiers in Egypt together, over and above the deſire he had to gratify Anthony himſelf, in the perſon of his friend. The matter was ſoon after brought before the ſenate, where Meſſala and Atratenus preſented Herod with a ſingular recommendation of him to their kindneſs and eſteem upon the account, both of his own, and of his father's ſervices and good affections to the ſtate of Rome; reproaching Antigonus on the other ſide, as a publick enemy, not only for paſt miſdemeanours, but for his late acceptance of the government from the hands of the Parthians, in contempt of the Romans. When this harangue had put the ſenate in a heat, Anthony laid hold of the occaſion and gave his opinion, that conſidering the ſtate of the preſent war with the Parthians, they could not do better than to conſtitute Herod king of Judea; and the motion paſs'd the aſſembly without any oppoſition. The honour was illuſtrious in itſelf; Herod's obligation to Anthony in the procuring of it, was much the more valuable for being confer'd upon him, not only beyond his hope and expectation, but likewiſe the method and meaſure of ordinary practice; for the Romans did not uſe to beſtow royal dignities but upon the branches of royal families. Neither did his very ambition aſpire to any thing more than to beg it for Alexander the brother of Mariamne; the nephew of Ariſtobulus by the father's ſide, and of Hyrcanus by the mother's; whom he cauſed afterward to be put to death, as will be ſeen in its proper place. This great work was but ſeven days a doing, and Herod diſpatch'd away out of Italy with his royal commiſſion.

Herod choſen king of Judea by the ſenate, without oppoſition, upon the motion of Anthony.

UPON the breaking up of the ſenate, Anthony and Ceſar took Herod out betwixt them, accompany'd with the conſuls and the ſenators, who conducted him to the capitol, where they were to ſacrifice in form, and to depoſite the decrees of the ſenate. Anthony gratulated the new king upon his acceſſion to his authority with a moſt magnificent treat; upon the firſt day of his reign, in the Olympiad one hundred eighty four, C. Domitius Calvinus, (now the ſecond time) and C. Aſinius Pollio, conſuls.

Herod conducted by Anthony and Ceſar to the capitol.

IN this interim of Herod's abſence, Antigonus preſs'd hard upon his friends in the caſtle of Maſſada, where they had plenty of all ſorts of proviſions, ſave only of water; which they wanted to ſuch a degree, that Joſeph with a party of two hundred choice men, had taken a reſolution to ſally out of the town, and attempt the forcing their way through the enemy, to get to the Arabians; being well informed that Malchus had heartily repented himſelf of the inhoſpitality of his late behaviour toward Herod: But in this nick of time, there fell ſo prodigious a ſhower of rain, that it fill'd all their ciſterns and receptacle, for water; and upon this ſupply, they ſtood to their defence, without any further thoughts of quitting the place. The wonderful providence of this relief animated the beſieged to that degree, that not a day or a night paſs'd without a ſucceſsful ſally upon the enemy.

Antigonus preſſes hard upon Maſſada in Herod's abſence

WHILE this was doing, Ventidius, a Roman general, drove the Parthians out of Syria, and went afterward into Judea, under pretence of a deſign to help Joſeph, but in truth to ſqueeze money out of Antigonus; which he did abundantly upon drawing his troops toward Jeruſalem: And having gain'd his point, he carry'd the greater part of them off again; leaving only a ſmall remainder under the command of Silo, for the better colour of the cheat; for Antigonus was forced to come to a compoſition with him too, for fear he might be troubleſome before the arrival of the Parthians, who he expected to come up to his ſuccour.

Herod comes back from Italy, and marches toward Antigonus.

HEROD was now come back again out of Italy as far as Ptolemais, with a considerable body, both of auxiliaries and of his own people, and was upon his march by the way of Galilee toward Antigonus. Silo and Ventidius had orders brought them also from Anthony by Gellius, to assist Herod in the taking possession of his kingdom. But so it fell out, that Ventidius was at that time taken up in quieting the tumults, that an incursion of the Parthians had raised in several of the cities: But Silo was in Judea, and a pensioner to Antigonus. Herod's army gather'd however daily, and encreased mightily upon the march. Galilee was in a manner wholly for him. The thing he was the most intent upon in the first place, was the raising of the siege of Massada, to set his friends and relations at liberty, that were coop'd up there. But Joppa was a block in his way, and would be such a check upon him in his advance to Jerusalem, that there was no leaving so strong a place behind him. Silo upon this, march'd off; and the Jews plying him close in the rear, Herod charged in upon them with a small party; routed them, and brought off Silo, when he was just falling into their hands. Herod, after this made himself master of Joppa, and so immediately went away to the relief of his friends in Massada, where the people came over to him in abundance; some for his father's sake, others for his own; some again out of a sense of the obligations they had to both; but the generality, out of the hope they had to ingratiate themselves with the new king. Antigonus, in the mean time, laid several ambushes and traps for him in his way, though with little effect; for Herod, so soon as ever he had rais'd the siege of Massada, relieved his friends, and taking the castle of Resa, he advanced directly toward Jerusalem with Silo's troops, and a great number of citizens that stood in awe of his power to attend him. He encamped with his army upon the west quarter of the town, where the defendants gull'd him all that was possible with arrows, darts and strong sallies: Herod, in the mean while making proclamation in form, by his herald from place to place round the walls of the town, that he had no other end in that enterprize than the publick good and the welfare of the city; nay, that he was so far from contriving, or designing them any mischief, that he was ready to grant them an indemnity and oblivion, without exception to any person whatsoever, let the crime or indignity have been never so spiteful and notorious. Antigonus made answer, addressing himself to Silo and the Roman soldiers, that it was a very unjust, and an unreasonable thing to pretend the setting of Herod upon the throne; a private man, and an Idumean: That is to say, but half a Jew neither; which was a practice directly against the law and right of succession that was customary among them. If they took any offence at his receiving the crown from the hands of the Parthians; and for that reason thought fit to depose him from the dignity, there were others, he told them, of the royal and sacerdotal line, and persons who had deserved every jot as well from the Romans, and had as fair a title to the government; and it would be great iniquity to deprive them of it. This contest betwixt Herod and Antigonus grew so hot, that they came at last to opprobrious language; insomuch that Antigonus commanded his men to force the enemy off from the walls; and they ply'd them so hard with their darts and arrows, that they were obliged to retire. It was no longer any doubt after this, but that Silo was corrupted; for he had so tamper'd divers of his familiar acquaintance among the soldiers, that they broke out into clamours, for the moneys and provisions; and into outcries for more commodious winter-quarters: For Antigonus, they said, had made such havock up and down in the country thereabouts, that there was no living upon it. This mutinous extravagance put the army into such a distemper, that the soldiers were ready to lay down their arms and be gone; but Herod, on the other hand, made use of the authority of Cesar, Anthony, and the senate, by whose commission he was now come thither, and encourag'd both Silo's officers and soldiers to stand their ground, and maintain their station; and to depend upon him, that they should want nothing that they themselves could desire for their entertainment and satisfaction. Immediately upon this, he sent out his commissaries to provide them all necessaries, and left Silo no farther pretence of murmur or complaint; for they were presently supply'd with vast quantities of provisions beyond imagination: Herod having order'd his friends at Samaria to lay up stores of corn, wine, oil, cattle and all other necessaries at Jericho, and from thence to supply the army. Antigonus took the matter right, and presently dispatch'd away parties up and down the fields and the passes, to way-lay and intercept the foragers; who, according to their orders, dispos'd of their detachments about Jericho, and the crags of the mountains, where they were very careful to watch the convoys. Herod, on the other side, was as careful on his part; and with ten com-

The Romans rifled the city; and the booty, in money, jewels, and other precious goods and furniture, amounted to an inestimable value. The king left a garison in the place, and returned back again; assigning his army their quarters in his new conquests, as Idumea, Galilee, and Samaria; Antigonus prevailing also with Silo, by the force of money, that part of the Roman army might be quarter'd in Lydda, which was done to make a friend of Anthony; so that the Romans were now at case, and in both peace and plenty.

BUT Herod, who could not endure to be idle, sent away at this time his brother Joseph into Idumea, with a thousand foot, and four hundred horse, and went himself to Samaria, where he provided for his mother, and the rest of his kindred that he brought from Massada, and so marched for Galilee to take in some garisons, which were then in the possession of Antigonus. Coming up to Sephoris in a deep snow, he found the place wholly abandon'd, and provisions in it of all sorts, and in great plenty. The country thereabouts, not far from Arbela, being vexatiously infested with robbers, that from the fastnesses of the mountains terribly annoyed the neighbourhood, Herod commanded out a squadron of horse, and three companies of foot, to restrain their insolencies, and prevent them from committing depredations. Some forty days after this detachment, he march'd against them with his whole army; whereupon they drew out, and made so brave a charge upon him, that Herod's left wing gave way; till upon a victorious reinforcement, with Herod himself at the head of it, he brought his own men on again, who put their adversaries to a total rout, pursuing the victory as far as the river Jordan. This overthrow brought all Galilee over to Herod in time, saving only those that shelter'd themselves in the recesses of the mountains. The work being now over, Herod order'd the common soldiers a hundred * and fifty drachma's a man for a reward, and the officers more in proportion; and after this donative they were all dismiss'd to their winter stations. Silo, and his officers, that had been hitherto quarter'd upon Antigonus, gave Herod to understand, that he did not only refuse to allow them more than one month's entertainment, but sent likewise up and down to the neighbours every where thereabouts, to be gone with what they had up to the mountains, and to clear the country of all manner of necessaries for life, to starve the Romans out of their quarters; but Herod prevented this mischief, by committing the charge of providing for the army to his younger brother Pheroras, with orders also to repair the fort of Alexandrion, which lay then in ruins; in both which commissions he acquitted himself effectually, and much to his reputation.

The robbers routed, and Galilee reduc'd.

Pheroras provides for the army, and repairs to Alexandrion.

ANTHONY was now at Athens, and Ventidius in Syria, where he order'd Silo to join him with the auxiliary troops of the Parthians, but still to assist Herod in the first place, if there should be occasion. Herod, however, sent away Silo and his people to Ventidius, and marched himself against the free-booters that lay lurking in their hiding-holes up and down the hills. The rocks were so steep and craggy, and the passages so strait, that it was almost impossible to come at them; and these caves serv'd them and their families, both for their retreat and their habitations. The king, upon the view of the place, finding that there was no good to be done by scaling from below, or by creeping or stealing down upon them from above, made use of this invention: He caused several chests to be fram'd, and so let them down by a machine, with iron chains, from the top of the hills, and these cases to be fill'd with soldiers, lances, darts, hooks, and other arms, either by attack to destroy them in their dens, or to draw them out, and cast them down headlong, as the case should require. This was a bold and almost a desperate experiment, considering the horrid depth of the precipice; beside that they were victualled and provided in their cells with all manner of necessaries. One of these boxes being let down just upon the entrance into a cavern, and not a man of them daring to shew his head out of the vault, a soldier started up with his sword and buckler, and catching hold with both hands of the chain that upheld the coffer, he slipt down into the cavity of the rock, out of an impatience to wait any longer for their coming out: In one of these recesses he killed several with his darts, and pluck'd others out with his hooks, where he met with any resistance, and threw them down the cliffs; some at a farther distance he dispatch'd with his launce, and then betook himself to his chest again. The cries of the wounded frighted the rest to the last degree of desperation; but night coming on, put a stop to the execution. The king in the mean while having offer'd an indemnity to all that would lay down their arms, and come into him, they submitted in great numbers, and laid hold of that act of grace.

Herod's invention to fetch the robbers out of their holes.

Execution done upon the thieves.

An act of grace offer'd, which brings a great many over.

ON the day following they plied the attack in the same manner as before; only their bodies were more expos'd, and putting fire to the combustible matter they had in the caves, they set all in a flame, and smother'd their adversaries in their holes. There was among the rest an old man, with his wife and seven sons, begging leave of him in that hopeless extremity, to deliver up themselves to the enemy. The man planting himself at the mouth of the cavern, stabbed them one after another, every creature of them as they attempted to pass by him, and the woman last of all; casting their bodies down the precipice, and himself after them, chusing rather to lose his life than his liberty, but not without scandalous reflections upon Herod for the meanness of his extraction, though this prince at the same time gave him all the assurances of clemency and mercy that could be given by signs and gestures at a distance, if he would but have accepted of the pardon. This was the end, in short, of this war betwixt Herod and these free-booters.

An old man kills himself, his wife, and seven children, rather than accept of it.

The end of the war with the free-booters.

THIS adventure being now over, and the government of that quarter given to Ptolemy, Anthony orders Silo to join Herod.

* A hundred and fifty drachma's amounted to about four pounds, one shilling, and four pence, of our money.

Herod

The government is left to Ptolemy, and Herod marches for Samaria. Ptolemy slain by a party of highwaymen.

Herod marched away with six hundred horse, and three thousand foot, into Samaria, with a design to bring Antigonus to a decisive battle; but Ptolemy's command prov'd fatal; for he was set upon and slain by a party of those people that had formerly put Galilee in disorder. Upon the committing of this outrage, they betook themselves to the bogs, crags, and other places of difficult access for refuge, and from thence they robb'd and ravag'd the whole country, as they saw their opportunity; but Herod, at his coming back, made them pay dear for their purchase; for some he kill'd, and others he forced out of their strong holds, and put to the torture; demolishing all their castles and fortifications; and when he had rid his hands of the most considerable of his enemies, he set a fine of a hundred * talents upon the cities that were suspected to favour them.

The Parthians overthrown. Ventidius sends a detachment to Herod.

The Parthians having by this time received a great overthrow, with the loss of their king Pacorus in the battle, Ventidius, according to his instructions and orders from Anthony, sent away Macheras to Herod, with an enforcement of two legions, and a thousand horse; who having been invited by Antigonus, and corrupted with money, was absolutely for going to him, under a pretext of giving intelligence, and making discoveries, notwithstanding that Herod was utterly against it, and so he went his way; but finding upon his approach, that Antigonus was so far from trusting him, or admitting him, that he order'd his people to keep him off with slings and darts, this gave him sufficiently to understand that Herod was in the right when he dissuaded him, and he himself in a great mistake for not complying with his advice. Hereupon he returned to the city Emmaus, in a furious rage, Macheras puts to death all the Jews he finds in his way to Emmaus.

putting all the Jews to the sword that he found in the way, without distinction of either friend or foe. Herod was so irritated at this barbarous way of proceeding, that he went presently to Samaria, with a resolution to inform Anthony of this outrage, and give him to understand that he was in condition good enough himself to deal with Antigonus, without need of any such assistants as did more mischief to their own party than to the enemy. As he was going forward upon this design, Macheras posted after him, and overtook him upon the way, pressing him earnestly either to put a stop to his journey, or at least to leave Joseph his brother behind, for them two to carry on the war together against Antigonus. Herod upon his importunity granted him his request, and forgave what was past, leaving the army under the command of Joseph, with express orders not to run any unnecessary hazard, nor to enter into any misunderstanding with Macheras.

Herod much moved at it, but forgives it.

He leaves the command of the army to his brother Joseph, and repairs to Anthony himself, before Samosata.

Matters being thus settled, he marched away immediately with an auxiliary body of horse and foot to join Anthony, who was at that time before Samosata, upon the river Euphrates. At his coming to Antioch, he found great numbers of people that would fain have gone over to Anthony, if they could have got to him; but the ways were so beset with troops of bloody barbarians, that there would have been no coming at him, if Herod had not put himself at the head of them, and undertaken both for their conduct and protection; so that they prosecuted their march, and when they were advanced within two days journey of Samosata, they fell into an ambush of the enemies horse that lay close behind the bushes, upon the entrance into the campaign, to prevent any succours from going that way to Anthony. They suffer'd the front to pass forward on to the plain, without either discovery or interruption; but upon Herod's coming up with the rear, they fell furiously upon him with a matter of five hundred horse, and broke through the first rank; but the king pressing violently upon them with his guards, beat them from their ground, rallied his own scatter'd troops, and follow'd the execution till he made himself master of the booty they had taken, in prisoners, horses, mules, carriages, and all the baggage, which was very considerable; and this being done, Herod continued his journey to Anthony; but not without other encounters upon the way with troops of barbarians that sallied out of the woods and thickets upon him in his further progress; but still defeating and cutting them to pieces upon every attempt, till in the end the way was safe and open to him, without any difficulty or hazard, his people adoring him as their protector and preserver.

Several encounters by the way.

Anthony receives Herod with infinite honour and respect.

Anthony having heard of his exploits upon the barbarians, and how bravely he had acquitted himself upon several other occasions, sent out the flower of his troops to receive him upon his approach to the town, with all honour and respect imaginable, both for his person and his services, embracing him upon his arrival with infinite joy, affection, and esteem, celebrating and admiring him for his virtue; and, in fine, treating him with a dignity answerable to the royal character that he himself had conferred upon him. In a short time after this Antigonus deliver'd up the place, and in so doing put an end to the war. Anthony gave the government of the province, and the command of the army to Sosius, with orders to assist Herod upon all occasions, and so went himself into Egypt. Sosius hereupon sent away two legions with the king toward Judea, for the guard of his person, and marched after them himself with the rest of his army.

Antigonus delivers up Samosata.

Anthony leaves his army to Sosius, and goes himself to Egypt.

While these things were doing, Joseph, in the absence of his brother, was slain in Judea, for want of observing Herod's order when he went to Anthony. He march'd out toward Jericho with his own troops, and five companies belonging to Macheras, with a design to get in the harvest, and he encamped upon the mountains. Now the Romans with him being but raw and undisciplin'd soldiers, and the greater part of them only new rais'd men out of Syria, the enemy took advantage both of the place where he was posted, and the inexperience of the men they had to do withal; so that falling upon them, they surpriz'd and routed them; entirely destroying six companies, and cutting Joseph to pieces, fighting manfully at the head of them. Antigonus being master of the field, and finding Joseph

This rout was follow'd with the revolt of Galilee, and with drowning as many of Herod's friends as they could lay hold of in the lake; beſide divers ſeditious commotions in Judea; Macheras in the mean while fortifying the caſtle of Gath.

Galilee revolts.

Macheras fortifies Gath.

THE ſad ſtory of theſe calamities, one immediately in the neck of another, was brought to Herod at a place call'd Daphne, the ſuburbs of Antioch; and it was the leſs ſurprizing to him for ſome foreboding dreams he had a little before, which manifeſtly pointed at the death of his brother. He went from thence in all haſte for Mount Libanus, and taking eight hundred men of the place along with him, and a Roman legion, he advanced to Ptolemais; and ſo paſſing forward by night through the country of Galilee, he was ſet upon by the way, but beat the enemy back into the caſtle they came out of the day before; immediately inveſting the place, and diſpoſing his troops early next morning for an attack; but there happened to fall juſt then ſo violent a tempeſt, that he was forc'd to draw off into ſome of the neighbouring villages for ſhelter. Juſt after this came another legion to Herod from Anthony, which enforcement put the gariſon in ſuch a fright, that they quitted the place, and ſtole away in the dark of the night. Herod thought the time long till he had avenged the blood of his brother, and ſo made all the haſte he could to Jericho, where he treated with great magnificence all the princes of the place upon his arrival. When ſupper was juſt over, and the company gone, Herod retir'd into his own apartment, without leaving ſo much as one perſon in the eating-room. So ſoon as ever the place was empty, the roof fell flat to the ground into the parlour, without any farther miſchief, which was look'd upon as a ſingular providence that watched over Herod in the delivery of him from ſo eminent a danger.

Herod preſerv'd at Jericho by a ſtrange providence.

THE enemy falling down from the mountains next day upon the Romans, with a body of ſix thouſand men, put them into a downright conſternation; beating back the forlorn, and over-running all before them, even to the wounding of Herod himſelf, in the ſide, with an arrow. Antigonus, at this time, out of an oſtentation as if he had men to ſpare, ſent Pappus away to Samaria with ſome troops under his command; and while he and Macheras were deſigning upon one another, Herod got poſſeſſion of five towns, put two thouſand men to the ſword that were there in gariſon, and leaving them all in aſhes, went back to look after Pappus, who was then encamped at a place called Iſanas, where he was join'd with great numbers that came over to him from Jericho and Judea; but Herod perceiving that the enemy had the heart yet to puſh it to a battle, put it immediately upon that iſſue, and gave them a total rout, doing execution upon them, in revenge of his brother's death, in the very town they fled to for ſanctuary. The houſes were preſently crowded with ſoldiers from top to bottom, ſome in one place, ſome in another; but upon taking off the roofs, what with ſtones and other weapons from above, they were all laid open to an univerſal ſlaughter; and after all this, the moſt diſmal and horrid part of the ſpectacle, was the piles of the dead bodies that lay in heaps up and down in the chambers, which was the only thing that ſunk their hearts into a deſpair beyond all recovery.

Pappus defeated by Herod.

THE miſerable remainder of their broken troops fled in ſuch diſorder, and in ſuch ſhoals, that if it had not been for a violent hurricane at that very time, the victors had march'd directly up to Jeruſalem in that heat, and put an end to the war; for Antigonus was already upon the point of reſolving to abandon the city. It was now late in the evening, and Herod having order'd his ſoldiers to go to ſupper, retired into his chamber to refreſh himſelf after the fatigue of the battle; and upon this occaſion he had a ſecond deliverance, no leſs providential than the former; for as he was there in the bath, ſtark-naked, and only one ſervant to attend him, out ſtarted three ſoldiers with drawn ſwords in their hands, and croſſing the room in haſte, ruſh'd out at the door. Now theſe were people who had hid themſelves in the houſe, it ſeems, for fear of the enemy in the heat of the outrage, and ſo ſcamper'd away in a fright to ſave themſelves, without ever dreaming of any violence upon the king, whom they might eaſily have deſtroy'd. The body of Pappus being found among the ſlain, Herod the next day order'd his head to be ſtruck off, and ſo ſent it to Pheroras, as a kind of conſolitary revenge for his brother Joſeph, whom Pappus put to death with his own hand.

Herod ſurprized in the bath.

The blood of Pappus, that kill'd Joſeph, ſent to Joſeph's brother.

SO ſoon as the confuſion of this hurry was over, Herod march'd away with his army, and encamped near Jeruſalem, taking up his quarter upon the temple-ſide of the town, as Pompey had done long before him, and as the place that lay faireſt for an attack. When he had gotten his pioneers, and all neceſſary materials about him, and given his orders for the caſting up of three trenches and bulwarks about the place, and the erecting of ſuch and ſuch towers, away he went himſelf to Samaria to conſummate his marriage with Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander, and the grandchild of Ariſtobulus, who had been for ſome time contracted, as we have ſaid before, leaving officers behind him in his abſence to carry on the ſiege.

Herod lays ſiege to Jeruſalem.

Sosius and Herod generals at Jerusalem. The city and temple taken, with a bloody execution. The moderation of Herod. The abject submission of Antigonus. Herod brings him in chains. A mutiny in the army. The tenderness of Herod. Antigonus carried in his fetters to Anthony, who orders him to be put to death. The end of the Asmonean family.

WHEN the marriage-solemnity was over, Sosius sent away his troops before him, being a considerable body of horse and foot, and soon after follow'd them himself by the way of Phenicia. The king returned also from Samaria, with an enforcement of about thirty thousand men; which being join'd, the whole army drew together toward the walls upon the north quarter of the town, to the number of eleven legions of foot, and six thousand horse, over and above the auxiliaries they brought from Syria. The two generals were Sosius and Herod; the former employ'd by Anthony, as an assistant; the other acting upon his own account, in a prospect of settling himself in possession of the kingdom that the senate had given him upon the overthrow of Antigonus, the profess'd enemy of Rome.

Sosius and Herod, generals at the siege of Jerusalem.

THE Jews within were bold and numerous; for the whole nation of them in effect was gotten into the town, where they made a very obstinate defence; animating their companions with emphatical outcries of THE TEMPLE OF THE LORD, THE TEMPLE OF THE LORD, still at every turn, by way of exultation; and such presages of victory by God's blessing upon their cause, as seemed prophetically to foretel their deliverance. Neither were they wanting all this while in their endeavours, by frequent excursions, and ravaging the country, to straiten and distress the besiegers; for they swept it so bare, that there was hardly any thing left for man or beast to live upon. But Herod quickly put a stop to this inconvenience, partly by the ambushes he laid up and down to entrap the pillagers, and partly by the commissaries and convoys he employ'd far and near, for the supply of the camp. The season was so fair and favourable, and so many hands at work, that the pioneers had by this time finish'd the approaches, and the besiegers were now advanced to the battery, leaving nothing unattempted for the gaining of their point. The besieged, on the other hand, made a stout resistance; opposing stratagem to stratagem, and by one invention disappointing another. They made a great many desperate sallies, and set fire to divers of the enemy's works, as well those that were perfected, as those that were only begun; and their courage, when they came to handy-strokes, was nothing inferior to that of the Romans, though in the matter of military knowledge and experience, the Romans in truth had the advantage of them. As fast as one wall was thrown down, the defendants supplied it with a retrenchment that serv'd for another. They counterwrought mine against mine, and met, and fought many times under ground in the very work; standing it out to the last, their very desperation doing the office of valour. This was their bravery, in defiance of a formidable enemy before the town, and a starving want of necessaries within the walls; for they were now in the sabbatical year, when it was not lawful for them to till the ground. Upon the fortieth day after breaking ground, twenty brave fellows mounted the first wall; and after them a centurion belonging to Sosius. The second wall was taken fifteen days after, and several galleries about the temple set a fire, which Herod invidiously imputed to Antigonus, to make him odious to the people. Upon taking the out quarter of the temple, and the lower town, the Jews betook themselves into the middle of the one, and the upper part of the other; and for fear the Romans should interrupt them in their daily prayers and sacrifices, they desired leave of Herod by their ambassadors, only to bring in so many beasts as should be necessary for that service. Herod readily granted their request, in hope it might work some good upon them; but finding his mistake, and that they were more and more violent for Antigonus, he fell on immediately with his whole strength, and took the city by assault. The Romans were so exasperated at the opposition and the delay, and the Herodian Jews also so embitter'd against those of the other party, that they put all to the sword without mercy, as well in the streets as in the houses, and without sparing age or sex; nay, the very temple itself was no longer a sanctuary to those that fled into it; never so dismal a spectacle for blood and slaughter; and the soldiers were transported betwixt fury and revenge, to such a degree of implacable inhumanity, that though the king himself did all he could by his authority and earnest entreaties to put a stop to the butchery, there was not a man who regarded or obeyed him.

The city and temple taken.

A bloody execution.

The moderation of Herod.

IN this extremity Antigonus came down from the tower, and (below the dignity of his late character) cast himself at the feet of Sosius, who was so far from pitying him, that instead of Antigonus, he saluted him by the name of Antigona, and made a woman of him, in contempt of so effeminate a spirit. But he did not treat him afterwards like a woman; for he was put in chains, and secur'd under the custody of a guard.

The abject submission of Antigonus.

Herod brings him in chains.

BUT Herod's work was not yet done neither; for he was as hard put to it afterward to keep his own party in order, as he had been already to gain a victory over his enemies. His mercenaries, in fine, press'd so eagerly forward in troops and throngs to pry into the temple, and the very sanctuary itself, that all Herod could do by his authority, fair words, threatenings, and force itself, was little enough to restrain them; and, in truth, his success would have been worse than a defeat to him, if he should have suffer'd the exposing of the sacred and incommunicable mysteries of religion, to the pragmatical curiosity of the prophane multitude. He kept off the soldiers also from pillaging, all he could too, by reasoning and expostulating the matter with Sosius, laying it before him, that if they went on killing and destroying in so furious a manner, the Romans would find him the king of a desart, rather than of a people; and telling him that if the whole world were offer'd him upon those terms, he would not purchase it at the price of so much blood. Sosius made answer, that it was a thing of course, justice, and common practice, upon the taking of a place place by aſſault, to allow the ſoldiers the advantage of the booty. Herod told him on the other ſide, that as to what concern'd the ſoldiers, he would compound himſelf for the plunder, and gratify them upon his own account abundantly to their ſatisfaction, which he did accordingly; for he was in every point as good as his word. He was, in ſhort, ſo generous to the common ſoldiers, ſo bountiful in proportion to the officers, and ſo magnificent in his preſents and acknowledgments to Soſius, that the city was redeem'd; and all parties, in the concluſion, very well rewarded.

Jeruſalem taken on a remarkable year.

THIS happen'd in the conſulate of Marcus Agrippa, and Canidius Gallus, Olympiad 185. in the third month, and upon the day of a ſolemn faſt, being the very anniverſary of their deſtruction by Pompey; for the city was taken upon the very day of the taking it * ſeven and twenty years before.

Antigonus carried in chains to Anthony

SOSIUS, upon this, dedicated unto God a golden crown, and ſo went his way from Jeruſalem, taking Antigonus his priſoner along with him in bonds to Anthony. Herod had a jealouſy in his head, that perhaps Anthony would not take away his life; and that in caſe of his appearing at Rome, and putting in his claim to the government before the ſenate, Antigonus being of the royal blood, and himſelf but a Plebeian, he did not know what the iſſue of it might be. Antigonus, he thought, might ſuggeſt, that though for his own part, he could not pretend to the dignity, having been in arms againſt the Romans; and though his own guilt might be taken for a ſufficient forfeiture as to himſelf, he might be yet in hope, that they would not puniſh his innocent ſons for the guilty father's ſake, but admit him into the ſucceſſion. Herod found himſelf very uneaſy under this proſpect and apprehenſion, and ſo prevail'd with Anthony, for a mighty ſum of money privately, to have Antigonus diſpatch'd out of the way, and that being done, Herod's heart was at reſt.

Anthony orders Antigonus to be put to death.

THUS ended the reign of the Aſmonean family, after a hundred and twenty ſix years poſſeſſion of the government, a family illuſtrious in itſelf for the long continuance of the ſacerdotal ſucceſſion in it; and no leſs famous for the ſignal ſervices they and their anceſtors had from time to time render'd to the publick; but it was diverted at laſt by an inteſtine broil, as we have it upon tradition, from our forefathers; and the adminiſtration was transfer'd to Herod, the ſon of Antipater, a perſon of a Plebeian extraction, and a private ſubject.

Pollio and Sameas great with Herod. A notable prediction of Pollio's. Herod presents Anthony. Five and forty of Antigonus's men put to death, and himself beheaded at Antioch.

WE have already set forth the taking of Jerusalem by Sosius and Herod, and the making of Antigonus a prisoner; and we are now to proceed to what follow'd upon it. So soon as Herod came to the exercise of his royal authority over Judea, he made it his business in the first place to promote, and to provide for the Plebeian citizens, who had taken part with him, as yet while he was in the condition but of a private man. But for those of the opposite party, hardly a day past without a capital execution upon some or other of them. Pollio, the Pharisee, and his disciple Sameas, were highly in his favour for the good offices they did him, in advising the citizens when he lay before the town, to open the gates and receive him. This was that * Pollio that formerly foretold to Hyrcanus and the rest of the judges, upon the questioning of Herod for his life; that if they acquitted him, the time would come, when he should as certainly take away their lives, as they might now take away his. This prediction was verify'd in the event.

Herod kind to his friends, and severe to his enemies.

Pollio, the Pharisee, and his disciple Sameas, great with Herod.

A notable prediction of Pollio's.

No sooner was Herod in possession of the city, but he got together all the royal furniture, with the rich booty in goods, gold and silver, that had been taken away by the wealthy citizens, and had it all carry'd to the palace; out of which he made a mighty present to Anthony; dividing the rest among his friends and his favourites. He order'd also forty five principal men of Antigonus's interest to be put to death, and a guard set at their several doors to wait for the bringing out of the bodies, and to inspect whether they were dead or not, and to take care that they carry'd out nothing else. In case of discovering any gold or silver, it was all brought to the king; and in one word, they saw no end of their misery. They were in the hands of a griping and a necessitous prince; and all they were worth in the world was too little to satisfy his avarice. They were also in their sabbatical year, and consequently no harvest to supply their wants.

Herod presents Anthony.

Forty five men of Antigonus's party put to death.

ANTHONY having at this time Antigonus a prisoner, had some thoughts of exposing him in chains for the honour of his triumph; but when he heard that the Jews began to be mutinous, and out of the aversion they had for Herod to favour Antigonus; Anthony without any more ceremony, struck off his head at Antioch, as the best expedient he could think of to keep the people quiet. Strabo of Cappadocia atteſts this fact in the following manner:

See Strabo.

" ANTHONY, ſays he, brought Antigonus " the king of the Jews priſoner to Antioch, " where he cauſed his head to be ſtruck off; " the firſt king that ever the Romans put to " this manner of death: But he had this to " ſay for himſelf, that the Jews would never " acknowledge Herod for their king, ſo long " as Antigonus was living. Nay, ſo great " was the reverence and eſteem they had for " their former prince, that they were not to " be wrought upon, even by torments, to al- " low Herod ſo much as the name of a king: " But Herod propounded to himſelf by this " ſcandalous and ſhameful puniſhment, to blaſt " the memory and reputation of the one, and " to ſoften the popular averſion of the multi- " tude to the other." Thus far goes Strabo.

WE have ſpoken already of the two Parthian generals, Barzapharnes and Pacorus; and of their carrying away Hyrcanus and Phaſael priſoners: The former having been firſt high-prieſt, and then prince of the Jews; the latter, the brother of Herod, who out of a generous indignation daſh'd out his own brains, rather than he would ſubmit to the ſlaviſh infamy of an inglorious death. Hyrcanus being at this time in the hands of the Parthians, news was brought him of Herod's promotion to the government; upon which intelligence, he made his court to the new king, and we are now to ſhew how he came to obtain his liberty, and to return

CHAP. II.

Phraates treats Hyrcanus with great reſpect. Upon Herod's promotion, Hyrcanus would needs viſit him; but his friends oppoſed it. Herod invites Hyrcanus, and compliments Phraates. Hyrcanus goes for Jeruſalem, where Herod entertains him very generouſly. Ananus anvanc'd to the pontificate; which Alexandra takes for an affront, and puts Cleopatra upon moving Anthony for her ſon. Alexandra ſends Anthony the pictures of Ariſtobulus and Mariamne. Anthony tells Herod, he ſhould be glad to ſee Ariſtobulus, but Herod is againſt it; Anthony being a man of liberty and pleaſure, Herod charges Alexandra for plotting with Cleopatra. Ananus depos'd, and Ariſtobulus in his place. Alexandra's excuſe.

Phraates treats his priſoner Hyrcanus with great honour.

HYRCANUS being brought priſoner to Phraates, the king of Parthia; and this prince being well informed of his birth and character, he had ſo great a reſpect for his illuſtrious blood and quality, that he immediately order'd his chains to be taken off, and allow'd him the freedom of the city of Babylon for the bounds of his confinement: A place where there were a great many of his own ſect; and where he had the ſame reverence paid him, not only by the Jews of that city, but by thoſe likewiſe on the other ſide of Euphrates, as if he had been their governour and high-prieſt. So that the preſent condition of Hyrcanus was not very uneaſy to him. But when he came to underſtand that Herod was advanced to the government, he being a grateful and a good-natur'd man himſelf, made a judgment of others according to the ſame meaſure; flattering himſelf with the hope of mighty things that Herod would do for him now upon this elevation, as an acknowledgment to the preſerver of his life and honour, which he himſelf had ſav'd when it was all at ſtake, of which we have ſaid enough heretofore. This fancy ſo ſtrongly poſſeſs'd Hyrcanus, that he reſolved within himſelf to make a journey to him, but not without the formality of adviſing firſt with ſome of his confidents about it. Upon laying their heads together, he found all his friends unanimouſly poſitive againſt his going. " For, ſaid they, " ſo long as you are here, you may aſſure " yourſelf from us and all our people, of a " reverence and obedience ſuitable to the duty " of your ſubjects and ſervants, and to the " dignity of your own character, which you " can never expect in your own country, by " reaſon of the maim Antigonus has given you, " which puts you into an incapacity of pre- " tending to it. They told him likewiſe, that " in the matter of good turns and reciprocal " ſervices, it is not with princes as it is with " private perſons. Kings have ſhort memo- " ries commonly in thoſe caſes, and men " change their manners with their fortunes." This diſcourſe was reaſonable enough, but the paſſion Hyrcanus had for his own country, made him deaf to all good counſels. Herod gave Hyrcanus an invitation alſo by letter to come over to him, and take his part in the government, deſiring him likewiſe to move Phraates and his brethren the Jews, not to envy him the comfort of ſo great a bleſſing; for now was the time, he ſaid, to ſhew his gratitude to the perſon he ſtood indebted to, both for his bread and for his life. And this was not all neither, but he ſent Saramalla upon an embaſſy to Phraates, with fair words and magnificent preſents over and above, to ſweeten him on the behalf of Hyrcanus, his worthy patron and dear friend. But this was all countenance and grimace; for Herod, being a crafty and a ſuſpicious prince, and an uſurper to boot, his buſineſs was to ſecure himſelf againſt all poſſible changes and turns of ſtate, and upon that conſideration, either to get Hyrcanus into his power, or ſend him out of the world, as afterwards he did.

All his friends againſt it.

Herod invites Hyrcanus to come over to him;

and ſends Saramalla to Phraates with compliments and preſents, to ſweeten him toward Hyrcanus.

HYRCANUS being, in fine, diſcharged by Phraates, and amply ſupply'd with monies and neceſſaries by the Jews in Babylon for his journey, went to Jeruſalem, where he was received with all the marks of ſingular honour and reſpect; as for inſtance, Herod gave him the firſt place at all meetings and entertainments; treated him in the ſtile of father, and carry'd every thing on with ſuch an outward appearance of good faith, that there was no room left for any poſſible doubt or jealouſy of the contrary. There was nothing, in fine, omitted, that might conduce to his eſtabliſhment, ſaving only that he was ſo over ſolicitous in that particular, that it prov'd the occaſion of a dangerous breach in the family; for he was ſo cautious of having any man of an honourable extraction advanced to the pontificate, that he ſent to Babylon for one Ananel, a perſon of a mean and obſcure condition, and made him high-prieſt. Alexandra, the wife of Hyrcanus, and the widow of Alexander the ſon of king Ariſtobulus, by whom Hyrcanus diſcharg'd, and ſo goes his way for Jeruſalem.

Herod entertains him with great honour.

Upon Herod's promotion, Hyrcanus had a mind to give him a viſit.

Herod advances Ananel, a mean perſon to the pontificate.

whom she had a son, whom she called Aristobulus, after his grandfather's name, and a daughter Mariamne, a woman of admirable beauty, and the wife of Herod: this Alexandra laid it extremely to heart, to see her son thus affronted, and the high-priesthood usurped by one from abroad, while her son was yet living. In this discontent she wrote by a certain musician to Cleopatra, to beg the pontificate of Anthony for her son. But Anthony never minding the matter, it so happen'd, that one Gellius, a particular friend of his, being at that time in Judea about some affairs of his own, had the good fortune to see Aristobulus and Mariamne, whom he look'd upon to be two of the most graceful beautiful persons that ever his eye beheld; insomuch, that he highly complimented Alexandra upon the blessing of bringing two such miracles into the world, and recommended it to her to make a present of their pictures to Anthony, as the way to secure herself of any good office that lay in his power to do her. Upon this consideration she sent the pictures; and Gellius, that had a mind to inveigle Anthony into a passion for Mariamne, highly enlarged upon their beauty, with hyperbolical and extravagant flourishes, that they were perfect and lovely, so much beyond the ordinary rate of flesh and blood, that they look'd liker angels in human shapes. It would not have been either handsome or honest in Anthony, to send for the wife of a prince that was his friend; and he was not willing neither to give Cleopatra any just ground of jealousy; but he wrote, however, to Herod, how glad he should be to see Aristobulus upon any fair occasion, if it might stand with his convenience. Aristobulus was not at that time above fifteen or sixteen years of age, and Herod did not think it safe to send a delicate charming youth, nobly born, and in the flower of his years, to the person of all men living the most abandon'd to unnatural lusts, and the most eager in the pursuit of unlawful pleasures; for this was Anthony's character; beside, that being one of the greatest men in Rome, he made use of his power and authority to bear him out in these liberties; so that Herod put him off with this pretence, that the Jews were so seditious, and so bent upon change and the experiment of another king, that if Aristobulus should but stir out of the kingdom, it would blow up all in a flame.

Alexandra takes this for an affront to her son.

She puts Cleopatra upon begging it of Anthony for her son.

Alexandra sends Anthony the pictures of Aristobulus and Mariamne.

Anthony writes to Herod not to let Aristobulus be seen.

Herod against it, as a matter of ill consequence, Anthony being a man of liberty and pleasure.

When he had fobb'd Anthony off with this answer, he made it his business to treat the young man and Alexandra with more than usual civility; his wife Mariamne also continually pressing him to do her brother right in the business of the pontificate; urging withal, that it was his own interest so to do, for the very duty of the office would excuse him beyond all exception from taking the journey. Herod, upon this discourse, called several of his friends together, to confer and advise with; before whom he inveighed bitterly against Alexandra; telling them that she was enter'd into a secret conspiracy against him, and that she wrought by the means of Cleopatra, who was to engage Anthony to depose him, and transfer the government to her son; which, he said, she was the more to blame in, because she could not vindicate Aristobulus, without degrading her daughter, and making way by a publick broil to the dethroning of her son-in-law, and removing him from a dignity that he had acquir'd with so much toil and hazard. "But upon the whole "matter, says he, I am ready to forget and "to forgive all these injuries; and to shew "the reverence and tenderness I have for my "mother, and the rest of her relations, I will "immediately vest her son in the exercise of "the office; and I had done it sooner too, "when I put Ananel into it, if the other had "been of age to execute it." This studied speech (for in truth so it was, and intended only for an amusement to the women and the council) put Alexandra into the greatest confusion imaginable, betwixt the joy of seeing her own business done, and the trouble of finding herself suspected; so that bursting out into a passionate transport of tears and protestations, she gave this further account of her behaviour. "That as to the point of the high- "priesthood, she had such an indignation for "the affront put upon her son in that particu- "lar, that she left no lawful way or means to "do him right in it unattempted; but as to "any design she had of advancing him to the "throne, she was so far from having any "thought that way, that if the thing were "offer'd her, she would refuse it; for her "ambition look'd no further, she said, than "to see justice done to her son in that station, "and consequently the honour and the safety "of the family provided for. But as the case "then stood, she said, she was so sensible of "the king's grace and goodness to herself in "the person of Aristobulus, that he should "ever find her most dutiful for the future; "and if upon any punctilio of honour, or of "haughtiness of mind, she might have pass'd "the precise bounds of respect and modera- "tion, she begg'd his pardon for it." This discourse put a seeming end to the controversy; for they shook hands, and in appearance parted friends.

Ananel depos'd, and Aristobulus put into the pontificate.

Alexandra's vindication.

Herod charges Alexandra for intriguing with Cleopatra.

CHAP. III.

Herod is jealous of Alexandra, and sets spies upon her. She writes to Cleopatra for advice what to do, who invites Herod and her son into Egypt, whither they are privately convey'd. Esop tells Sabbion the secret, and he betrays it to Herod, who surprizes them in their escape. Herod contrives the drowning of Aristobulus, who is universally lamented. Alexandra disguises her affliction. A splendid funeral, and Herod sets up for the chief mourner.

THE king immediately depos'd Ananel from the pontificate, being a foreigner, as we have said before, and of the race of those Jews that were formerly carried away by the Syrians beyond the Euphrates, whereof many thousands took up their habitations in Babylon. He was in truth, of a sacerdotal extraction, and one of Herod's old acquaintance; who, upon his coming to the crown, had created him high-priest, and afterwards deposed him, (though contrary to law,) for the peace of his family; for otherwise the high-priesthood is an office for life, and not to be taken away again where it is once duly confer'd. The first that broke in upon that rule was Antiochus Epiphanes, Epiphanes, who removed Joſhua to make way for his brother Onias. Ariſtobulus was the ſecond who ſupplanted Hyrcanus, and aſſumed the dignity to himſelf. The third was Herod, who put Ariſtobulus into the holy function, while Ananel was yet living.

Herod is ſtill jealous of Alexandra.

By this expedient they thought to ſet all right in the family; but, as it prov'd, the conſequence was not ſo clear yet, as after ſo ſolemn a reconciliation a body would have expected; for Herod was ſtill poſſeſs'd with a ſtrong jealouſy, that Alexandra would be no longer quiet, than till ſhe had an opportunity of compaſſing her ends, by being troubleſome. Under theſe apprehenſions he confin'd her to the palace, and abſolutely forbad her meddling in any publick buſineſs; ſetting moreover ſo many guards and obſervers upon her, that ſhe did not the leaſt thing in the world, not even what related to domeſtick œconomy, but the king had notice of it. This odious way of proceeding gaul'd and exaſperated her extremely; for being a woman of birth, ſenſe, and of an high ſpirit, nothing could have touch'd her ſo ſenſibly, as to find herſelf thus watch'd and overlook'd; inſomuch, that ſhe reſolved, in ſhort, rather to endure any thing than the plague of ſo ſcandalous a jealouſy, and under the title of a woman of honour, to lead the life of a ſlave in fear and miſery. In this diſtreſs of thought ſhe writ the whole ſtate of her caſe in a letter to Cleopatra, together with an application to her for advice and relief; who gave her for anſwer, an invitation to ſteal away privately with her ſon, and to come over to her into Egypt. She could not but approve of the counſel, and ſo bethought herſelf of this way of putting it in execution. She order'd two coffins to be provided, and herſelf and her ſon to be put up in them; appointing the ſervants that were privy to the contrivance, to ſee them carried them out by night, and put aboard a ſhip that lay ready near at hand to tranſport them into Egypt. There was one Sabbion, who was look'd upon to be Alexandra's friend, and ſo mortal an enemy of Herod's, that he was ſtrongly ſuſpected to have been a party in the plot for the poiſoning of Antipater. A ſervant of Alexandra's, whoſe name was Eſop, making no doubt of Sabbion's being privy to the deſign, blabb'd the whole ſtory to him; and the other, laying hold of this occaſion for the redeeming of his credit with Herod, went and acquainted him with the whole intrigue; who let them go on without any noiſe, till they came to the point of execution, and then ſurpriz'd them in the very act of making their eſcape. Herod was yet ſo over gracious as to forgive her this attempt, not out of any motion of tenderneſs and generoſity, but for fear of Cleopatra's power with Anthony, in caſe he ſhould provoke her to a revenge; nay, ſo far was he from putting her to any extremity, that with a kind of oſtentation of magnanimity and good-nature, he rather out-did it the other way, by appearing more indulgent than in truth (all things conſider'd) it was poſſible for him to be. But after all this external fairneſs toward Alexandra the death of the young man ſome way or other was a thing reſolv'd upon; only it was to be a work of time to prevent ſuſpicion or diſcovery.

He ſets guards and ſpies upon her.

She writes to Cleopatra for help and advice.

Cleopatra gives her and her ſon an invitation into Egypt.

She and her ſon are convey'd away privately thither.

Eſop tells Sabbion the ſecret, and he betrays it to Herod.

Herod ſurprizes them in the very act of their eſcape.

THE feaſt of tabernacles now drawing on, (being one of the moſt celebrated and ſolemn feſtivals we have,) Herod diſpos'd himſelf to his good humour, and to rejoice and make merry with the people; but while this paſt, there fell out an unlucky circumſtance, that put him upon the execution of his murderous purpoſe, ſooner than he intended. Ariſtobulus was at this time enter'd into the eighteenth year of his age, a youth tall and lovely to admiration; and, in one word, the very picture of his grandfather; and as he was advancing toward the altar, in his pontifical robes, to officiate according to the law, he diſcharg'd his part with ſo wonderful a grace, having all the perſonal advantages of beauty and ſtature, and the dignity of a great ſoul in the very face of him, that the eyes and hearts of the ſpectators were all ſet upon him; inſomuch, that they could not forbear expreſſing the love, honour, and eſteem they had for him, in a thouſand good wiſhes, prayers, and acclamations, and thoſe indications of their joy and affection, accompanied alſo with large acknowledgments of the many obligations they had to that noble family. Now they never conſider'd that the magnifying of the one was a kind of derogating from the other, and that Herod's envy would underſtand it ſo, which effectually it did; and the jealouſy he contracted upon it, haſten'd the young man's ruin. Upon the breaking up of the feſtival, Herod took his part of a treat with Alexandra at Jericho, where he took Ariſtobulus aſide, as in point of complaiſance, and to bear him company in his little diverſions and pleaſures. The weather was too hot for any ſtirring exerciſe; ſo that they quickly gave over their play, and withdrew into the cool of the ſhade, by certain large fiſh-ponds there at hand, where ſeveral of their acquaintances and ſervants were bathing themſelves. Ariſtobulus was tempted by Herod to make one of the party, and ſo plunging into the pool for company, ſome of Herod's inſtruments that lay ready upon the catch, took the opportunity of ducking and dipping him ſo long, under a pretence of only ſport and diverſion, that in the end they kept him down, and drown'd him. This was the deplorable end of Ariſtobulus, in the eighteenth year of his age, and the firſt of his office, which was then immediately reſtor'd to Ananel. When this tragical diſaſter came to be known to the Women, never was ſo diſmal an alteration in the face of things; never ſo paſſionate a lamentation over the body of any perſon; nor ever ſo inconſolable a ſorrow. It was ſo publick a loſs, that the whole city was in tears for it, and not a family but had their part in it. But the chief mourner of all was Alexandra; and it was an aggravation of her calamity, that though ſhe was convinc'd of the malicious treachery of the fact, ſhe was yet glad to keep her tongue in her head for fear of a worſe miſchief. Such was the outrage of her deſpair, that ſhe was many times about to lay violent hands upon herſelf; but ſtill check'd her paſſion, in hope that if ſhe could but ſurvive the ſenſe of that barbarous and flagitious murder, without diſcovering what ſhe knew of the contriver of it, ſhe might yet live to the opportunity of a revenge; wherefore ſhe carried it fair in appearance, and without ſeeming to underſtand any thing of the matter;

Ariſtobulus drown'd in a pool by the practice of Herod.

An univerſal ſorrow for the loſs of Ariſtobulus.

Alexandra keeps her affliction to herſelf.

Herod himself in appearance the chief mourner.

ter; but Herod made it his business of all things in the world to possess people that he had no hand in it; and in his looks, words, and behaviour, acted the part of a mourner so well to the life, that any one would have thought his very heart had been breaking in good earnest. And who knows at last yet, but betwixt humanity and conscience, he might come to have somewhat of a true remorse for his wickedness, in spilling the innocent blood of so lovely a person, in the prime of his youth and beauty; but his death was necessary, he thought, for his own security; beside, that his main point was to keep himself clear of being suspected of so base a crime. As to the matter of pomp and expence toward the solemnity of the funeral, there was nothing left undone either in the adorning of the hearse, or in the embalming of the body, that might advance the magnificence of the ceremony; and this course he took, as the most likely way to contribute some mitigation and comfort to the grief of the women.

A most expensive and magnificent funeral.

CHAP. IV.

Alexandra sends Cleopatra the story of the murder, who presses Anthony for justice upon the murderer. Anthony sends for Herod, and Joseph administers in his absence, with orders to put Mariamne to death, in case Anthony destroys Herod. Joseph discovers the project at unawares. Herod values himself much upon Anthony's favour, and is jealous of Mariamne for Joseph. Joseph put to death, and Alexandra imprison'd. Cleopatra governs Anthony at pleasure. Her lewd practices.

BUT there was no working upon the embitter'd spirit of Alexandra, by such amusements as these; neither was the rancour of her canker'd melancholy capable of any other relief than that of a revenge. With this prospect in her head, she sent Cleopatra an account of Herod's perfidious practice upon the life of her miserable son. Cleopatra, who had ever been ready and forward to serve her, contracted so generous a compassion for her upon this occasion, that she espoused her interest as her own; pressing and plying Anthony with perpetual importunities, to see justice done upon the author of so barbarous a murder. She laid before him the baseness of the thing, and how dishonourable it would be for him to suffer a king of his own making, and the usurper of another man's right, to commit so horrid an outrage upon the lawful heir of the government, and to come off at last unpunish'd. Anthony was touch'd with these remonstrances; and so coming to Laodicea, he sent for Herod to clear himself about the death of Aristobulus; for he could not but have a horror for the action, even though Herod himself should have been the doer of it. Herod was too conscious to cast himself voluntarily upon the merit of his cause, and then he consider'd the hatred Cleopatra bore him, who was continually teizing Anthony against him; but at all hazards, however, he resolv'd to appear, and in truth there was no avoiding it; so that committing the care of the government in his absence to his uncle Joseph, he gave him privately in charge, if Anthony should put him to death, he should immediately destroy Mariamne; for he doted upon his fair wife to that degree, that it was worse than death to him to think of any other man's enjoying her when he should be gone; beside, that he look'd upon her excellencies as the sources of his misfortune. Anthony had long since profess'd a passion for her upon the very fame of her beauty. Having dispatch'd his orders, he set out on his journey towards Anthony; but with a sad and a foreboding heart.

Alexandra sends Cleopatra the story of the perfidious murder.

Cleopatra presses Anthony for justice upon the murderer.

Anthony sends for Herod to answer for himself.

Herod appears.

His uncle Joseph administers in his absence, with orders, if Anthony put him to death, he should immediately destroy Mariamne.

WHILE Joseph was in the administration, he took care of his trust, and made frequent visits to Mariamne; partly upon business, and partly out of respect. Joseph, as they were together, would frequently be taking occasion to extol Herod, as the most tender uxorious husband upon the face of the earth. The women shook their heads at it to see him so positive, Alexandra especially; but Joseph grew so over zealous upon it, to make good the character, that he betray'd a secret he was entrusted with, before he was aware; insisting upon it as an infallible argument of his affection, that as he found he could not live without her, so he was resolv'd that death itself should never part them. Now the women did not understand these words as an evidence of his love, but as an intimation of a tyrannical purpose he had taken up, in case of his own death, not to suffer them to survive him.

Joseph discovers the secret at unawares.

THERE was at this time a rumour rais'd and spread about the town by some of the king's enemies, that Anthony had caused Herod to be put to the question, and after that to death. The whole court was startled at it, and the women above the rest; insomuch, that Alexandra put it to Joseph to fly for protection to the Roman legion under Julius, that was then quarter'd without the city, and to take them along with him; for if there should come to be any broils in the palace, the Romans would take care of them; or if ever Mariamne should but come into the sight of Anthony, he would deny her nothing that she should ask him, though it were the kingdom itself, and all the royal privileges she could pretend to.

WHILE this affair was under deliberation, letters came from Herod that quite contradicted the former intelligence; for Herod, it seems, was no sooner come to Anthony, but by the force of presents, and fair words, he brought him so far over to his interest, that Cleopatra had no longer any power with him to the disadvantage of Herod; "For kings, "says Anthony, are not to be accountable "for their doings, they are no kings else; "for that's but the privilege of all crown'd "heads; and it would be well, says he, if "Cleopatra would not trouble herself so much "how other princes govern." Herod made ostentation in his letters also, of the honours Anthony had done him; how he call'd him to his council, and to his solemn feasts, in despite of all the calumnies of Cleopatra, that had a design upon the government herself, and did all she could in the world to ruin him; but Anthony, he said, was a prince of honour and justice, and that they might expect him back again in a short time better establish'd in the possession of his kingdom, and in the assurance of Anthony's friendship, than ever; Cleopatra being quite taken off, by the acceptance of Cele-Syria, as a present from Anthony,

Herod has more credit with Anthony than Cleopatra.

Herod boasts of Anthony's favours.

Anthony, upon condition never to trouble him again about Judea.

THIS anſwer put an end to the deſign they had of ranging themſelves under the protection of the Romans, which was not kept ſo ſecret yet, but Herod had got intelligence of it; who, ſo ſoon as Anthony was advanced upon his expedition againſt the Parthians, returned to Jeruſalem, where his ſiſter Salome, and his mother inform'd him of the whole matter. Nay, and his ſiſter went ſo far, as to charge her own husband, Joſeph and Mariamne, with the privacy of a love intrigue together; but this was out of an old grudge to her, being a high-ſpirited woman, for reproaching her in a quarrel once about the meanneſs of her birth. This put Herod into ſo furious a tranſport of jealouſy and indignation, (for he lov'd Mariamne as he did his own ſoul,) that he had much ado to forbear laſhing out into open extravagancies, and contain himſelf within the compaſs of ſobriety and good diſcretion. But, upon ſecond thoughts, he took Mariamne aſide, and put her to the ſhrift about this familiarity with Joſeph. She purg'd herſelf by all that was poſſible for an innocent woman to ſay in her own defence, that ſhe was clear, not only as to Joſeph, but to the whole world, of any thing that did but look like criminal or diſhonourable in her converſation. The king, in fine, betwixt the power of his wife's charms, and that of his own infinite paſſion, ſoften'd by little and little, to ſuch a degree, that he not only acquitted her of the calumny, but acknowledg'd himſelf convinc'd of her unſpotted integrity, deſiring her pardon over and above, for the raſhneſs of his credulity, in giving any ſort of credit to ſo ſcandalous a rumour; intermixing all ſorts of tenderneſs in his diſcourſe. Theſe endearments, in concluſion, brought them to tears and embraces, (as it falls out commonly in theſe love encounters,) and the more diffident Mariamne appear'd of the good faith of Herod's affection, the more ſolicitous was he ſtill to confirm her in the aſſurance of it. "Yes, yes, "ſays ſhe, a notable ſign of a loving husband "indeed, to order the putting of his innocent "wife to death, in caſe he ſhould happen to "die himſelf." At theſe words he flung himſelf out of her arms in a rage; tearing his hair, and crying out like a mad man, "It is "now as clear as the ſun, ſays he, that Jo"ſeph has corrupted my wife; for nothing leſs "than the power of ſuch a confidence could "ever have extorted from him a ſecret that "was committed to him with ſo much caution "and truſt." In this impotency of paſſion he had it in his thought to ſtrike Mariamne to the heart; but the ſtrength of his old affection and kindneſs for her not being quite extinguiſhed, he overcame, though with ſome difficulty, that provocation. As for Joſeph, he commanded him immediately to be put to death, without ſo much as hearing him; and Alexandra at the ſame time to be impriſon'd, as the cauſe of all this miſchief.

Herod jealous of Mariamne for Joſeph.

Joſeph put to death, and Alexandra impriſon'd.

THERE were troubles about this time in Syria, promoted chiefly by the practices of Cleopatra, who had an abſolute power with Anthony, and employ'd it wholly to miſchief; inciting him perpetually againſt the great men of the country, till ſhe had worm'd them out of their governments, and then begg'd them for herſelf. Her avarice and ambition, in fine, were ſo inſatiable, that ſhe made a conſcience of nothing ſhe might get by. In the firſt place ſhe diſpatch'd her brother out of the way, a youth about fifteen years of age, and the next in ſucceſſion to the kingdom. She then prevail'd with Anthony to have her ſiſter Arſinoe taken off at Epheſus, in the temple of Diana, even at her very devotions; ſo that neither temples, ſepulchres, nor ſanctuaries, eſcap'd her, where there was money or ſpoil to be gotten by a ſacrilegious violation of them; but right or wrong, ſacred or prophane, all was a caſe to her, ſo ſhe might be a gainer by it. In one word, the treaſure of the whole world would have been too little to ſatisfy the expenſive pride and vanity of this voluptuous woman; ſo that being of this humour, it was no wonder to ſee her ſo preſſing upon Anthony to take from others, when it was all deſign'd for herſelf; and ſhe had no ſooner ſet foot into Syria with him, but ſhe fell to projecting immediately how to make herſelf miſtreſs of it. Lyſanias, the ſon of Ptolemy, was a friend, ſhe ſaid, to the Parthians, and ſo ſhe procured him to be put to death upon that account. She begg'd alſo of Anthony, Judea and Arabia, out of the hands of the kings who had them in poſſeſſion. Anthony was, in ſhort, ſo much at the command of this woman, as if ſhe had not only captivated, but bewitch'd him; yet there were ſome indignities ſo groſs, that he could not comply with them, without proclaiming himſelf the ſcandalous ſlave of an infamous woman. In few words, being loth to diſoblige his miſtreſs on the one hand, by denying her any thing, and as much aſham'd on the other, to publiſh himſelf for the weakeſt and meaneſt of mankind, in granting all ſhe ask'd, he compounded the buſineſs by giving her ſome certain parts of both provinces, and all the cities from the river Eleutherus to Egypt, ſave only Tyre and Sidon, which had been always free; but this did not hinder her from purſuing Anthony ſtill, with violent importunities, to caſt them in over and above.

Cleopatra has now an abſolute power over Anthony

The lewd practices of Cleopatra.

CHAP. V.

Cleopatra received with great honour by Herod at Apamia and Ptolemais. A luſtful ſhameleſs woman. Herod is for putting her to death, but his friends oppoſe it; ſo that he ſpeaks her fair, and carries her part of her way for Egypt. Anthony ſubdues Armenia, and compliments Cleopatra with priſoners and preſents. A tax of two hundred talents a year given to Cleopatra.

WHEN Cleopatra had ſettled her affairs, and ſeen Anthony as far as Euphrates, upon his expedition into Armenia, ſhe came back again, and took Apamia and Damaſcus in her way to Judea, where ſhe was honourably received by Herod, who treated with her for the revenue of that part of Arabia and Jericho that had been granted her; the latter being a place famous for balſam, which is the moſt precious of all gums, and likewiſe for the faireſt palm-trees in the world. Upon this occaſion ſhe ſet all her wits and arts at work, to engage Herod in an amour; and being a woman naturally luſtful and ſhameleſs, ſhe did Cleopatra honourably received by Herod at Apamia and Ptolemais.

A woman luſtful and as ſhameleſs, as good as meet him half way, toward the ſtriking up of a bargain: But love was the pretence all this while, though 'twas likely enough ſhe might have ſome farther treacherous deſign in it. Now Herod, who knew Cleopatra already for one of the ſpitefulleſt creatures living, was as good as fortify'd againſt her beforehand; but when he came to ſee the proſtituted impudence of her behaviour, it gave him ſuch a horror, that he reſolved, if ever it came to the point, directly to turn her off, and affront her. "The queſtion was "now (and he conſulted his friends about it) "whether it might not be his beſt courſe to "make ſure of this vile woman while he had "her; for it would be both a ſatisfaction to "thoſe ſhe had abus'd heretofore, and a ſecurity to thoſe ſhe might otherwiſe abuſe "hereafter: Nay, and Anthony himſelf "would be the better for it too, for ſhe was "the common enemy of all mankind, and "would be falſe to him too, if ever he "ſhould come to ſtand in need of her. Herod was abſolutely for taking her off; but "thoſe about him, no leſs poſitive againſt it, "as a thing below the dignity of a prince to "run ſo great a hazard for. Wherefore they "beſought him by all means to bethink himſelf, and to do nothing raſhly; for Anthony, "they ſaid, would not bear it, let it be never "ſo much to his advantage; beſide that the "loſing of his miſtreſs by force, or ſecret "practice, would but enhance the value he "had for her before, and irritate him to a revenge. And then for the excuſing or palliating of a violence upon the perſon of a "princeſs of her illuſtrious blood and quality, "there would be no room for it: And let the "benefit he might reap by her death be never "ſo conſiderable, the outrage upon the honour "and inclinations of Anthony would be unpardonable. They laid before him alſo the "mortal confuſions that would inevitably follow, both in the kingdom, and in the royal family, upon the execution of what he "had in his thought. As for the laſcivious "importunities of the woman, there could be "neither harm nor danger in rejecting them; "and as to other matters, he had no more to "do than to act according to the reaſon of "the preſent ſtate of things." His friends, in fine, betwixt the ſtrength of their arguments, and the credit of their counſels, brought Herod over to an acknowledgment of his miſtake, and ſo diverted him from his deſperate intent: Upon which change of mind, he complimented Cleopatra with rich preſents, and conducted her to Egypt.

Herod is for putting Cleopatra to death; but his friends againſt it.

ARMENIA being now over-run by Anthony, he ſent Artabazes, the ſon of Tigranes, a priſoner into Egypt, with the princes, his ſons, and made a preſent of them to Cleopatra; together with all the valuable booty he had taken there. Artaxias, the eldeſt ſon of Artabazes, who fled out of the country at the breaking out of the war, ſucceeded to his father; but was afterward driven out again by Archilaus, and the emperor Nero, who put up Tigranes, the youngeſt brother of the family, into his place.

Herod ſpeaks Cleopatra fair, and ſets her part of her way for Egypt.

Anthony ſubdues Armenia, and compliments Cleopatra with priſoners and preſents.

As to the revenue of the country that Anthony had given to Cleopatra, Herod made punctual payment of it; for he full well knew her temper, and how unſafe and dangerous it would be for him to do any thing whereby to incur her diſpleaſure, and provoke her hatred. The Arabians, conſidering that Herod had the levying of the tax, made due payment for ſome time, at the proportion of two * hundred talents a year: But this did not laſt long, for they fell off by degrees, till it fell in the end to leſs than half.

A tax of two hundred talents a year given to Cleopatra.

Auguſtus and Anthony competitors for the empire. Herod marches with an army to join Anthony; who bids him fall upon the Arabians. A bloody battle, and the Jews get the better of it. The Arabians had another great army at Cana in Cele-Syria; and they routed that alſo: But Athenion falling upon the Jews afterward, when they were ſpent and weary, gave them a total overthrow.

HEROD would certainly have reveng'd himſelf by a war upon the Arabians for this contempt and breach of faith, if the civil broils of the Romans had not prevented him; for the battle of Actium was now drawing on, which in all likelihood would put an end to the competition that was then a-foot betwixt Auguſtus and Anthony, for the empire. This happen'd in the 187th Olympiad. Herod having been now a long time (by the favour and bounty of Anthony) the maſter of a rich and populous country in peace and plenty, endued with men, money, corn, cattle, &c. in abundance, he levy'd a powerful army out of hand, and march'd with it toward the aſſiſtance of his patron; but Anthony telling Herod that he had no need of it himſelf, appointed him rather to march back with it againſt the Arabians, whom he look'd upon to be a falſe and a faithleſs people. Now this was tranſacted by the counſel and direction of Cleopatra, who apprehended it would be to her intereſt to deſtroy the Jews and the Arabians by their ſwords: Herod, upon this order, drew off his army back again, and ſoon after fell into Arabia with a formidable body of horſe and foot; taking his march toward Diaſpolis; where the Arabians having intelligence of his motions, were ready to encounter him. The two armies engaged, and after a bloody battle, the Jews carry'd the day. A while after this, they got together another great army at Cana in Cele-Syria. Herod, upon notice of their march, drew the greater part of his troops that way too; propoſing to encamp and fortify, and their to wait the firſt fair opportunity of attacking the enemy. But the ſoldiers were ſo animated with their former ſucceſs, and ſo well aſſur'd of the reſolution, ſtate and condition of their army, that expectation they cry'd, was but ſo much time loſt, and nothing would ſerve them but they muſt fall on immediately. Nay, ſuch was their impatience, that there was no keeping them in order without it. The king was ſo well pleas'd with the preſſing forwardneſs and alacrity of his men, that he reſolv'd not to diſcourage their ardour by any longer delays: So he put himſelf immediately at the head of his army with ſword in hand; gave the word of command to march and fall on, and only to act after his example. They advanced upon this, with ſo much fierceneſs and bravery, that the Arabians were diſmay'd at the very ſight of it, before ever it came to the ſhock. They made ſome little ſhew however of a faint reſiſtance upon the firſt encounter; but preſently gave way, and finding they were not able to abide the impreſſion, the greater part of them fled.

The Jews put them to the rout.

THIS rout, in ſhort, had totally ruined the Arabians, if Athenion, Cleopatra's general in that quarter, had not taken advantage of that diſorder. This Athenion had a mortal averſion to Herod, and ſtood in a kind of neutrality, but with his men in order, and drawn up, attending the iſſue of the battle. If the Arabians had got the better of it, Athenion would have been quiet; but finding them to be worſted, and the Jews not only ſpent and wearied out with the action, but careleſs alſo and ſecure in the confidence of a certain victory, Athenion, with a conſiderable body of the natives, took the Jews off their guard, and attack'd them by ſurprize, diſperſing them without much difficulty; and in the purſuit over bogs and crags, which the Jews were not acquainted with, did great execution. Upon this defeat the Arabians took heart; rallied and re-inforced the battle, following the chace with ſo terrible a ſlaughter, that but a very ſmall party of this great body got off. The king finding the caſe deſperate, and his troops overborn with numbers, poſted away with all poſſible ſpeed for relief; but before he could bring it up, the Jews camp was taken and pillag'd; ſo that here was a victory gain'd beyond all hope or imagination, and a powerful enemy deſtroy'd, both in one, by the means of an unexpected ſurprize. Herod was forced after this diſaſter, to betake himſelf to depredations and incurſions upon the Arabians, and to encamp in the faſtneſſes of the mountains, without daring to expoſe his army to the fate of a battle; but this was not time utterly loſt, however, for the keeping his men in breath and exerciſe, and inuring them to all the duties of military diſcipline, he put them in condition to atone in ſome degree for the honour they had loſt.

Athenion falls upon the Jews, tir'd and careleſs, and gives them a total overthrow.

CHAP. VII.

A dreadful earthquake in Judea. The Jews ſue for a peace, and the Arabians put their ambaſſadors to death.

A dreadful earthquake in Judea.

IN the ſeventh year of the reign of Herod, and the year of the famous battle of Actium, there happen'd in Judea the moſt dreadful earthquake that ever had been heard of. It devour'd a great number of their cattle; and there periſh'd ten thouſand men in their towns, by the ruins of the houſes that were overturn'd; but the ſoldiers in the open air eſcap'd better, becauſe there was nothing over their heads to fall upon them. It is not to be imagin'd how proud and inſolent the Arabians grew upon the news of this calamity; which, how dreadful ſoever in the truth, was yet further aggravated in the report; for they computed upon it that Judea was totally depopulated, their cities and their people ſwallow'd up, and the nation no longer in condition to make head againſt them. In this diſtreſs they ſent their ambaſſadors to the Arabians to ſue for peace; who not only ſeized and put them to death, but ſoon after advanced with an army againſt them. The Jews were ſo diſpirited under the ſenſe of the deplorable and hopeleſs ſtate of their affairs, that they gave all for loſt, publick and private, without either minding what became of the government, or daring to ſtand their ground upon the approach of the enemy. The king did all that was poſſible to ſupport and encourage them in this abandon'd deſperation, by courting and cajoling them into a neceſſary reſolution of defending themſelves. There were ſome, even of the more generous ſort of his people, that while the wound was freſh and green, were not to be dealt withal by counſel or reaſon; but Herod, having brought them to a more tractable temper, by this frank way of proceeding, deliver'd what he had to ſay by way of comfort and encouragement to the army, in words to this effect:

The Jews ſue for a peace, and the Arabians put their ambaſſadors to death.

Herod's ſpeech to the army, with a ſtate of the war, and of the caſe. The Jews take courage, and beat the Arabians out of the field. The Arabians in a miſerable diſtreſs for want of water; and they deliver up themſelves to Herod for protection.

Herod's ſpeech to the army.

"YOU cannot be ignorant, ſays he, my brave fellow companions and ſoldiers, of the difficulties and misfortunes we have encounter'd of late, to our very great diſappointment; and in truth, it is no wonder to ſee, even the greateſt reſolutions ſtagger'd at it; but conſidering that the war is inevitably brought home to our doors, and that there is nothing as yet has befallen us, but may in ſome degree be repair'd by valour and conduct, I look upon it to be my part to raiſe and enliven your ſpirits, and to lay before you the means of recovering your primitive virtue.

The ſtate of the war, and of the caſe.

"To begin with the war; you are to conſider firſt, the juſtice of it, and then the moſt injurious provocations to it; two of the moſt powerful impulſes in nature to men of honour and courage. I ſhall then ſhew you that our misfortunes are not ſo hopeleſs and inſuperable as they may appear to be. To ſpeak in the firſt place to the firſt article; that is to ſay, the juſtice of the cauſe, be yourſelves the judges and the witneſſes of what I am about to ſay. As to the Arabians, you know them very well to be an impious and a barbarous generation of people, without either truth or honeſty; and that they lie under this character wherever they have to do. But they have been ſo to us in a tranſcendant manner, as if we had been ſingled out for the mark of their avarice and envy, above all others. To paſs over their ingratitude for other obligations, what was it but my intereſt with Anthony that prevented their falling under the yoke of Cleopatra? And it was for my ſake again,

"that

" that Anthony was otherwiſe ſo eaſy to them,
" out of a tenderneſs he had, not to do any " thing that I might take ill; and ſo for the " portions of land out of both provinces, that " Cleopatra obtained from Anthony, what " was it but my induſtry there alſo that ſet-
" tled the whole matter; partly by the pre-
" ſents I made him at my own coſt, and partly
" the * two hundred talents I undertook to " pay myſelf, and two hundred more that I " gave ſecurity for? Notwithſtanding that " ſeveral parcels of the land that pay their
" parts toward this tribute, and are at preſent
" in their poſſeſſion, do of right belong to the " Jews, who in equity ought to pay no tri" bute at all, eſpecially upon the account of " the Arabians that ſtand indebted to us, even
" for their very preſervation. But it ſeems
" more unreaſonable yet, for a nation that " enjoy their liberty by our favour, as they " have confeſs'd it over and over with a thou-
" ſand thanks, to refuſe us a juſt debt now at
" laſt, in a time of amity and peace, and to " violate that faith to their friends, which has " hitherto been held ſacred even among ene" mies. But theſe are a ſort of people worſe
" than the reſt of mankind, who underſtand
" no honeſty but profit, and account nothing
" a crime that's done for gain. What is there
" more in our caſe now, than the unqueſtion-
" able liberty of calling a faithleſs enemy to " an account by a juſt war? Now this is but " according to the will and precept of God
" himſelf, who gives us both command and
" authority to right thoſe who ſuffer wrong-
" fully under the power of violence and op-
" preſſion. eſpecially in a ſtate of hoſtility, not " only juſt, but neceſſary; as what could be " more horrid, or a greater affront to human
" ſociety, even in the judgment of both
" Greeks and Barbarians, than that execrable
" outrage of theirs upon the perſons of our
" ambaſſadors, a miniſterial order of men,
" whoſe character is every where held ſacred
" and inviolable, and with the Jews as much
" as any other; for what are the angels and
" the meſſengers of God, from whom we have " received the knowledge of his bleſſed will
" and commandments, but a glorious ſort of " ambaſſadors? And it is by this way of me" diation that we are brought to the know" ledge of our duty to our maker, and to the " means of living peaceably one with another.
" Judge now, if any thing can be more in" human, than to deſtroy the only competent
" proviſion God hath given us for the well-
" being and quiet of mankind, and to cut off
" thoſe neceſſary miniſters in the very execu" tion of their office. How can theſe people
" now ever expect either to proſper in war, or
" to be happy in peace, after ſuch an uſurpa-
" tion upon the natural equity and common
" privileges of human ſociety? For my own
" part, I cannot find that they have one word
" to ſay for themſelves; if it ſhall be ſug-
" geſted, that we have juſtice and equity on
" our ſide, but they a ſtronger human force
" and power on theirs. This is a way of ar" guing not to be admitted by people that have
" been better taught, and who know where-
" ever juſtice is, God is; and that numbers
" and ſtrength can never prevail againſt him.

" But extraordinary caſes apart: let us
" reaſon the matter a little upon the ſquare,
" and ſet force againſt force. In the firſt bat" tle we were too hard for them; and in the " ſecond they preſently gave way and fled be" fore us, upon the very firſt ſhock. When " we were abſolute maſters of the field, Athe-
" nion fell upon us, contrary both to law
" and honour; for there was no war declar'd.
" Will you give this action the name of va-
" lour, or of perfidy; or make any thing
" more of it than a ſucceſsful piece of injuſ-
" tice? That is not a time to ſink in our cou" rage, when we have ſo much ground for " hope. Why ſhould we be afraid now of " thoſe that we have always beaten whenever
" we had to do with them, upon fair and ho" nourable terms? men that never pretended
" to a victory but by fraud and foul play.
" But put the caſe now that they were va-
" liant indeed, that very conſideration ſhould
" be a ſpur to men of honour to encounter
" them; for there's no reputation to be gotten
" by the baffling of a ſcoundrel; but it is the " glory of one brave man to overcome an" other. If any of you ſhould be ſtagger'd
" at the thought of our domeſtic broils, or the " judgment perhaps of our late earthquake,
" 'tis a main point that the Arabians will find
" themſelves mightily miſtaken in the opinion
" of, and in reckoning upon the calamity to " be much greater than it was; neither is
" there the leaſt colour of reaſon in the world,
" why any thing ſhould diſcourage us, be-
" cauſe it emboldens them; and they have no
" ground in nature for their confidence, but " that they take us to be broken-hearted, and " deſponding; ſo that we have no more to " do to humble their inſolence, than gene-
" rouſly to bear up againſt our own misfor-
" tunes; and the more conſiderable we make " ourſelves, the leſs conſiderable we ſhall find
" the enemy. Neither are we ſo deſpicable
" as we are ſuppos'd to be; for our diſap-
" pointment has nothing in it that looks like
" a fatality; but we are to reckon upon it
" among the common chances of war. If " God brought this evil upon us, it is as cer" tain that he remov'd it from us too, ac" cording to his merciful method of puniſh-
" ing ſinners, without deſtroying them; but
" for a more convincing argument of God's " approbation of our proceeding in this war,
" do but obſerve what a ſignal evidence he has
" been pleas'd to give us in favour of it.
" What clearer manifeſtation of God's diſ-
" tinguiſhing goodneſs toward you could you
" deſire, than that when ſo many thouſands
" of other people up and down the province,
" were taken away by this devouring earth-
" quake, not one ſoldier ſuffer'd in it; and
" who knows, if the whole nation had been
" engag'd in the ſame cauſe, but the pie-
" ty of it might poſſibly have averted the " judgment? Keep this providence in your " thought, with this further comfort and aſ-
" ſurance, that you have the Almighty for " your protector; and take this along with
" you too, that you have right on your ſides,

"in ſacrilegious and unmanly murders, and "not the heart to look a reſolute enemy in "the face."

The Jews take courage, and beat the Arabians out of the field.

THIS harangue of Herod's ſet the Jews on fire to be in action; ſo that making uſe of the opportunity, he ſacrificed in form, and march'd away immediately toward the Arabians beyond Jordan, where he encamp'd. There was a caſtle betwixt the two armies, which both parties, it ſeems, had an eye upon, as a place of great advantage, in caſe either of decamping, or of a battle. The firſt point in diſpute was the gaining of this poſt, which began in a skirmiſh at a diſtance, with darts and launces; but drawing nearer one another by degrees, it came in the end to a cloſe engagement, with loſs of men on both ſides, till in the concluſion the Arabians turn'd their backs, and quitted the field. This ſucceſs put the Jews in ſuch heart, finding the Arabians ſo cow'd, that they puſh'd them to their very trenches, where for a while they made a ſhow in a diſorderly way, of ſome ſort of reſiſtance; but it was ſo faint, that there was not to be ſeen either in their looks or actions, the leaſt hope of prevailing. They fought it however after their way, partly encourag'd by their numbers, and partly forced upon it by the inevitable neceſſity of either fighting or dying, till at laſt, after a long conteſt, and a great deal of blood ſpilt, they were put to a total rout; and with ſo terrible a ſlaughter, that betwixt thoſe that fell by the enemy's ſwords and their own, and thoſe that were trod to death in the crowd, they wanted five thouſand of their number; the reſt making away to their camp, but with a miſerable proſpect before them; for they had neither proviſions nor water to ſubſiſt upon. And in this deplorable condition the Jews coop'd them up ſo cloſe, that there was no room left either for relief or eſcape.

Their miſerable diſtreſs for want of water.

IN this extremity they ſent out a requeſt to Herod by their deputies, that he would either grant them a peace, or but the charity of cold water to quench their parching thirſt; but Herod was ſo bent upon his revenge, that he would not ſo much as hear of any thing of ambaſſadors or preſents from them, nor gratify them in any thing whatſoever they deſir'd. Within the compaſs of five days after this, a matter of four thouſand of them came out, and offer'd themſelves to captivity and chains, to avoid the more inſupportable calamity of a raging drought. On the ſixth day all the reſt made a ſally by conſent, and attack'd the beſiegers, chuſing rather a preſent certainty of death, than to expoſe themſelves with infamy to the lingring torment of it. In this deſperation they iſſued out of their camp, but without either ſpirits or ſtrength anſwerable to the pretence of ſuch an action; only they ſought their death as the only eaſe their condition was capable of. There fell ſeven thouſand of them upon the firſt encounter; and this overthrow taught them to their coſt, that Herod was a great captain, and not to be treated at that rate, and thereupon they deliver'd themſelves up to his protection.

They deliver up themſelves to Herod's protection.

CHAP. IX.

Herod puff'd up with a cheap victory. Anthony defeated at Actium. Herod is for taking Hyrcanus out of the way; a ſoft eaſy prince. Alexandra, an aſpiring turbulent woman, writes to Malchus to meet her with a party at the lake of Aſphaltitis. Doſitheus ſhews Herod the letter; and after that the anſwer. Hyrcanus is examin'd upon it, and put to death. The whole ſtory thought to be a contrivance of Herod's. The hiſtory of Hyrcanus. Herod goes preſently to Ceſar, and commits his government to his brother Pheroras; leaves his relations in Maſſada, and his wife in Alexandrion; Joſeph and Sohemus their keepers.

Herod puffed up with this victory.

THIS victory elevated Herod to ſuch a degree of vanity in his own thoughts, and of reputation in the world for a great man at arms, that he returned home in the full poſſeſſion of his uttermoſt wiſhes; but in the very rapture of this imaginary eſtabliſhment of his fortune, he had the mortification to receive the ſad and woful news of Anthony's being defeated at Actium by Auguſtus, upon which he gave himſelf up for a loſt man; and it was not his thought alone neither, but friends and foes were all of the ſame opinion, and that Auguſtus would never forgive any man that had been ſo great a friend to Anthony. The former were ſo plain with him, as not to diſguiſe the apprehenſion they had of his ruin; the other, under a pretence of condoling with him, were nevertheleſs heartily glad at the hopeful proſpect they had of better things. It ran in Herod's head, that Hyrcanus being the only ſurviving branch of the family, it would be much for his intereſt to have him taken out of the way, whatever might become of himſelf, with a reſpect to Ceſar; for whether he eſcap'd his diſpleaſure, or fell under it, he did not think it ſafe to have ſo fair a pretender betwixt himſelf and the government; beſide that, on the other hand, he gratified his end by cutting him off from the ſucceſſion. While he was caſting about in his thoughts what to do, the very family of Hyrcanus furniſh'd him with an occaſion to bring him to a reſolution. This ſame Hyrcanus he knew to be a man of a ſoft eaſy nature; one that had ever been averſe to buſineſs, leaving all things to chance, and a perſon content under all conditions; but his daughter Alexandra, on the contrary, was a woman of an aſpiring turbulent temper; impotent in her paſſions, and manifeſtly over-joy'd in the hope ſhe had of a change. This woman was ſtill preſſing and tampering with her father, to bethink himſelf of ſome way to deliver his family from the oppreſſions and perſecutions of Herod, and to provide in time for his own ſecurity, in the proſpect and contemplation of his better fortune. Her advice was, that he ſhould write to Malchus, at that time governor of Arabia, deſiring him, if there ſhould be occaſion, to receive him into his protection; for if it ſhould be Herod's hap to fall under the diſpleaſure of Ceſar, he could not fail of being reſtor'd to his dignity, having an indiſputable right of title, and the good-will of the people, clearly on his ſide.

Anthony's defeat at Actium.

Herod is for taking Hyrcanus out of the way.

Hyrcanus a ſoft eaſy prince.

Alexandra of an aſpiring turbulent ſpirit.

HYRCANUS for a good while would not give ear to her perſuations; but being plied day and night to the ſame tune with hopeful encouragements on the one ſide, and the treacherous practices of Herod on the other, he ſuffer'd himſelf to be over-born in the end, by the importunity of a woman; and ſo wrote to the Arabian, and committed the charge of the letter to one Doſitheus, in ſubſtance to this purpoſe: That he would ſend him a party of horſemen to the lake Aſphaltitis, about three * hundred furlongs from Jeruſalem. This letter was the rather entruſted to Doſitheus, as a confident both of Hyrcanus and Alexandra; and in regard that he was look'd upon as an enemy to Herod; not only for the putting of his kinſman Joſeph to death, but for the ſake of his brothers that were diſpatch'd ſome time before by Anthony at Tyre. But all this was not enough yet to keep Doſitheus true to his truſt; ſo that he rather choſe to make an intereſt with the preſent king, and went and ſhewed him the letter, who gave him thanks for the good office; deſiring only one thing farther of him, which was, that he ſhould make it up again and ſeal it, and ſo carry it forward to Malchus, and receive his anſwer; for it would much concern him, he ſaid, to ſee how the other behav'd himſelf upon it. Doſitheus acquitted himſelf punctually of his commiſſion, and brought back with him the Arabian's anſwer, which was to this effect: "That he was ready to entertain himſelf and "his family; and that if he brought the whole "party of the Jews along with him, that were "in that intereſt, they ſhould be all welcome; "and that he would ſend him a convoy for "their ſafety; and, in fine, that he was ready "to ſerve him to all manner of purpoſes." Herod, upon the receipt of this letter, called Hyrcanus to him, and ask'd him the queſtion, whether he held any intelligence with Malchus or not, who ſaid, None at all; and thereupon Herod produc'd the letter, had it read publickly, and order'd Hyrcanus to be put to death. This is the ſtory as we find it in Herod's commentaries, though 'tis reported ſeveral ways. Some will have it, that he was put to death for a conſpiracy, and not for the crime that is here ſuggeſted; and write, "That "Herod put it to Hyrcanus once at an enter-"tainment, and without any ſhew of ſuſpi-"cion; whether he had received any letters "from Malchus. He ſaid, yes indeed he "had; but they were only letters of courſe "and common civility. Herod went then "a little farther with him, and ask'd if he "had never receiv'd any preſents from him. "He ſaid yes he had; but they were only "four horſes for his pleaſure." The king would have this to be treaſon and corruption, and had him preſently taken away for it, and executed. Many are of opinion after all this yet, that he died innocent, and upon very good grounds too; for he was known to be a man of the moſt mild diſpoſition that ever was heard of; ſo modeſt and temperate, that he was not guilty of one raſh action in the whole courſe of his life; no, not ſo much as in the liberties of his youth, or the exerciſe of his authority; for he govern'd altogether by the advice of Antipater, the father of Herod. He was now upward of eighty years of age; and not ignorant that Herod was ſafe in the eſtabliſhment of his power, and himſelf on the wrong ſide of Euphrates, having left his friends behind him, and all this in ſubmiſſion to his dominion. Now for Hyrcanus to attempt a thing in appearance ſo impracticable, and otherwiſe ſo contrary to his genius and inclination, no mortal can pretend to believe, or that there was any thing more in the whole ſtory than a mere practice and contrivance of Herod's.

The whole ſtory ſuſpected for a practice of Herod's

THIS was the end of Hyrcanus, after a ſtrange variety of fortune in a long and a troubleſome life. He was advanced to the pontificate in the reign of his mother Alexandra; upon whoſe deceaſe, after nine years execution of his office, he ſucceeded to the government. In three months after this he was driven out by his brother Ariſtobulus; but reſtor'd after that, by Pompey, to the poſſeſſion of all his dignities, which he enjoy'd for the ſpace of forty years. He was once again then dethron'd by Antigonus; had his ears cut off, and carried away priſoner to the Parthians. He had not been there long, but he was ſet at liberty, and came back again; promiſing himſelf mighty matters from the friendſhip of Herod, who was ſo far from anſwering his expectations, that on the contrary, after ſo many turns and croſſes of a vexatious fortune, he cauſed him to be put to an infamous death in the extremity of his old age. He was, in fine, a man of eminent candor, juſtice, and moderation; but a lover of his eaſe, and ſo conſcious to himſelf of his own inſufficiency for the offices of a publick adminiſtration, that for the moſt part he entruſted the charge into other hands. This facility of Hyrcanus was the making of Antipater's and Herod's fortunes, and it was ſo order'd, that this goodneſs of his, without any colour of law, or equity, coſt him his life.

The hiſtory of Hyrcanus.

So ſoon as Herod had made ſure of Hyrcanus, he went his way preſently to Ceſar, but without any thought of favour from him, toward a man that had ſo heartily eſpouſed the cauſe of Anthony. He had a ſtrong ſuſpicion of Alexandra; and not knowing what advantage ſhe might make of his abſence, toward the ſtirring up of the people to a rebellion, he lodg'd the government in the hands of his brother Pheroras; diſpoſing of his mother Cypris, with the ſiſter, and other relations, into the caſtle of Maſſada, appointing his brother, in caſe any miſchief ſhould befal him, to maintain his poſt, and continue the adminiſtration in his own name. As to his wife Mariamne, he placed her in Alexandrion, with her mother Alexandra, there being ſo great a feud betwixt his wife, his mother, and his ſiſter, that there could be no thought of their living quietly together. He put the government of the fort into the hands of a couple of try'd and truſty friends, Joſeph his treaſurer, and Sohemus an Iturean, under a pretext of doing honour to theſe princeſſes; but with private order over and above, ſo ſoon as ever they ſhould come to be certainly inform'd of any violence upon his perſon, immediately to deſtroy them both; and to the uttermoſt of their power, ſecure the government to his ſons, and to his brother.

A generous ſpeech of Herod's to Ceſar; which is extremely well receiv'd, and he himſelf reſettled in his government. Herod intercedes for Alexander; but Auguſtus had bound himſelf up by a vow: So that nothing could be done in it. He waits upon Ceſar at Ptolemais, where he had a moſt magnificent reception.

SO ſoon as Herod had given all neceſſary orders, he haſten'd away to Rhodes to find out Ceſar there. Upon his arrival, he took off his crown, and laid it aſide; but for the reſt of his royal robes, he kept them without ſhifting them. Upon Ceſar's admitting him to his audience, he gave a noble teſtimony of the greatneſs of his mind; and without any ſubmiſſion, excuſes, or ſupplications, as is common in ſuch caſes, he made a frank report of matter of fact, without the formality of any crouching preface, or apology.

A frank and a generous ſpeech of Herod to Ceſar.

"I am not come hither, great Ceſar, ſays he, "to diſown the ſacredneſs of a friendſhip I "have ever had for Anthony, and I ſhall take "a farther freedom to declare, that he ſhould "have been maſter of the world, if I could "have made him ſo. 'Tis true, I was not perſonally in the laſt battle with him; for my "commiſſion call'd me away againſt the Arabians; but at the ſame time, I ſerv'd him "to the uttermoſt of my power with money "and proviſions; and I was ſorry I could do "no more too; for ſuch was the tenderneſs I "had for Anthony, and ſuch my obligations "to him, that I reckon'd my life as much a "debt to him; and it was effectually as much "at his devotion, as my fortune: But ſince "I could not be with him at Actium, I muſt "yet juſtify myſelf, that I had ſtill the ſame "affection for his perſon and cauſe, after that "fatal day, that I had before: Neither did "I ſo much as waver, at this change of fortune, toward the changing of my party. "Nay, in thoſe occaſions, when I could not "aſſiſt him with my arms, I never fail'd to "ſerve him with my advice, which was to "cut off Cleopatra in time, and ſeize her "kingdom into his own hands, as the only "courſe in nature to preſerve him. And if "he had taken this precaution, I dare appeal "to Ceſar himſelf, whether he would not "have thought it reaſonable to have treated "with him at this inſtant upon fairer terms; "but he choſe rather to go another way to "work; and for want of conſideration, advanced your intereſt inſtead of his own. "Now if you ſhall think the worſe of me for "taking part with Anthony, becauſe you were "his profeſs'd enemy, this ſhall not hinder "me yet from owning and juſtifying the ſervices I have done him, and the reſpect I "have ever had for him. But if you ſhall "be pleas'd now to conſider the quality, the "friendſhip, abſtracted from the circumſtances of the perſon, you will find in the faith "and gratitude of the caſe, ſomewhat perhaps "that may encourage you to make trial of it "yourſelf; for whether it be to Ceſar, or to "Anthony, the dignity of the character will "be ſtill the ſame."

Ceſar treats him with a ſingular reſpect;

THESE words of Herod's were deliver'd with an air ſo generous, and accompany'd with ſo moving a grace, that Auguſtus, who had in him naturally a greatneſs and benignity of mind, was not able to reſiſt the charms of his very defence: Inſomuch, that treating him with ſingular inſtances of humanity and eſteem, he bad him take up his crown again, and be the ſame friend for the future to himſelf, that he had formerly been to Anthony; giving alſo to underſtand that * Capidius had made him ſenſible of the good offices Herod had done him in the matter of the gladiators. When Herod came to find theſe fair words follow'd with anſwerable effects; as the re-inſtating of him in his kingdom, with a decree of the ſenate, to ſecure him the poſſeſſion of it; and all this done by the ſpecial favour and procurement of Ceſar, which was a felicity ſo much beyond Herod's expectation, that nothing could be more ſurprizing to him. Upon this eſtabliſhment, he attended Auguſtus into Egypt, treating himſelf and his friends upon the way with a magnificence of pomp and preſents, ſuitable to the perſon and the obligation; and every way anſwerable to the largeneſs of his heart. He did what he could with Ceſar on the behalf of Alexander, a friend of Anthony's, toward the gaining of his pardon; but Auguſtus having ty'd himſelf up by a ſolemn vow not to ſpare him, his requeſt could not be granted.

Herod intercedes for Alexander; but he's under a vow not to ſpare him.

THE Jews, that upon this turn, gave Herod for loſt, were in ſuch an amazement at his coming back greater than he went out, that they look'd upon him as a perſon under the care of a peculiar providence, that turn'd all his perils and diſgraces to his advantage.

WHEN Ceſar was now upon his return out of Egypt, Herod went out to meet him at Ptolemais, where he treated him with an incredible ſtate and expence; and not only himſelf, but his whole army too, whom he ſupply'd with all manner of neceſſaries. Upon this occaſion, Ceſar took him, in a friendly way of familiarity, with him; inſomuch that they two rode together commonly, while their troops were drawing out. Herod, having at hand a train of a hundred and fifty perſons, richly habited, and perfectly well inſtructed in the province that was committed to their charge, it was their buſineſs to attend the ſervice of Ceſar and his friends in their paſſage, and to provide, that neither himſelf nor his army ſhould want either wine or water, let the ways be never ſo dry and barren: Which gave him a mighty reputation among the ſoldiers. He preſented Ceſar, in fine, with eight † hundred talents, and gave ſo univerſal a ſatisfaction, that they paid a greater veneration to the dignity of his mind than to that of his crown. Herod's family in great diſorder. His wife and mother-in-law no better than priſoners.

HEROD at his return to his kingdom, in the very height of all his glory, found a diſorder'd family, and his wife and mother-in-law highly incenſed againſt him; for they look'd upon themſelves, (and not without reaſon) rather as priſoners in that caſtle, than as there depoſited for the ſecurity of their perſons; and it was no ſmall mortification to them alſo to conſider, that they had not the command there of any thing in the world. Mariamne was ſtrongly poſſeſs'd with an opinion that all her husband's countenances of love to her, were only diſguiſe and pretext for his own convenience. But the thing at laſt that ſhe took moſt heinouſly, was her huſband's reſolution not to ſuffer her to ſurvive him in caſe of his death. She could not forget the bloody order her husband had given to Joſeph: So that ſhe had no other way of ſafety left her, unleſs ſhe could ſweeten her keepers; Sohemus eſpecially, for her life was manifeſtly in his hands. He ſtood his integrity a while at the beginning, and kept true to his truſt; but upon the women's plying him with little favours, and fair words, he gave way by little and little; and in the end, blabs the whole ſtory of Herod's inſtructions; which he thought he might do with the more ſafety, ſince he took it for granted, Herod would never return home with the ſame power he was inveſted with when he went out; and therefore he argued with himſelf thus: "As there is no "danger of him, ſays he, on the one hand, ſo "I ſhall be ſure of the princeſſes to be my "friends on the other; and by this means ſe-"cure myſelf againſt all chances: Or put the "caſe, ſays he again at worſt, and that Herod "ſhould ſucceed in every thing to his wiſh, "he has, to my knowledge, ſo doting a paſ-"ſion for Mariamne, that he will never do "any thing without her." Upon theſe conſiderations, he diſcloſed the whole ſecret. Now the thought of theſe repeated practices, one after another upon the life of Mariamne, gave her ſuch a diſguſt for her husband, that ſhe made it her daily prayer he might never come alive back again; ſuch was the dread and horror ſhe had at the very thought of living with him: And this was no more than ſhe openly own'd a while after, when ſhe could diſguiſe the matter no longer.

Herod's order to Joſeph for deſtroying Mariamne in her hearing.

The women plying him with little favours and their keepers.

Sohemus diſcovers the plot upon Mariamne's life, and turns her heart againſt her husband.

HEROD was ſo elated with the new and unexpected honours and preferments confer'd upon him, that he thought the time long (as he had reaſon) till he brought Mariamne the firſt tidings of it himſelf; which he did with all the tenderneſſes of kiſſes and embraces, as the woman of the world he had the greateſt value for. But while he was amplifying upon the ſtory of his good fortunes, his wife receiv'd him with an air of careleſneſs and indifferency all the while, giving no heed to what he ſaid. The ſlight indeed was a little too open; but ſhe being a woman of candor and ſincerity, gave to underſtand in her countenance, that Herod's good news and careſſes were rather troubleſome to her, than agreeable. So that he was no longer tormented with a jealouſy, but it was now come to a demonſtrative certainty of what he fear'd; for his wife's averſion to him was by this time ſo manifeſt, that what with indignation to ſee his love ſo deſpis'd, and what with the confuſion he was in betwixt the tranſports of his rage, and his affection, ſuch was his diſtraction under the violence of theſe two extremes, that he was as it were torn to pieces by different paſſions, while his tenderneſs drew him this way, and his reſentments hurry'd him that: So that he could not gratify the one without giving offence to the other. But the thing he moſt of all dreaded was this, leſt in taking a preſent revenge upon his wife, he might draw a worſe miſchief upon his own head in the conſequence, when he ſhould come to find afterward that he could not live without her.

Herod himſelf carries his wife the firſt tidings of his preferment.

Mariamne makes him a cold and a careleſs return.

This indifference made Herod raging mad.

WHILE Herod was labouring in this reſtleſs anxiety of thought how to behave himſelf toward Mariamne, his mother and ſiſter could not have wiſh'd for a fairer opportunity of blowing the coal, and of interpoſing by calumnies and other ill offices, to inflame the outrageous jealous humour of her husband againſt her. They ply'd him, in ſhort, with ſuch ſuggeſtions, as though he could not abſolutely reject, yet neither could he ſo thoroughly believe them as irrevocably to deſtroy a perſon he had ſo great a kindneſs for upon the credit of that evidence. Herod however became every day more and more uneaſy; and by degrees harſher to her: And as Mariamne on the other hand made no difficulty of diſcovering her diſcontents, ſo Herod's extreme affection came by little and little to be tranſported into an embitter'd hatred: Inſomuch that he might probably have put her to extremities out of hand, if it had not been for the news juſt at that inſtant of the death of Anthony and Cleopatra, and of Ceſar's being at that time in the poſſeſſion of Egypt. Upon this intelligence, Herod haſten'd away to Auguſtus; leaving things at this paſs in his family, ly, and recommending Mariamne to Sohemus over again, with acknowledgments of his former care and fidelity, and the grant of a command in Judea for a gratification. Upon this congress in Egypt, Cesar treated Herod at another rate of freedom and confidence than before, and with divers instances of a singular esteem and respect; as he presented him with the four hundred Gauls that had been of Cleopatra's guards; putting him into possession of that part of the country that Anthony had bestow'd upon Cleopatra; with the additional government of Gadara, Hippen, and Samaria; and toward the sea, of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and the tower of Straton, which was no small accession of power and splendor to his royal state.

Herod more in Cesar's favour than ever.

Herod returns to Jerusalem; a miserable man in all his glory.

WHEN he had waited upon Cesar as far as Antioch, he went back again to Jerusalem, where he found himself as miserable at home, as he had been fortunate abroad; and that the dazzling satisfactions of a crown were not sufficient to balance the mortifications of an unhappy marriage, especially being a match on which he placed his chief felicity, and thought would be the greatest blessing of his life; for no mortal ever doated upon a woman as he did upon Mariamne, and with an honourable passion too; not but that she was a person possess'd all this while to the highest degree of a scrupulous chastity; but inclin'd by fits to a peevishness of temper, whereby she forgot all respect for her husband's patience, authority, and power, even to the treating of him sometimes in a contumelious and reproachful manner; but he bore every thing temperately and calmly, notwithstanding she frequently carried her provocations so high as to upbraid his mother and sister at every turn, with the meanness of their families; and this so publickly too, that the fewd it rais'd among the women was implacable; beside, that it kept up the malevolent humour of calumnies and scandals.

Mariamne a woman of honour and virtue, but humourous.

THESE jealousies continued for a whole year after Herod's coming back from Cesar, and increased daily, till in the end this following contrivance was put in execution. The king took an occasion once in the heat of the day to retire into his closet to repose himself, where a kind fit taking him, he call'd for Mariamne; she went in to him, and upon his caressing of her, made no other return to all his dalliances, importunities, and prayers, than that of a contemptuous scornful repulse; inveighing against him at the same time with bitterness for the death of her father and brother. Herod was so incensed with the indignity of this affront, that starting up in a rage, he could scarce forbear laying violent hands upon her. His sister hearing a disturbance, kept the butler in readiness to discharge himself of a commission that she had given him some time before; which was to go to the king with a story, how Mariamne had been tampering with him to assist her in the preparing of a love potion for him; directing him, if the king should ask what was in it, he should only say, that it was of Mariamne's ordering; and for the ingredients, that he knew nothing of them, his part being only to present it; but in case the king made no further enquiry, he should hold his tongue, and there would be no hurt done. The butler having his instructions at his fingers ends, did every thing according to his order, and so addressing himself to Herod with a face of gravity and business, he gave him to understand, that Mariamne had been tempting him with money and rewards to provide a philtre for him. The butler finding the king to be startled at it, told him further, that having such a potion offer'd him, and not knowing what might be in it, he thought it the safest way, both for his majesty and for himself, to wait upon him with this information. Herod was sufficiently exasperated already; but the surprize of this discourse made him directly outrageous; so that he order'd immediately the putting of a particular confident of Mariamne's to the torture, taking for granted that there was not any thing, little or great, that she would do without his privity. As to the points he was question'd upon, there was nothing to be extorted from him; but letting fall some words in the anguish of his pains, hinting that it was somewhat Sohemus had told Mariamne, that made her so uneasy, Herod burst out into an exclamation while the words were yet betwixt his lips; "That Sohemus, who had ever been so faithful a subject, and a patriot to his prince and country, would never have betray'd such a secret as this was, but in the confidence and endearments of a lascivious embrace." In this very instant he appointed Sohemus to be seiz'd and put to death; summoning his wife to answer for herself in a court of justice, before a cabal of his own creatures for her judges. The charge exhibited against her was a pretended conspiracy to poison the king. Herod was fiercer and fouler upon her, both in words and in actions, than stood with the dignity of a tribunal of justice; and perceiving how he stood affected, they all pronounced her guilty after his example. But yet, the sentence notwithstanding, neither Herod himself, nor the people about him, were of opinion for precipitating the execution, but rather to keep her in a prison, than to take away her life; only Salome and her faction stickled violently for the dispatching her out of hand, and the king was the more easily prevail'd upon to agree to it, for fear of a revolt, the danger of which they suggested, when the people should understand that the queen was yet living. This was the pretence that brought Mariamne to her end.

Herod takes Mariamne into his closet. She treats his dalliances with scorn, and upbraids him with the death of her father and brother.

A plot upon Mariamne's life, betwixt Salome and the butler.

Herod in a fit of jealousy puts Sohemus to death, and tries Mariamne for her life, before a court of his own creatures.

Mariamne receives sentence, and at the instance of Salome is put to death.

ALEXANDRA, after this proceeding upon her daughter, might reasonably enough expect that her own turn should be next; so that for fear of the worst, she abandon'd her reputation to save her life; and fell so low, that her behaviour was become a scandal to her character. She was so over zealous to purge herself of any confederacy with her daughter, that she made it her business to blacken her in all companies, as the most wicked and ungrateful of women, and to celebrate the justice of rewarding her according to her desert, for so barbarous a practice upon so indulgent a husband; nay, her hypocrisy was so gross, and strain'd so high, that every body look'd upon it as ridiculous in the forced affectation of so many extravagant outrages; as flying in the face of her daughter, and the like: but Mariamne still, as they were leading her to her execution, pass'd by all these intemperances, without one word of reply, or the least sign of perturbation, more than in her countenance, Alexandra's heart fails her to a most scandalous degree.

for the ſhameful part her mother had in ſo extravagant and frantick a ſcene. She demeaned herſelf all the way, in ſhort, with a ſerene conſtancy of ſpirit, and without ſo much as changing colour upon the approach or apprehenſion of death. She died, in fine, as great as ſhe liv'd, firm and fearleſs, to her laſt gaſp.

Mariamne's conſtancy to the laſt.

THIS was the end of that virtuous generous princeſs, a lady without exception, had ſhe not been of a temper too perverſe and high-ſpirited. The charms of her beauty, the graces of her perſon, and the agreeable majeſty of her converſation, were not only ſuperior to the excellencies of the reſt of her ſex, but even beyond expreſſion too upon the compariſon. Now theſe advantageous gifts and qualities were in a great meaſure the very cauſe of her misfortune, in the uneaſy life ſhe led with her husband; for he ador'd her like a goddeſs; denying her and croſſing her in nothing; ſhe did what ſhe liſted, and took what liberty ſhe pleas'd; nay, greater perhaps than ſhe ſhould have done, in the frequent reproaches ſhe caſt upon him, for the death of her relations. By this heedleſs way of an inconſiderate freedom ſhe made herſelf hateful to her husband's mother and ſiſter, and in concluſion to himſelf too, whom ſhe thought ſhe could never have loſt.

THE paſſion Herod had for Mariamne in her life-time (which we have ſpoken of before) was become much more unruly and importunate, now ſhe was dead and gone; for he did not love his wife at the common rate of other husbands, but to ſuch a violent exceſs, over and above the tie of conjugal affection, that he grew rather fonder and fonder of her, the worſe ſhe us'd him. In his reflections now upon what he had done, he broke out not only into unkindly, but unmanly exclamations, with Mariamne's name ſtill in his mouth, and her blood crying for vengeance. In the agony of this horror, he did all that was to be done by wine, company, feaſting, and variety of other entertainments, to divert his melancholy; but when he ſaw all would not do, he threw up the care of his government, and intirely abandoning himſelf to grief, he fell by degrees to be light-headed, and talk idly; and in his raving fits, he would frequently be calling for Mariamne to be brought to him; his fancy running upon her as if ſhe were yet alive. While he was in this diſtemper, there broke out a terrible raging plague in Jeruſalem, that from the higheſt to the loweſt ſwept away all ſorts of people, and every body look'd upon it as a juſt judgment for the murder of the innocent queen. The king growing worſe and worſe, withdrew himſelf into a ſolitary retreat out of the way, and had it given out, that he was gone a hunting. He had not been long in this retirement, but he fell into ſo deſperate an illneſs, with a violent inflammation and a deadly pain in the head, that he ſcarce knew what he did. The common methods of remedy they found did him more hurt than good; inſomuch, that his caſe, in one word, was little leſs than deſperate; ſo that conſidering the difficulty of the diſeaſe, the condition of the patient, and that there was no place for any regular courſe of preſcription, his phyſicians found it to no purpoſe to tamper any further with him, and ſo gave him over to be his own doctor; bidding him call for what he had a mind to, and committing the event to providence. This was at Samaria, now called ebaſte.

The horrors of Herod's conſcience.

A raging plague in Jeruſalem.

Herod viſited with a judicial diſtemper.

WHEN Alexandra, who was then at Jeruſalem, came to underſtand Herod's condition, ſhe ſet her wits at work how ſhe might get ſome of the ſtrong forts into her hand; and ſhe had an eye upon two of them above the reſt; the one joining cloſe to the temple, the other in the city; conſidering that whoever is poſſeſs'd of theſe towers, may command the whole country and people: For the Jews will rather part with their lives than with their religion; and as they cannot live without their daily ſacrifices, ſo whoever commands theſe turrets have it at choice, whether they ſhall have any ſacrifices or no. Alexandra, in purſuance of her deſign, apply'd herſelf to the governors of theſe forts after this manner: "You well "know ſays ſhe, that the king is at this pre-"ſent in a miſerable extremity; and therefore "pray be pleaſed to deliver theſe two for-"treſſes into the poſſeſſion of the king's wife's "mother, and the children of Herod and Ma-"riamne; for otherwiſe the ſucceſſion may "come to be tranſported into another family; "and in caſe of his recovery, the government "cannot be lodg'd in ſafer hands than thoſe "of his neareſt relations." They could not be prevail'd upon to take this for a reaſonable requeſt; partly out of a ſenſe of duty to their truſt, but principally out of the hatred they bore to Alexandra, beſide the ſcruple they made of prejudging and pronouncing upon the king's life, with whom they had entertain'd a friendſhip of long ſtanding; and one of them, whoſe name was Achiab, being Herod's own nephew. The firſt thing Achiab did after this propoſal, was to ſend Herod word of it, who commanded her immediately to be put to death.

Alexandra contrives the getting of ſome ſtrong forts into her hand.

She moves it to the government.

Achiab ſends Herod word of the propoſal; and ſhe is immediately put to death.

THIS fit of ſickneſs wrought ſuch a wonderful effect upon Herod's body and mind (for with much ado he got over it at laſt) that his temper became ſo outrageous and bloody after his recovery, that every trifle put him upon the moſt inhuman extremities; and friend or foe was all alike to him, if they fell in his way. As for inſtance; there were Coſtobarus, Lyſimachus, Antipater, otherwiſe called Gadia, and Doſitheus, who ſuffer'd upon theſe pretexts following. Coſtobarus was one of the greateſt men in Idumea, and of a family whoſe anceſtors had formerly officiated as prieſts of Coze, a deity that they had in great veneration, till they came in the days of Hyrcanus to embrace the worſhip of the Jews. Herod was no ſooner advanced to his kingdom, but he gave this Coſtobarus the commands of Idumea and Gaza, with his ſiſter Salome to wife, whoſe husband Joſeph, he himſelf (as we have ſaid elſewhere) had cauſed to be ſlain. This was a promotion ſo much beyond any hope or pretence of Coſtobarus, that he grew proud and inſolent upon it, to the degree even of diſputing the authority of his maſter; looking upon it as an unworthy ſubmiſſion for the Idumeans to own themſelves the ſubjects of the Jews, in conſequence of embracing their ceremonies and worſhip. He ſent, upon this, an embaſſy to Cleopatra; minding her that Idumea had been ſtill under the adminiſtration of her forefathers, and that ſhe ſhould do well to make her her application to Anthony for the command; profeſſing himſelf likewiſe to be at her devotion. Now he did not propoſe this addreſs out of any deſire he had to have Cleopatra for his miſtreſs; but to the end that by the weakening of Herod, he might the more eaſily ſeize the government of Idumea to himſelf: For he had two fair encouragements to the hope of ſucceeding in this enterprize; that is to ſay, the honour of his extraction, and mighty ſums of money which he had amaſs'd without any ſcruple of either honeſty or conſcience, provided he might but gain his end; and after all this, his ambition was as notorious as his avarice. Cleopatra try'd her intereſt with Anthony for Idumea, but it would not do; and this coming to Herod's ear, Coſtobarus had loſt his life for it, if the mother and the ſiſter had not interceded for him; but he had his pardon granted him at laſt, upon condition never to be truſted again. There was a falling out afterwards betwixt Coſtobarus and Salome, and the wife ſent her husband a bill of divorce, though directly againſt the cuſtom and practice of the country, and a manifeſt uſurpation of the man's privilege, who has a right to diſcharge the woman, and ſhe not to marry again, without the leave of her former husband. Salome's will however paſs'd for a law, and ſo ſhe left him, and betook herſelf to her brother, with this compliment, that her duty to him was dearer to her than that to her huſband, and that ſhe came to tell him that Coſtobarus, with Lyſimachus, Antipater, and Doſitheus, were in conſpiracy againſt him: enforcing the credit of her information with an inſtance of his kindneſs to the ſons of Babas, whom he had now kept twelve years under his protection. This was ſo ſurprizing a truth, that it made an impreſſion upon him more than ordinary; for he had taken up a reſolution long ſince of having them diſpatch'd out of the world, as the known enemies of his intereſt; but ſome obſtacle or other ſtill prevented, and put it out of his head. Now the ground of the offence was this:

Salome charges Coſtabarus and Lyſimachus, Antipater and Doſitheus with a conſpiracy againſt Herod.

WHEN Herod was before Jeruſalem, in the time of Antigonus, the people were ſo tir'd out with ſtreights and difficulties of the ſiege, that the greater part of them were for opening the gates, and admitting Herod into the town. The ſons of Babas being men of credit and authority in the place, and friends to Antigonus, were abſolutely for ſtanding it out, and maintaining the government in the royal line. Upon taking the city ſoon after, Herod gave Coſtobarus in charge to have an eye upon all the paſſages about the town, and not to ſuffer one creature to eſcape that was of the contrary faction. The ſons of Babas were generally taken notice of to be the darlings of the people, and conſequently the fitteſt inſtruments to be made uſe of in caſe of any attempt upon another change. Coſtobarus play'd his own game in ſaving them, and had them ſecretly convey'd away into a place of ſafety according to his order. Herod was not ſo dull of apprehenſion but that he ſuſpected the matter at that very inſtant, and queſtion'd him upon it; but the other diſcharg'd himſelf upon his oath, that he knew not what was become of them. The king upon this, publiſh'd a proclamation for the detecting of them, with a promiſe of reward to the diſcoverer, uſing all ways of enquiry; but no confeſſion yet: for after the firſt denial there was no retracting; ſo that the concealment was now become a point of prudence, and neceſſity, as well as of kindneſs. But now, the whole intrigue being laid open by the help of Salome, the king ſent immediately to their places of concealment, and had them all cut to pieces, with their accomplices and abettors, and the whole houſe of Hyrcanus by that inroad totally extinguiſh'd: ſo that from this time forward, the king did what he pleas'd without oppoſition or controul.

Salome makes the diſcovery, and they are all cut to pieces, with the houſe of Hyrcanus.

HEROD was no ſooner ſettled in the eſtabliſhment of an abſolute power, but he fell off by little and little from the wholeſome laws and government of our forefathers that kept the people formerly in the awe and practice of their duty; introducing foreign inventions and innovations inſtead of them. As for inſtance; he inſtituted the ſpectacle of wreſtling-matches, to be celebrated every fifth year in honour of Auguſtus: erecting a theatre in Jeruſalem on purpoſe to receive them. He built a ſtately amphitheatre alſo, without the walls of the city; which two fabricks were of a wonderful magnificence and expence: but to the Jews, who were never accuſtomed to the vanity of ſuch games and ſhews, they were of no uſe or ſatisfaction at all. Now for the greater glory of theſe entertainments, he cauſed them to be notified by proclamations far and near, with large promiſes of rewards to the victors. By this means, he drew in competitors at all ſorts of exerciſes, and from all quarters in abundance, and the moſt eminent maſters alſo in their ſeveral profeſſions: Not only wreſtlers, but muſicians vocal and inſtrumental, mimicks, charioteers, ſome for two horſes, others for four; horſe-racers, &c. It was the king's care, in fine, that nothing ſhould be wanting that might contribute to the pleaſure, ornament, or curioſity of the main deſign. The theatre was dreſs'd up round with titles, trophies, and devices, to Ceſar's honour, and in memory of his triumphs; the whole work being ſet out and illuſtrated with gold and ſilver, and beautify'd with coſtly hangings, rich habits, and precious ſtones. For the greater variety of the diverſion, he had a proviſion alſo of lions, tygers, and ſuch other wild beaſts as had any thing in them extraordinary, either for fierceneſs and vigour, or for any thing ſingular in their kind. Theſe beaſts of prey were turn'd looſe, ſome time one upon another, other whiles to encounter condemn'd criminals.

Herod changes old laws and cuſtoms for foreign inventions and innovations.

Now this was a ſpectacle that foreigners were mightily pleas'd with; but the Jews, on the contrary, had a horror for it, as an ignoble cruelty, and not only a violation of their laws, but a corruption of their manners: for what can be more unmanly, than to take delight in the brutal entertainment of ſacrificing men to beaſts, and to ſpill human blood in ſport; beſide the folly and madneſs of changing good old cuſtoms for bad new ones? The Jews lay, in ſhort, under a general diſſatisfaction; but nothing gave a greater diſguſt to them, than the trophies, which they look'd upon to be the images of men cover'd with arms, and conſequently a flat contradiction to the inſtitutions of their country. They were ſo bold and extravagant in their averſion to

theſe trophies, that Herod did not think it ſafe to deal with them by force, but choſe rather to try if he could bring them by gentle methods and reaſoning to a ſight of the vanity of their ſuperſtition; but this was ſo far from convincing them, that they cry'd out with one voice againſt the indignity of his proceeding. "They could bear any thing "elſe, (they ſaid) but to bring images into "the city, (for ſo they call'd the trophies) or "to ſubmit to the guilt of ſo abominable a "wickedneſs; that was a thing they would "never give way to." Herod, finding the people's abhorrence of theſe ſights to riſe higher and higher every day, and that they were not to be pacify'd by downright authority or perſuaſion, he took ſome of the chief of the ſcandalized party along with him to the theatre; ſhew'd them the trophies, and asked their opinion of them, and what they took them to be: ſo they all cry'd out that "they "were the images of men." Herod, upon this, cauſed them to be ſtript and undreſs'd, and finding only certain ſtumps of wood under the covering, the fierce indignation they had conceiv'd from a ſtrong preſumption of their being images, was turn'd into ridicule; and upon the quieting of this tumult, the greater part of them was prevail'd upon to allow and concur with every thing elſe: but there were ſome yet that perſiſted in the abhorrence they had for the admittance of foreign cuſtoms, for fear of the pernicious changes of ſtate they might probably draw after them; reckoning themſelves obliged, at what hazard ſoever, to aſſert their tottering diſcipline, and not to ſuffer Herod, under the name of a king, to act the part of an enemy, and break in upon their conſciences and liberties with unlawful impoſitions.

THE people were ſo enflam'd with this diſcourſe, that ten citizens enter'd immediately upon it into a conſpiracy againſt the perſon of the king, in defiance of all dangers whatſoever that might attend the enterprize; and there was one blind man among the reſt, ſo tranſported at the ſtory of this uſurpation and oppreſſion, that tho' he was not in a condition to act any thing for the common good, he offer'd himſelf yet to bear a part with his companions in their ſufferings for it, let it be what it would; and this generous encouragement did not a little ſettle them in their determination. Having laid their heads together upon this matter, they put daggers under their coats, and went to the theatre, with a full reſolution to ſtab the king himſelf, if they could come at him, as they hop'd they ſhould; or however to make ſuch havock of his guards, that they promis'd themſelves this comfort at worſt, in caſe of a miſcarriage, that their death would make him odious, and that the precedent of their bravery, in vindication of their religion and diſcipline, would be an incitement to others hereafter to follow their example.

A plot upon Herod in the theatre

As Herod was juſt entering the theatre, one of his ſpies made to him a diſcovery of the whole intrigue; whereupon being conſcious to himſelf of the invidious hatred he lay under, he withdrew to his palace, whether he ſummon'd the conſpirators, every man by his name. Being now as good as taken in the fact, and without any poſſibility of eſcaping, they ſtood the ſhock with an invincible courage; owning and juſtifying the whole matter charg'd upon them. This they did with an undaunted conſtancy of mind and behaviour, producing the very daggers that were to have done the execution. "They were not "engag'd, (they ſaid,) in any criminal com- "bination to gratify any paſſion or intereſt; "but in a ſacred league for the common "good, and the defence of their laws, which "all true patriots and profeſſors were bound "to maintain with their lives." After this undaunted and glorious declaration, they were hurry'd away, and put to death by moſt exquiſite torments. Neither did that execrable wretch the informer long out-live his treaſon; for he was ſet upon, butcher'd, and torn to pieces; and his body thrown to the dogs. This too was done in the ſight of a great many ſpectators, yet not one man detected that had a hand in the exploit: till in the end a diſcovery was extorted by dint of torment from ſome certain women who happen'd to be preſent at the committing of the fact; whereupon the actors in it, and their whole families, were all immediately put to death; the common people all this while, ſtanding firm in the maintenance and vindication of their ordinances and cuſtoms. When Herod came to conſider of the danger of theſe mutinous diſpoſitions, and to find that the people were not to be kept in order but by main force, it highly concern'd him, he thought, to do all he could in time toward the preventing of a revolt. Now having two forts in the city already; his palace in the one, and the other (Antonia) which ſerved for a guard to the temple, he fortify'd Samaria alſo (otherwiſe called Sebaſte) for a third, which was conveniently ſituated to keep the whole country in obedience. It was about a day's journey from Jeruſalem, and commodiouſly enough ſeated for the quelling of broils in the city. There was likewiſe another ſtrong hold that lay very opportunely for his purpoſe, formerly known by the name of Straton's tower; but at that time it had obtain'd the name of Cæſarea. He built a caſtle alſo in the great plain, which he made a horſe quarter, and ſo Gabala in Galilee, and Eſthmonitis in Peræa. Theſe fortifications were ſo advantageouſly poſted up and down in the country, that it was impoſſible for the people to enter into any plot or practice againſt the ſtate, but his ſoldiers there in gariſon would be upon them preſently; being ever at hand, and in readineſs, either to obviate miſchief, or to cruſh it. He made it his firſt buſineſs to ſettle affairs in Samaria, as a place naturally ſtrong and proper for his purpoſe. To this end he drew a great body of troops into the city, both foreign and domeſtick, partly for the temple's ſake, which he propounded to build there, and partly for the reputation of the work, but principally for his own ſafety; which, under this pretext of magnificence, was abundantly provided for. He changed the name of the town of Samaria to that of Sebaſte, as is ſaid already; and divided among the inhabitants the country about it; by which means, the lands being fruitful, they became quickly rich and eaſy. He ſurrounded it with a thick ſubſtantial wall; and enlarged it in ſuch a proportion, that it was reckon'd in the firſt

Judea viſited with miſerable calamities.

IN this year, which was the thirteenth of Herod's reign, Judea was viſited with miſerable calamities, whether by divine vengeance, or according to the ſtated courſe of natural providences, is not to be determin'd. The firſt judgment was a long and a blaſting drought, which was follow'd with ſuch a ſterility, that the earth was parch'd up and brought forth nothing at all. The want of food, and the neceſſitated change of diet, brought on plagues and diſeaſes, and a long train of other innumerable diſorders ſucceſſively one after another. And it was a farther aggravation of their extreme miſery, that the ſick were in a manner abandon'd, and left without the comfort of either help, food, or remedy. And with all this, they dy'd ſo faſt, that the ſurvivors gave one another over, without ſo much as looking after them, in the deſpair of doing them any good. The laſt year's ſtores being all ſpent, and no recruits appearing, the caſe was deſparate, and their ſtarving wants pinch'd them every day more than other; for one ſeaſon was already loſt and gone, and the earth ſtill barren, without any hope of relief. Theſe extremities however, in the mean time, ſet all people's wits at work how to provide for themſelves, under their preſent deplorable circumſtances.

A blaſting drought, a famine, plagues and other diſeaſes

SUCH, in fine, was the general diſtreſs, that the revenue even of Herod himſelf, how large ſoever, was not ſufficient to maintain him, for his rents and cuſtoms were all ſunk; his old ſtock of treaſure expended upon buildings and fortifications; together with an univerſal deſolation, upon all accounts; the outrageous hatred and clamour of the people over and above, which, in all caſes of popular diſcontents, never fail of caſting the blame upon the government. His thoughts were not idle yet upon the main, how to obviate theſe difficulties; but the particular means of doing it was the queſtion. As for his neighbours that were in the ſame condition with himſelf, there was no ſupply of proviſions to be expected that way: And for matter of monies to procure neceſſaries, his ſtock was exhauſted, and he had not enough remaining to anſwer the charge. But ſomewhat or other was to be done however in this extremity of a common cauſe. So that the king, upon bethinking himſelf, melted down all his plate, curioſities, and other ornamental furniture, and veſſels of gold and ſilver, to the ſervices of his own table; put the whole maſs into one ſum of money, and ſent it away into Egypt, where Petronius was at that time governor, by a commiſſion from Ceſar. Petronius was quite tir'd out with a multitude of applications and importunities of people under the ſame neceſſities; but yet out of a particular affection he had for Herod, and conſequently for his intereſt and people, he gave him, in preference to all others, a grant for the exportation of corn, and aſſiſted him all he could in the very price and carriage, which turn'd exceedingly to the account of Herod, and his deſigns. For upon the importing of this relief, he did not only redeem his reputation among thoſe that before had a very ill opinion of him, but made himſelf famous by his care and conduct for a prince of a truly royal wiſdom and virtue. The firſt thing he did after the importation of this ſuccour, was, to make an equal diſtribution of it in proportion to the number and condition of thoſe that were to receive it; as he provided for the ſending of it to thoſe that could not fetch it, and appointed bakers to aſſiſt thoſe that either through age, infirmity, or any other impediment could not make their bread themſelves; taking care likewiſe in all other reſpects that they might not want any thing, either for the filling of their bellies, or the keeping of them warm; ſupplying them alſo with garments and coverings againſt the ſeverity of the winter ſeaſon, as well as with victuals, in the great ſcarcity of ſheep and wool. So ſoon as he had competently provided for his own people, he extended his charity in the next place to the aſſiſtance of his neighbours the Syrians, whom he furniſhed with a quantity of ſeed-corn for the next ſeaſon, which came to them in the very nick of their occaſions for it; and yielded ſo prodigious an increaſe upon the following crop, that he ſent fifty thouſand men, which he himſelf had preſerv'd from ſtarving, to help them in with their harveſt. By this foreſight and induſtry of Herod's, matters were ſo well re-eſtabliſh'd (even when all was given for loſt) that every thing ſucceeded to his wiſh, both at home and abroad, wherever he had to do; for no man ever ſought to him in vain, whether ſtrangers or citizens, whom he did not relieve according to his dignity: Inſomuch, that upon a clear account it appear'd that he had expended ‡ ten thouſand côres of wheat to ſtrangers, reckoning every côre at ten Attic Medimni: And fourſcore thouſand cores upon his own people.

THIS ſeaſonable and effectual generoſity and goodneſs of the king ſo endear'd the hearts and ſouls of the people, that all paſt unkindneſſes and miſgovernments were freely forgiven and forgotten, and not one word more of his encroachments upon their laws and diſcipline; reckoning his generous care and liberality upon this occaſion, as an ample atonement for all his former miſdeeds. Neither was his character leſs venerable abroad than at home; for it ſo fell out, that his misfortunes in the one place enhanced his reputation in the other, for upon this inſtance of his compaſſionate humanity toward ſtrangers in diſtreſs, people made a judgment of him from what they now found him, and not from what he had been.

MUCH about this time he made Auguſtus a preſent of five hundred choice men out of his own guards, which ſerv'd under * Ælius Gallus in the Arabian war with much honour. The ſtate of Judea being now compos'd, Herod began to erect a large and ſpacious palace, in the upper part of Jeruſalem, with rooms large enough for a great receipt of people; finiſhed with ſeats and other ornaments of gold and marble curiouſly wrought, and bearing the names of the perſons they were deſign'd for; one inſcribed Ceſar's apartment, another Agrippa's.

Herod erects a glorious palace.

WHILE Herod was intent upon this building, he happened to fall in love, and marry a ſecond wife, to reſtrain himſelf from the looſe liberties of wandering amours. The caſe, in ſhort, was this: there was one Simon, a citizen of Jeruſalem, the ſon of † Boethus, an Alexandrian, and a prieſt of a noble family; this Simon had a daughter of ſo exquiſite a beauty, that ſhe became the talk and admiration of all that ſaw her. Herod was firſt ſtruck with the fame of this lady, and then enamour'd upon the ſight of her; but yet reſolving to make no tyrannical uſe of his power, he only propounded the honourable way of taking her to his bed as his lawful wife. It was a match, in truth, below his quality, but not inconſiderable neither, to the degree of deſpicable; ſo that in ſome ſort to balance this inequality, and to indulge his paſſion, both in one, he thought it proper to confer ſome eminent dignity upon Simon, in order to qualify him for the honour he intended him. To this end he depoſed Jeſus ‡ the ſon Phabes from the Pontificate; advanced Simon in his ſtead, and then marry'd his daughter.

Jeſus depos'd from the pontificate Herod advances Simon the ſon of Boethus, and marries his daughter.

SO ſoon as the nuptial ſolemnities were over, he built a glorious caſtle upon the place where he formerly defeated the Jews in the war he had with Antigonus. This fort was a matter of ſixty || furlongs from Jeruſalem; naturally ſtrong by the ſituation, and capable of being made impregnable. The hill riſes in a gentle aſcent, as if it had been artificial; the figure of it round, and the caſtle encompaſs'd with ſeveral towers; and two hundred ſtone ſteps up to it; the lodgings in it rich and ſtately, and the whole ſtructure beautiful and firm. At the bottom of this mount, there are ſeveral buildings worth the ſeeing in many reſpects, and particularly for the famous aqueducts, that with infinite difficulty and charge, were brought thither from a vaſt way off. The plain about it was cover'd with houſes, to the proportion of a conſiderable city: the caſtle from above overlooking it like a citadel, both for command and protection.

Herod builds a caſtle in memory of a victory over Antigonus.

A deſcription of the building and place.

HEROD having by this time ſettled his matters to his mind, he reckon'd himſelf out of danger of any further commotions and tumults. He kept his people in order, partly by awe and fear, and partly by love and intereſt; for he was a prince of a moſt inflexible ſeverity where a criminal was to be puniſh'd, and of as unbounded a liberality, where the common good of the ſubject requir'd it. He kept himſelf upon ſuch a guard, and every thing in ſuch a poſture of ſecurity, as if it were to ſhew that the prince and the people are to ſtand and fall together. He was courteous and eaſy, indifferently to all men, to ſtrangers as well as others, and upon occaſion moſt munificently generous to the great ones; for he had the heart of an emperor. By this means he gain'd a general love and eſteem, to the great advantage of his affairs and deſigns. But this ambitious affectation of ingratiating himſelf with Auguſtus and the noblemen of Rome, inveigled him away by little and little from the diſcipline and cuſtoms of our forefathers, into the erecting of cities and temples to the honour of his patrons. This was not done, 'tis true, in the very land of Judea itſelf; for the Jews would never have born an abomination ſo expreſly forbidden, as the worſhiping of images and idols, after the manner of the Greeks: ſo that he built theſe cities only upon the borders of the province, and not within the juriſdiction of it; excuſing himſelf upon the whole, that what he did was not any act of his own, but purely in obedience to the higher powers. He got the good-will of Ceſar and the Romans however, by the pretence of renouncing the diſcipline and the principles he was brought up in, for their ſakes: but all this apart, the thing he aim'd at was his own advantage, the making of himſelf glorious to poſterity, by theſe everlaſting memorials of magnificence and bounty.

Of Straton's tower, or Ceſarea.

THERE was a certain place by the ſea-ſide, formerly called Straton's tower, which Herod look'd upon as a very commodious tract of ground to raiſe a city upon. He drew his model; ſet people to work upon't, and finiſh'd it. The buildings were all of marble; private houſes as well as palaces; but his maſter-piece was the port, which he made as large as the Pyræum, and a ſafe ſtation againſt all winds and weathers; to ſay nothing of other conveniences. This work was the more wonderful, becauſe all the materials for it were brought thither at a prodigious expence from afar off. This city ſtands in Phœnicia upon the paſs into Egypt, between Joppa and Dora; two wretched ſea towns, where there's no riding in the harbours with a ſouth-weſt wind; for it bears ſo furiouſly upon the ſhore, that merchant-men are forc'd to keep off at ſea many times for fear of being driven a ground. To encounter theſe difficulties of the place, Herod order'd a mole to be made in the form of a half-moon, and large enough for a royal navy to ride in. He directed alſo prodigious ſtones to be let down there in twenty fathom water; ſtones of fifty foot in length, eighteen foot over, and nine foot deep; ſome greater, ſome leſs. This mole was two hundred foot in extent; the one half of it to break the ſetting of the ſea; the other half ſerv'd for the foundation of a ſtone-wall fortify'd with terrets; calling the largeſt and the faireſt of them by the name of the tower of Druſus, from Druſus the ſon-in-law of Auguſtus, who dy'd young. There were ſeveral arched vaults alſo that ſerv'd for ſeamens-cabins. There was likewiſe a key or landing-place, with a large walk upon it around the port, as a place of pleaſure to take the air in. This port opens to the northward, which is the cleareſt quarter of the heavens. On the left hand of the entrance into it, there was a terret erected upon a large platform, with a ſloping bank to ſhoot off the waſhing of the ſea; and on the right hand were two ſtone-pillars over againſt the tower, and both of a height. The houſes about the port, were all uniformly built, of the moſt excellent ſort of marble. Upon a mount in the middle, ſtood a temple dedicated to Ceſar, which was of great uſe to the mariners, for a famous ſea-mark. There were in this temple two ſtatues or images; the one of Rome, and the other of Ceſar: and from hence the city took the name of Ceſarea, which was no leſs celebrated for the materials than for the workmanſhip. The contrivance of the vaults and common-ſhores was wonderful too, being laid at equal diſtances one from another, and ſo diſcharging themſelves into the ſea. Only there was one conveyance that went croſs all the reſt; and as it carry'd off all the filth and naſtineſs of the town, ſo it made way for the tides to enter and waſh the paſſages, and to make all ſweet and clean. Herod built alſo a ſtone-theatre; and upon the ſouth ſide of the harbour, a ſpacious amphitheatre, with a goodly proſpect to the ſea-ward. He ſpared, in ſhort, for neither money nor pains; and in a matter of twelve years this work was brought to perfection.

AFTER the finiſhing of theſe two cities, Sebaſte and Ceſarea, Herod diſpatch'd away his two ſons, Alexander and Ariſtobulus, to pay their reſpects to Ceſar. Pollio, that was Herod's particular friend, provided lodgings for them; which was more than needed, for Auguſtus had given order for the entertaining of them in his own palace. He received them, in fine, with wonderful humanity, and after the additional bounty of confering upon Herod the three provinces of Trachon, Batanæa and Auranitis, he gave him his choice likewiſe, which of his ſons he would appoint for his ſucceſſor to the kingdom of Judea. The buſineſs was this:

Alexander and Ariſtobulus ſent on a complement to Ceſar.

Ceſar grants Herod three provinces, and which ſon he pleaſes for his ſucceſſor.

ONE Zenodorus had taken to farm the lands of Lyſanias, and not contenting himſelf with the lawful advantage of his bargain, went ſhares with the free-booters in Trachon; a ſort of men that live in a great meaſure upon the ſpoil they take from the people of Damaſcus. The ſuffering part of the country, upon theſe outrages, apply'd themſelves to * Varro, who was at that time governor of the province, for a letter of complaint to Ceſar againſt Zenodorus; whoſe anſwer was, that he would have thoſe thieves driven out of their lurking holes, and the care and command of that province committed to Herod, to keep the Trachonites in order for the future. Now they had neither towns, houſes, nor poſſeſſions, but liv'd like beaſts in dens and caves; and furniſhed with ſuch a proportion of water and proviſion, that it would be a hard matter either to come at them, or to ſtarve them: beſide that making a livelihood of the trade, they would be loth to leave it. The entrance into their hiding-places was ſo narrow, that there was no paſſing for above one at a time; but the receptacle within was large beyond imagination; and the roof overhead plain and flat. Take it altogether, it is but one ſharp and almoſt impaſſable rock: full of difficulties and turnings, and no finding the right way into it without a guide. In few words, theſe are a people that ſtick at nothing; and rather than not keep their hands in uſe, rob one another. So ſoon as ever Herod enter'd into the poſſeſſion of his new province, he took his conductors and inſtruments along with him; and hunting them out of their retreats, ſet the neighbourhood at quiet. But Zenodorus was ſo irritated, whether out of vexation for the loſs of his commiſſion, or out of envy at Herod's having it, that he poſted away to Rome with an accuſation in his mouth againſt Herod, but could do no good on't.

WHILE matters were in this ſtate, Auguſtus ſent Agrippa into Aſia, to take upon him the command of the tranſmarine provinces there. He was Herod's ſingular friend and old acquaintance; ſo that he met him upon the way at Mitylene, and then went back again to Judea. He was no ſooner arriv'd, but the Gadarens accoſted him preſently with grievous complaints complaints againſt Herod; whereupon, without ſo much as giving them the hearing, he ſent to the king himſelf in chains.

THE Arabians at the ſame time began to ſhew their diſaffection and enmity, upon the ſcore of an ancient grudge they had to him, and truly the pretence ſeem'd to have ſomewhat in it. Zenodorus, (the Perſon beforementioned) finding his affairs in a ſinking condition, came to an agreement with theſe Arabians, for ſo much of his eſtate in the province of Auranitis, as they were to pay him fifty * talents a year rent for. Now this happening to fall within Ceſar's grant to Herod, the Arabians would not ſubmit to it; but conteſting the matter, one while by force, another while by law, they engaged alſo a party of indigent ſoldiers in the controverſy; who, according to the practice of other miſerable people in the world, were willing to mend their own fortunes upon the ruins of other men. Herod knew well enough what they were a-doing; but thought it good diſcretion yet to deal with them by fair means, rather than to uſe ſeverities, for fear of creating new troubles. In the ſeventeenth year of Herod's reign, Ceſar came into Syria, where he was entertain'd immediately with outrageous exclamations of the Gadarens againſt Herod, as a moſt inſupportable tyrant and oppreſſor, and this chiefly at the inſtance and inſtigation of Zenodorus, who it ſeems had bound himſelf by an oath never to give over the proſecution till they ſhould be quit of Herod, and under the dominion once again of Auguſtus. This confident undertaking of Zenodorus made them ſtill bolder and louder; eſpecially finding thoſe priſoners that were deliver'd up to Herod by Agrippa, to continue unpuniſh'd. Now Herod, how inexorable ſoever, towards offenders of his own party, was yet of all men living, perhaps the eaſieſt and the moſt remiſs in the caſe of injuries receiv'd from ſtrangers. The miſdemeanors charg'd upon him, were rapine, oppreſſion, the violating and the demoliſhing of temples, and the like; and Herod on the other hand, offer'd himſelf as frankly to his juſtification. Ceſar treated him nevertheleſs reſpectfully for the clamorous importunities of the multitude, though for the firſt day there paſs'd ſome diſcourſe upon it; but there the debate fell, and put an end to the queſtion. It was ſo evident, by this time to the Gadarens, how Ceſar and his friend ſtood affected, that giving for granted it would be their fate upon the cloſe of the matter, to be deliver'd up to Herod, ſome of them cut their own throats the very next night; others broke their necks down precipices, and ſome again drown'd themſelves for fear of being put to tortures: and Ceſar taking this execution upon themſelves, for a ſelf-condemnation, acquitted Herod without any more ado. And there was yet another ſingular piece of providence attended him; which was the death of Zenodorus by a violent dyſentery at Antioch in Syria; whereupon Ceſar beſtow'd upon Herod a very conſiderable eſtate belonging to him, that lay betwixt Galilee and Trachonitis, compriſing Ulatha, † Panium, and the borders thereabouts; giving him alſo a ſovereign command over the governors of Syria, and appointing every thing to be done according to his direction and order. Herod was now advanced to ſuch a height of eſteem and good fortune, that as Ceſar and Agrippa were the two ſupreme adminiſtrators in the whole empire, ſo Ceſar was the man whom above all the reſt of the world, Ceſar lov'd next to Agrippa, and Agrippa next to Ceſar. By virtue of this intereſt, Herod obtained a tetrarch's commiſſion in Judea from Auguſtus for his brother Pheroras; upon whom he beſtow'd the revenue of a hundred talents, || out of his proper income, that he might have ſomething to truſt to in caſe of any deſperate misfortune, without being forced to a dependance upon his children. After this, he waited upon Ceſar till he ſaw him embark'd, and then went back again; erecting to the honour of Auguſtus, and upon the ground of Zenodorus, a moſt glorious temple of white marble, near the cave that they call'd Panias, which is at the bottom of a mountain, famous for being the ſource of the river Jordan. The cavern is prodigiouſly deep, and ſprings of water in it perpetually bubbling; and the mountain above is as eminent for a pleaſant proſpect, but more remarkable ſtill for this temple of Ceſar's, than for all the reſt.

THE king took an occaſion at this time to ingratiate himſelf with his people, by eaſing them of a third part of their taxes, under pretence of a tenderneſs for their ſufferings by the diſtreſs of the famine; but in effect to ſweeten ill humours: for they were ſo diſguſted at many things the king did to the ſcandal of religion, and good manners, that every body reflected upon him for it: ſo that he was fain to make uſe of other ways yet to keep his ſubjects quiet, by tying up every man to his own buſineſs; prohibiting cabals, clubs, and other publick meetings; planting ſpies upon all companies; and officers every where at hand, to take into cuſtody all offenders againſt theſe orders; as there were ſeveral committed to the fort Hyrcania, publickly as well as privately, and there puniſh'd with the utmoſt rigour. The very roads, ſtreets, paſſes and avenues, were all beſet and way-laid; all meetings, upon what account ſoever, watch'd and obſerv'd: Nay, ſuch was the care he took, that he would many times ſteal out by night himſelf in a diſguiſe among the common people, to liſten what the multitude ſaid of him. Wherever he met with any man that was bitter and malicious, he had no mercy of him, and for the moderate ſort, he put them to an oath of allegiance, and ſo diſmiſs'd them. By this means he brought the majority out of fear to compliance with him; and for thoſe that had the courage to ſtand upon their terms, and to diſpute the point, he never fail'd of ſome device or other to remove them out of the way. This oath was put to Pollio the

And he was as kind to the Essenes too, a sect somewhat like the Pythagoreans among the Greeks. We have spoken a great deal of them elsewhere already: but it will not be amiss however to say somewhat farther in this place; and how Herod came to have so tender an esteem for these people.

Herod's kindness for the Pharisees and Essenes.

THERE was one Manahem, an Essene, who over and above the virtue and the character of an exemplary probity of life, was likewise endu'd with the spirit of prophecy. This person, upon the sight of Herod, among his schoolfellows, when he was a boy, greeted him with a salutation of hail king of the Jews. The boy, to correct his mistake, said, he was not of a family to be a king, and told him, that when he saluted him by that title, he either did not know him, or meant to banter him. "Yes, "yes, (says Manahem) smiling upon him, and "laying his hand gently upon his shoulder, "you are to be a king, and you shall rule happily; for it is the pleasure of God that it "shall be so: but keep these words of Manahem in mind now, which will give you to "understand the instability of your fortune. "It will be your duty to govern with justice, "conscience and equity; but I have a secret "impulse, which tells me, that you will never manage your authority by these measures. You will have no regard either to "the laws of God or man; though in all other "respects a fortunate person, and worthy of "immortal honour. Depend upon it, that "God will at last chastise you, and bring you "to your end by a most deplorable judg"ment".

The Prediction of one Manahem an Essene.

Herod gave little heed to these words, as a matter that never enter'd into his thought; but when he came afterward to the throne, and to the highest pitch of his glory, he sent for Manahem, and ask'd him, how long he thought he should reign: Manahem returning an uncertain answer, Herod put it to him again, whether he thought he should reign ten years. Yes, yes, says Manahem, and twenty, and thirty: and there he stopt, leaving the precise period undetermin'd; but Herod resting satisfy'd with what he had heard, took a friendly leave of him, and from that time forward had a great esteem for the Essenes. This may possibly appear incredible; but the reader may consider that we have many instances of good men, to whom Almighty God has been pleased to reveal his secret purposes and counsels.

Herod proposes the building of a temple: the old one not to be touch'd till the new one is provided for. Herod prepares the materials, and enters upon the work. The front of the temple; the galleries: the temple-walls; Baris or the tower; the fort Antonia; a plan of the temple, or the first enclosure. Another enclosure. The middle enclosure. The whole perfected in eighteen months. The dedication of the temple. A privy passage from fort to fort.

AFTER so many great and glorious actions, and the finishing of so many magnificent and pompous buildings, Herod bethought himself in the eighteenth year of his reign, of erecting a temple to the holy God, in all respects larger and more stately than the former, and a work that he made account would redound more to the honour of his name and memory, (as in truth it did) than all he had ever done before; but yet left the people should stumble at the difficulty of the undertaking, he call'd them together, to try what might be done by reason and discourse, to the removing of that obstacle out of the way.

Herod proposes the erecting of a temple, with a salvo to all objections.

"IT would be time lost, (says he) my "friends and countrymen, to give you the "history of my doings since I came to the "crown; wherefore let it suffice that I have "more attended to your benefit and security "than to my own particular reputation. You "know very well what care I have taken for "you in your greatest extremities, and without any regard to my own profit; and you "know likewise that you yourselves have had "the greatest share in the advantage of all the "mighty works, which by God's blessing and "assistance I have brought to perfection: insomuch, that Judea is in a better state at "this day than ever it was: wherefore, as I "was saying, there will be no need of running into the particulars of the cities, castles, "palaces, &c. that I have either built, fortify'd, or repair'd in Judea, and the tributary provinces. But the short sum of my "present business, is matter of worship and "religion, and what concerns the reputation "of your country. You shall do well to observe, that this temple that was erected by "our fore-fathers, at their return from Babylon, wants sixty * cubits of the height of "Solomon's; and this was no fault of our "ancestors neither: for it was by no orders of "theirs that it came not up to the proportion "of the first; being raised according to the "express model of Cyrus, and Darius the son "of Hystaspes, under whose dominion they "then liv'd, as afterward under the Macedonians: so that they had it not in their power to advance that monument of their piety "and zeal up to the measures of the original. But "since God hath been now pleas'd in his gracious Providence, to put the government into "my hands, and at the same time to furnish me "with all necessary means for the accomplishing of my end; as peace, leisure, ready money, large revenues, and which is more "than all the rest, the friendship of the Romans, masters of the whole world: it shall "be my care and business now to supply those "defects, which was not possible for our predecessors under their circumstances to prevent; and to do that right, in fine, to the "glory of God, which we have hitherto been

* Sixty Jewish cubits amounted to upwards of one hundred and nine English feet, that is, thirty six yards and a foot.

" ſhort in, with all due reverence to his holy " name, and with a gratitude ſuitable to the " mercies we have receiv'd".

THE people were ſo ſurpris'd at this unexpected diſcourſe and declaration, that it gave them no perplexity to think what the iſſue would be; beſide the anxious dread they had of having the old temple pull'd down, before they were ſure of another in the place of it; which, in truth, they deſpair'd of, as an enterprize next to impracticable. This put them to a nonplus, whether to approve or diſapprove of the deſign; but the king finding what it was they ſtuck at, bad them reſt ſatisfy'd, that the old temple ſhould ſtand firm and untouch'd, till all the materials for the new one ſhould be prepar'd; and he was as good as his word.

The old temple not to be touch'd till the new one is provided for.

HE provided a hundred carriages for ſtones and other neceſſaries; ten thouſand artiſts in all handicrafts, the beſt of every ſort that were to be gotten. A thouſand prieſts that * underſtood maſons and carpenters work, to overlook them, who he furniſhed with ſacerdotal robes and veſtments at his own charge. The artificers, ſtones, timber, and all the preparatory materials being now in readineſs, the firſt work they ſet upon was the clearing of the old foundation, and the laying of a new one; upon which baſis they raiſed the ſuperſtructure of a temple a † hundred cubits in length, and a hundred and twenty in height; but the odd twenty cubits ſinking afterwards, it fell ſo much ſhort of the firſt deſign; which our anceſtors in the days of Nero, had ſome thought of ſupplying. The whole fabrick was made of durable white ſtone, five and twenty ‡ cubits long, eight in height, and twelve over.

Herod prepares the materials, and enters upon the work.

THE front of this wonderful pile had the reſemblance of a palace; much higher in the middle than on the ſides, and looking with ſuch a proſpect into the fields, as was very agreeable to thoſe that either liv'd directly over againſt it, or were travelling towards it: and this view extended ſeveral furlongs into the country.  The porch was a curioſity anſwerable to the artifice of the reſt; the upper part of it ſet out with variety of rich tapeſtry, and delicate purple flowers, with pillars interwoven, and a golden vine creeping and twining about them; the branches of it laden with cluſters of grapes that hung dangling down from the corniſhes: a piece of maſtery, no leſs valuable for the skill than the matter.

The front of the temple.

ROUND about the temple were large galleries, not inferior to the reſt of the work in magnificence; but much exceeding all that ever was before them for grace and beauty. Two of theſe galleries were ſupported by two ſtrong walls; a work of as ſingular an excellency as any we have ſeen yet.

The galleries.

THERE was a ſteep rocky hillock, but with a gentle deſcent, to the eaſtward of the city, which Solomon, a long time before, by God's ſpecial direction, encompaſs'd with a wall, and the lower part of it was ſurrounded with another wall, and a deep valley under it toward the ſouth. This wall was compacted of mighty ſtones cramped together with irons, including the whole, and reaching down to the bottom of the hill. The form of the work was ſquare, and conſidering the depth and the magnitude of it, an incomparable piece. The vaſt bigneſs of theſe ſtones was beſt ſeen on the outſide, being jointed within, one into another, to keep them firm againſt all Weathers.

The temple walls.

WHEN this wall was run up to the top, the ſpace betwixt that and the hill was all fill'd up till it came to a level, and then four galleries, reckoning every gallery to be a furlong †† over. There was alſo within the ſquare, another ſtone wall, carry'd round the top of the hill, with a double porch to the eaſtward, facing the portal of the temple, that ſtands in the middle. This portal was gloriouſly adorn'd by the royal bounty of ſeveral princes; and round about the temple itſelf, were the ſpoils and trophies that had been taken from the Barbarians, which Herod dedicated over again, with the addition of others of later date, that he himſelf had taken from the Arabians.

UPON one of the angles on the north-ſide, ſtood a ſtrong well-fortify'd building, the work of ſome of the Aſamonæans, a family that for a long time executed the authority both of prince and high-prieſt. They call'd this Place Baris, or the tower, and there they kept the pontifical habits, which, according to cuſtom, were never to be taken out, but when the high-prieſt was juſt about to officiate. Herod apply'd it alſo to the ſame uſe; but after his death, it came to be keep'd in the hands of the Romans: and there it reſted till the time of Tiberius; in whoſe reign, Vitellius being made governor of Syria, and going to take poſſeſſion of his command, was ſo honourably treated at Jeruſalem, that in acknowledgment of their affection and reſpect, he prevail'd with Ceſar in behalf of the Jews, and at their earneſt requeſt, that they might have the keeping of the ſacred Depoſitum, or the Stola ſacerdotalis, to themſelves. This petition being granted, it continued in their cuſtody till after the death of king Agrippa: at which time Caſſius Longinus, the governor of Syria, and Cuſpius Fadus, lieutenant of Judea, order'd the depoſiting of the holy habits in the fort Antonia: inſiſting upon it, that they ought to be ſtill in the power of the Romans, as they were formerly. Hereupon they ſent away their deputies immediately to Claudius Ceſar to ſollicit this affair. The young king Agrippa, happening to be then at Rome, begg'd of Ceſar the charge of theſe habits, which was forthwith granted him, and orders ſent to Vitellius to deliver them. The ſacred robes were formerly kept under the ſeal of the high-prieſt and the treaſurer of the temple; who upon the eve of their ſolemn feſtivals, apply'd themſelves ſtill to the commander in chief of the fort for the Romans; ſhew'd him their ſeal, and took out the ſtole; and then when the holy-office was over, carry'd it back again to the ſame place, and there in the preſence of the governor, ſealed it up and left it. I ſhould not have been ſo particular in this point, but for the many changes that have happen'd in this proceeding. This fort was a place of great ſtrength already; but Herod ſtill fortify'd it more and more, and in ſo doing he fortify'd the temple alſo; giving it the name at laſt of Antonia, in honour of his great friend Anthony once emperor of the Romans.

The fort Antonia.

ON the weſt-ſide of the wall there were four gates: one led to the court, croſs a valley that lay betwixt; two to the ſuburbs, and the laſt to the city: with a deſcent of a great many ſteps down to the valley, and an aſcent on the other ſide of as many ſteps up to the top. The city ſtood juſt over againſt the temple, with the appearance of a theatre, bounded toward the ſouth with a deep valley. In the middle of that ſquare was another gate juſt equi-diſtant from the two angles, with a triple ſtately gallery, ſtretching from the eaſt-ſide of the valley to the weſt; which was the uttermoſt length the place would bear. There was never any thing under the ſun more remarkable than this ſpectacle: for the valley was of ſo prodigious a depth, and the height of the building over it ſo ſtupendious, that it turn'd a body's eyes and brain to look down from the top to the bottom of it. Theſe galleries reſted upon four rows of pillars equally diſtant one from another; and a ſtone wall wrought up betwixt thoſe of the fourth rank. The pillars themſelves were as much about as three men could fathom; ſeven and twenty foot in length, and upon a double baſe. The number of them was one hundred and ſixty two in the whole; the chapiters fair and curious to a miracle; and the ſculpture Corinthian work. Between theſe four rows of pillars were three galleries, two of them alike; that is to ſay, thirty foot broad a-piece, upward of fifty in height, and a furlong in length: but that in the middle was half as broad again as the other, and twice as high. In the wainſcoting, there was a great variety of curious figures. The roof of the middle gallery, was ſupported with ſtone-work, ſo delicately wrought and cemented together, that it look'd like one entire ſtone.

A plan of the temple, or the firſt encloſure.

THIS may ſerve for a deſcription of the firſt encloſure, and there was another not far off with a ſtone wall, and a few ſteps up to it, with a partition of ſtone, and an inſcription upon it; prohibiting any ſtrangers to enter there upon pain of death. This inward encloſure had three gates toward the ſouth and north, of an equal diſtance one from the other: and to the eaſtward, another much larger, where men that were purify'd had admittance with their wives; but the women were not permitted to paſs any further.

Another encloſure.

THERE was another place in the middle betwixt the other two, where it was lawful only for the prieſts to enter; and that was it where the temple was erected, and before it the altar, where they offer'd up their ſacrifices. Now Herod durſt not preſume to enter into that place himſelf, becauſe not being a prieſt, he ſtood prohibited by the law: ſo that he committed the care of this part of the holy work to the prieſts themſelves; which they finiſh'd in eighteen months, when he himſelf had been eight years a finiſhing the reſt.

The middle encloſure.

The work finiſhed in eighteen months.

THE People were overjoy'd to ſee ſo great a work over in ſo ſhort a time, giving God thanks for his bleſſing on this undertaking, and extolling the king to the heavens, for the zeal he had ſhewn to God's holy worſhip. The reſtoration of the temple was now celebrated with an univerſal joy, a ſacrifice of three hundred oxen upon the king's account, and ſo for the reſt in proportion; which amounted to a number in the whole hardly to be computed. And the ſolemnity was as much beyond expectation too; for the dedication of the temple, and the anniverſary of Herod's coming to the crown, falling out upon the ſame day, doubled the ſolemnity. Among other of his temple works, the vault muſt not be forgotten, that Herod cauſed to be carry'd under ground from the fort Antonia to the eaſt-gate of the temple, where he erected another fort; this vault being deſign'd for a private and ſafe retreat, either for himſelf or his ſucceſſors, in caſe of any ſeditious practice againſt the government. There goes a tradition, that it never rain'd in the day-time all the while this temple was a building, but only in the night, out of a divine care (as it was intrepreted) not to interrupt the progreſs of the work. This ſtory hath been handed down to us from father to ſon, and it conſiſts well enough with the methods of God's providence, where his worſhip is concern'd. But let this ſuffice as to the reſtoration of the temple.

A law againſt houſe-breakers. The People murmur at it. Herod takes a journey to Rome. Ceſar entertains him very graciouſly; and reſtores him his two ſons. Herod takes them back with him to Jeruſalem. Salome and other accomplices ſtartled at it. Herod not to be wrought upon by calamities.

A law againſt houſe-breakers.

THE king taking it for a duty belonging to his office, to ſee juſtice done indifferently in every part of the common-wealth, and private as well as publick, made a new law for the puniſhing of houſe-breakers, to this effect: "That all offenders in that kind ſhould be "ſold for ſlaves, to any that would purchaſe "them;" without exception, even to ſtrangers. Now the people did not take this ſo much for an animadverſion upon the malefactor, as for an encroachment upon the laws and cuſtoms of the nation; for the ſubjecting of people to the impoſitions of men, that liv'd by other rules and meaſures, does not ſo much hurt to the criminal in the penalty, as to religion itſelf in the example: and therefore, "our antient laws have made a good proviſion in the caſe, by condemning the felon to "a four-fold reſtitution, if he be worth it; or "if inſolvent, to be ſold, but not to ſtrangers, "nor into perpetual ſlavery; and at the end of "ſeven years to be diſcharg'd." The conſtruction, in fine, that they made of this new law, was, that it was unkingly, tyrannical and unjuſt; and a deliberate contempt upon the eſtabliſh'd practice and diſcipline. For which reaſon, every one took the liberty to utter the moſt bitter invectives againſt the king. Much about this time Herod took a voyage into Italy, to make his court to the emperor, and to look after his ſons there, whom he found every way accompliſh'd, in the underſtanding both of letters and buſineſs. Ceſar treated him with ſingular humanity and honour, and deliver'd the young princes back to their father, much improv'd to what they were when he receiv'd them. They were well made, tall and graceful, and had ſomething ſo taking in their converſation and behaviour, that diſcover'd the excellency of their minds was not inferior in proportion to the agreeableneſs of their perſons: and taking all together, there appear'd ſomewhat of a royal dignity in whatever they did. When Herod had paid his compliment, he took leave of Ceſar, and went back with his charge; where they were no ſooner arriv'd, but all people were gazing upon them with joy and admiration. This did not pleaſe Salome the king's ſiſter, nor any of her accomplices in the ruin of Mariamne; for they looked upon them with jealouſy and envy in their hearts, and as inſtruments that Providence had preſerv'd, and rais'd up to revenge the death of their mother. Fill'd with theſe invidious reflections, they made it their buſineſs

They found, in ſhort, that there was no way to work upon the father againſt the ſons, but by ſlanderous inſinuations; and that was the courſe, therefore, they reſolved to put in practice. They did not however think it prudent to talk at this rate to the king himſelf; but they left the poiſon to work rather in wandering hints and rumours among the people, making no doubt, but ſome way or other it would come to the king's ear at laſt, and probably create in him ſuch an averſion to his ſons, as would utterly deſtroy the natural affection of a father.

Herod marries Ariſtobulus to Berenice, and Alexander to Glaphyra. Agrippa gives Herod a viſit.

THIS conſpiracy of Salome and her confederates had wrought nothing as yet upon the confidence and paternal affection of Herod towards his ſons; but he continu'd to treat them with all poſſible kindneſs, honour and reſpect, and without any ſuſpicion or reſerve. The firſt thing he did was to match them into princely families; Ariſtobulus to Berenice the daughter of Salome; and Alexander to Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia.

Herod marries Ariſtobulus to Berenice, and Alexander to Glaphyra.

BEING given to underſtand by this time, that Marcus Agrippa was gone back again out of Italy into Aſia, he went over to him, and gave him a generous and friendly invitation to come and viſit him in his kingdom. The favour being accepted, there was nothing wanting in Herod's part that might contribute to Agrippa's welcome and ſatisfaction. He ſhew'd him all the glorious cities and palaces that he had lately built, or repair'd; carrying him to Sebaſte, the port of Ceſarea, and the forts of Alexandrion, Herodion, Hyrcania, &c. where he treated Agrippa and his friends with all the ſplendor and magnificence imaginable. After this tour, he conducted him to Jeruſalem, where he was received by the whole multitude with the joy, pomp, and acclamations of a ſolemn feſtival: Agrippa, to crown the work, dedicating to God the ſacrifice of a Hecatomb, and feaſting the people. He was ſo well pleaſed with his journey, and his entertainment, that he would fain have ſtaid longer; but winter coming on, and thoſe ſeas being dangerous, he embark'd with his troops for Ionia, laden with honours and preſents.

Herod takes ſhipping for Lesbos; but is forced by contrary winds upon Chios. He finds out Agrippa at Sinope, a city of Pontus. The greeting of the two princes; who paſs together to Samos. The good offices Herod did Agrippa by the way.

WHEN Herod had paſs'd the winter at home, he took another voyage upon the opening of the ſpring to find out Agrippa; who according to his intelligence was gone with an army toward the Boſphorus. Herod took ſhipping for Lesbos, where he ſuppoſed he might meet with him; but after he had paſs'd Rhodes and Coos, he was driven by a north wind upon the iſle of Chios, where he was forc'd to lie by for ſome days. Here he received the compliments of a great many viſitants whom at their return home he diſmiſs'd with royal preſents; and taking notice of ſeveral publick buildings that lay yet in ruins ever ſince the Mithridatick war, for want of money to repair them, he gave them credit for a ſum ſufficient to do the work, with an expreſs charge immediately to ſet about it, and finiſh it the firſt thing they did.

Herod takes ſhipping for Lesbos, in hope to find Agrippa there; driven by contrary winds upon the Chios.

He repairs the buildings that were ruin'd by Mithridates.

THE wind coming now about, Herod ſet ſail, firſt to Mitylene, then to Byzantium; and hearing that Agrippa had already paſs'd the Cyanean rocks, he made after him with all the ſpeed he could, and join'd him at Sinope, a city of Pontus, Agrippa little dreaming of ſuch a friend, and ſuch a fleet ſo near him. His coming, in ſhort, was ſo ſeaſonable, and the greeting of the two princes reciprocally ſo tender and hearty, that nothing could be more demonſtrative of an honourable faith and friendſhip, than for one prince to poſtpone his own buſineſs, and upon ſuch an urgent occaſion too, for the ſervice of another. So that Herod and Agrippa were, in effect, all one, in their arms, labours, hazards, and counſels: and they were both as one in their delights and pleaſures too: in difficulties, out of kindneſs; and in their diverſions, out of reſpect. When Agrippa had diſpatch'd what he came for in Pontus, he took his way back again over land, and ſo they paſs'd through Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia, to Epheſus, and thence by ſea to Samos. Herod's magnificence and generoſity was remarkable by the many good offices he did upon the way; as well by the power he had with Agrippa, as by large donatives and charities, at his own expence wherever there was occaſion for it. There was hardly a town they paſs'd, but Herod prevail'd with Agrippa for ſomewhat or other in their favour: upon whoſe mediation nothing was deny'd. Agrippa, 'tis true, was in his own diſpoſition a friend, even to mankind, where he could oblige any one man without wronging another; but it was not amiſs yet, to have ſuch a remembrancer and interceſſor as Herod was, ready at hand; over and above the natural biaſs of ſo friendly an inclination. At the inſtance of Herod, Agrippa pardon'd the Ilienſians, againſt whom he was highly provoked. He paid an arrear for the people of Chios, that they had incurr'd to the emperor; procured them privileges; and in one word, he did all the good he could wherever he came.

UPON their coming into Ionia, there was a mighty concourſe of Jews of that province gotten together upon that occasion, with complaints against the natives for breaking in upon them in the exercise of their laws and worship; their officers dragging them from their meetings to their courts of justice; and putting a stop to the holy treasure that should be sent to Jerusalem; forcing them to bear arms and pay publick duties out of their bare subsistence-money; contrary to common faith, and to the liberties and exemptions granted them by the Romans. Herod laid hold of this opportunity of doing the Jews a service, and so prevail'd with Agrippa to grant the plaintiffs a hearing; assigning them one Nicolaus, a particular friend of his, for their council. There was a court call'd upon this occasion, Agrippa himself being present, together with a bench of honourable Romans, several princes, and other great men; the advocate opening the cause after this manner:

Agrippa grants them a hearing, and assigns them council.

Nicolaus of Damascus for the Jews.

"WHITHER, most illustrious Agrippa, should "the miserable and oppressed fly for sanctuary and relief, but to those princes that are "able to protect and to relieve them? this "is the case of your humble supplicants; and "we must presume to appeal from your authority to your justice, in a full confidence "of your royal goodness; for we have nothing more to desire at present, than the "possession and enjoyment of what you yourselves have granted us already, and which "our fellow-subjects are now endeavouring "to take from us. If the favours we enjoy "be great, we doubt not but you will now "think us as worthy to keep them, as you "found us before to receive them. If the be"nefit be small, it reflects upon your honour "to imagine that you are not able to make it "good: neither is this a greater injury to us, "than it is an indignity to yourselves in the "contempt of your judgment, and in the dis"appointment of your pious intentions. If it "were put to these very people, whether they "would rather part with their lives, or with "their laws, customs, discipline, sacrifices, "festivals, &c. in honour of their Gods, I "think, with submission, one may safely an"swer for them, that they would chuse the "former. It is a common thing to take up "arms for religion: and what is the great "blessing of the peace and freedom the world "enjoys under the Roman empire, but that "every honest man may live and worship af"ter his own way? what pretence is there "for people to impose that upon others, which "they will not submit to themselves? as if "it were not all one whether we hinder ano"ther man from doing his duty, or neglect "our own. It is a thing farther to be con"sider'd that there is no city, people or na"tion extant, that does not depend upon the "administration, and the power of Rome, "for all the happiness they can pretend to? "will any thing now but a madman, reckon "it his interest to frustrate your bounties, "when every man living, some way or other "shall be a loser by it? our enemies are not "aware of it, that while they labour to in"validate our rights, they destroy their own: "for why should the same concessions be good "to them, and void to us; and that inesti"mable privilege among the rest, of living "at ease and liberty, under the protection of "the Roman emperors, while several other "nations lie groaning in a state of servitude "at the mercy of rigorous kings? neither is "ours, at the best, a condition to be envy'd; "for as to other matters, we desire nothing "more than a common share of advantage "with the rest of our fellow-subjects; pro"vided we may but be allow'd to worship "God after the manner of our forefathers: "which, as it is innocent in itself on the one "hand; so it is for the service of those that "permit it, on the other: for God does not "only love those that worship him them"selves, but those also that encourage the "worship of him in others. What is there "in our way of holy offices that any sober "man can take offence at? or in truth, that "is not in all respects agreeable to piety and "justice? we make no difficulty of owning "the rules and precepts of our lives and pro"fession. The seventh day is a day of rest "from all our labours, and a day that we set "apart for the study of the law, as a disci"pline that much conduces to the rectifying "of our manners. Now these customs of ours "are not only blameless in themselves, even "upon the strictest examination of them, but "venerable even for their antiquity; (all ca"vils to the contrary notwithstanding) so "that there can be no place of controverting "the authority of laws that have stood the "test of so many ages. The injuries we com"plain of are these. They sacrilegiously "make seizure of monies dedicated to holy "uses: they impose taxes upon people that "ought in right to pay none. They hurry "them up and down to courts of justice and "other common attendances, upon our days "of solemnity and religious worship: and for "no other end, but to turn out piety and de"votion to scorn: and these practices they "know in their hearts to be all unwarrant"able and causeless. Your wisdom consults "indifferently the common welfare of all "your people, in the promoting of peace, and "the preventing of feuds. It is against these "injuries, most excellent Agrippa, that we "crave to be relieved, and that we may be "allow'd the same liberty hereafter in our "lives and conversations, that we have en"joy'd heretofore; and that our adversaries "may have no more advantage over us than "we pretend to over them. We take this to "be a justice, not only in the reason of the "thing, but in the right which your good"ness has given us to it by declaring in our "favour; to which purpose, there are at this "day to be seen in the capitol several decrees "of the senate in tables of brass, for the per"petual memory of the thing. These monu"mental records were undoubtedly grounded "upon the experiment of our faith and loy"alty to the state; beside that the obligation "would be yet sacred and inviolable, even "without any antecedent merit on our part; "for your generous goodness hath been ever "so far from lessening or revoking the boun"ties you have once bestow'd (and that not "only to us, but to all mortals) that it hath "been your practice, rather to amplify and "enlarge them, even beyond all thought and "expectation, as I could give instances abun"dantly, if my time would bear it. But not "to value ourselves too much upon our own "services, let our royal master's good offices

" ſpeak for us. Where did he ever fail, to " the uttermoſt of his power, to oblige your " nation? Has not his faith and zeal for your " intereſt been try'd over and over? Has he " not made the advancing of your honour his " buſineſs and his ſtudy? Were your affairs " ever in any difficulty, and he not eſpouſe " them as his own? ſo that if it were but for " our king's ſake, we might pretend to ſome " ſort of conſideration. We muſt not forget " the ſervices of his father Antipater neither, " nor the enforcement of two thouſand aux- " iliaries that he brought to Ceſar in Egypt, " where his behaviour was ſo ſignally brave, " and ſo much to the advantage of the em- " pire, that he had the reputation of being " not inferior to any man living, either at ſea " or at land, for conduct and courage. We " might appeal to the glorious preſents that " Ceſar made him, or rather to the letters re- " commendatory that he wrote to the ſenate " in his favour upon this occaſion, by which " he obtained for him the privilege of a citi- " zen of Rome, with other additional ho- " nours. This ſingle argument, great prince, " might be ſufficient, even of itſelf, to evince " that thoſe favours were at firſt well be- " ſtow'd, which we are now imploring may " be confirm'd; beſide that conſidering the " preſent league of friendſhip betwixt your- " ſelf and our royal ſovereign, we do rather " hope for an augmentation of your bounty, " than fear any abatement of it. I might en- " large upon your holy vows and ſacrifices at " Jeruſalem, the ſplendor of your entertain- " ments, and the ſatisfaction you were pleaſed " to own in the reciprocal exchange of offices " of hoſpitality and reſpect, which were all " evident proofs of an affectionate tenderneſs, " and an amicable underſtanding betwixt the " Jews and the Romans, confirm'd and ratified under the very roof of the king him- " ſelf. Now our final requeſt to the majeſty " of Agrippa, and in the preſence of the king " of the Jews too, is only this; that we may " reap the fruits of your own bounty, without " being depriv'd of it by the fraudulent ma- " lice of others."

To this diſcourſe of Nicolaus none of the Greeks made any reply; for it was not a judicial trial of right, but a petitionary complaint only, to get the grievance remov'd. They could not deny the fact; but the Jews, they ſaid, were ſtrangers, and would be a burden to them, who inſiſted upon it on the other hand, that they were no ſtrangers, but a people that liv'd in their own way, without offence to God or man.

Agrippa declares for the Jews, confirming their claims, and aſſuring them of protection.

WHEN Agrippa came to underſtand how they were oppreſs'd, he declar'd himſelf in their favour, as well for the juſtice of their cauſe, as out of the reſpect he bore to Herod; and that he thought their deſires ſo reaſonable, that if they had been much larger, he ſhould have complied with them, ſo far at leaſt as would have conſiſted with his duty to the ſtate of Rome. " But ſince I find them ſo " moderate, ſays he, in their demands, as to " content themſelves with the ratification of " what is already conferr'd upon them, I do " here pronounce a confirmation of the claim " they make to theſe privileges; and take it " further upon myſelf, that ſo long as they " keep themſelves within the bounds of their " diſcipline and profeſſion, they ſhall have " no more trouble of this kind for the future." With theſe words he diſmiſs'd the convention, and upon the breaking of it up, Herod gave Agrippa infinite thanks in the name of the whole nation; and ſo with an interchange of mutual endearments and embraces betwixt the two princes, they both left Lesbos.

Herod embarks for Ceſarea. He calls an aſſembly at Jeruſalem, and tells the people what hath been done for them in Aſia.

HEROD, upon parting, put to ſea with a fair wind for Ceſarea, where he arriv'd; from whence in a few days afterwards he came to Jeruſalem, where he aſſembled the Jews immediately, ſtrangers as well as citizens, and gave them an account of his expedition, and the great ſervices he had done their friends in Aſia, where they were at that time free and eaſy in their perſons and in their religion. He did not forget to mind them neither, how they had proſper'd under his government; and that he had no other intereſt in what he did, but the well-being of his ſubjects. And for a further inſtance of his goodneſs, he did at the ſame time diſcharge them of a fourth part of their tribute. Theſe fair words, as they were attended with ſuitable effects, chear'd the hearts of the people, and ſent them away with acclamations in their mouths, and the wiſhes of all glory and proſperity to the king.

Salome's plot upon the two princes. Two factions countermining one another. Artificial calumnies. Salome and Pheroras irritate Herod againſt his own ſon. The mother of Antipater ſent for to court. Antipater waits upon Agrippa to Rome.

WHILE theſe things were a doing abroad, malicious heart-burnings and animoſities were fomented at home by the practice of Salome upon the two young princes, whom ſhe hated mortally; and taking courage from the ſucceſs of her calumnies upon the mother, ſhe proceeded with the greater confidence in her deſign upon the ſons, and with this view too, not to leave one alive that might be in a condition to revenge the blood of that innocent lady; and the deſign was not carried on without ſome ſort of colour neither; for the young men did not behave themſelves ſo reſpectfully toward their father, as they ſhould have done; partly out of an indignation for the violence committed upon the perſon of their mother, and partly out of an ambition to get the rule into their own hands. The factions were now at work, betwixt reviving old grudges and creating new ones. The ſons rail'd in downright ſcurrility at Salome and Pheroras; and they on the other ſide as ſpitefully, but more ſlyly undermin'd the brothers; ſo that though there there was no love loſt, they had different ways yet of expreſſing their hatred; for the princes either in heat of youth, or in conſideration of their education and quality, made no ſcruple openly to ſhew and expreſs their reſentment. But the other made way to the execution of their malice by artifice and diſguiſe, provoking the young men to extravagancies of language, on purpoſe to enſnare them. "They took it "for an honour, they ſaid, to be the ſons of "ſuch a mother;" inſiſting upon it ſtill, that ſhe was baſely murder'd. Now theſe words were a ſufficient ground for a calumnious jealouſy to work upon; for they would bear the conſtruction of deliberating upon a revenge with their own hands. This was now become the talk of the whole town; and while every body elſe pitied the young men for the dangerous liberties they took of talking at that deſperate rate, Salome made her advantage of their indiſcretions, and improv'd them to her own ends. They would be ſaying commonly in the heat of their impatience for the loſs of their mother, "That next to the miſerable "fate of that unhappy princeſs, they look'd "upon their own circumſtances to be the "moſt deplorable of all others, in the neceſ-"ſity of cohabiting with the murderers, and "in ſome meaſure becoming partakers of the "crime, by communicating with their com-"pany."

Artificial calumnies againſt the two brothers.

HEROD's abſence all this while was a great advantage to the managers of this intrigue. But ſoon after his return now, and the harangue that I told you of, Salome and Pheroras were preſently at work upon him, with cautions and inſinuations of the danger he was in from his own ſons, and how they made their publick boaſts that the murderers of their mother ſhould never eſcape ſcot free. To this they added a feign'd ſtory of Archelaus, the king of Cappadocia; and how they depended upon his intereſt with Ceſar to aſſiſt them in the proſecution of their father. This wrought the more ſenſibly upon Herod, becauſe he heard the ſame things over and over again from ſeveral hands. Upon this occaſion he could not but call to mind the miſeries he had already endured by factions in his family, even to the depriving him of his beloved friends, and the deareſt wife in nature. Tormented with theſe reflections, and taking the meaſure of things to come, by things paſt, the proſpect before him was ſo confounding, that he had no longer the uſe of his reaſon. He was, in ſhort, fortunate abroad, beyond all thought or imagination, and no leſs wretched at home; inſomuch, that conſidering both extremes, it may be a queſtion whether the glory of his proſperous condition in the world was ſufficient to balance the calamities he ſuffer'd in the diſorders of his family; and whether he might not have been a happier man in a private ſtate betwixt both.

Salome and Pheroras's caution Herod againſt his own ſon, and inſinuate a conſpiracy againſt the father's life.

WHILE he was now caſting about what meaſures to take, he bethought himſelf of taking another ſon he had, that he brought up privately into his family, and there to entertain him with honour and reſpect; propoſing by this means to take down the inſolent ambition of his ſons; his name was Antipater. Now Herod had no thought at firſt of putting the government into this young man's hand (as out of an over-fondneſs afterward he did) but he betook himſelf to this expedient by way of trial, to ſee if he could by theſe means put a check upon the inſolencies of Mariamne's children, and bring them to better reaſon, when they ſhould find that let, them do what they would, the government ſhould not want a ſucceſſor. In this contemplation Herod treated Antipater with a countenance of authority and truſt, and as the next pretender to the crown; making no doubt all this while of reducing his other ſons by this method, within the bounds of modeſty and duty. But it fell out quite otherwiſe; for they reſented it as an affront; ſo that inſtead of a curb, it prov'd a provocation. Antipater being highly advanc'd in his father's affections, and ſo much beyond his expectation too, reſolv'd to maintain his ground, and not be out-rival'd by either of his brothers; to which end he labour'd with all his might by tales and calumnies to render them odious to their father, who was in truth ſo credulous and open to thoſe ill offices and impreſſions, that he eaſily gain'd his point to his own wiſh, and wrought him into an averſion that grew every day more implacable than other. His heart was ſo ſet upon this project, that he ſcarce thought of any thing elſe. However, that he might not ſeem to have any hand in the accuſation of his brothers, he guarded againſt uttering any diſreſpectful language againſt them; for he manag'd his deſign by ſuch other inſtruments as he knew the king would give credit to, and as he might ſafely depend upon himſelf. Antipater was now look'd upon as the riſing ſon, and court made to him accordingly, as the ready way to preferment; his party covering the whole practice ſtill with a pretended zeal for the ſervice of Herod. The confidents of this ſecret being all true to the plot, made advantage of the young mens impotences in heat and paſſion, who laid themſelves now opener than before; breaking out by fits into tears and exclamations, fierce remonſtrances of the intolerable wrongs and affronts that they endur'd; calling out in the bitterneſs of their hearts upon the ghoſt of their innocent mother, and charging their father, in plain terms, with manifeſt injuſtice. Now all theſe intemperances were watch'd and obſerv'd by the accomplices of Antipater, and then carried to Herod, with improvements and additions, to widen the breach. Theſe incendiaries had ſo exaſperated the king, that he reveng'd himſelf upon Alexander and Ariſtobulus, by heaping more and more honours and favours upon Antipater; who, in the concluſion, ſo far prevail'd upon Herod, that he got his mother ſent for to court, and recommendatory letters to Ceſar for himſelf, much to his credit and advantage. And finally, upon Agrippa's return to Rome, after ten years adminiſtration in Aſia, Herod made a voyage by ſea, to compliment him upon the way, and took only Antipater, of all his ſons, along with him, together with many rich preſents; and upon parting, he begg'd the favour of Agrippa, that his ſon might wait upon him to Rome, and be there introduc'd by him to Ceſar. This was to ſhew that all was done now by Antipater, to the excluſion of his two brothers.

CHAP. VII.

Herod appeals to Ceſar in the caſe of his ſons. The tender and generous behaviour of the brothers.

Antipater's journey to Rome much to his honour and advantage.

THIS voyage of Antipater to Rome, eſpecially accompanied with his father's letters and commendations to all his friends there, turn'd exceedingly to his honour and advantage. The only thing that troubled him was, that being now out of the way, he could not ſo conveniently impoſe upon his father with calumnies againſt his brothers, as when he was at his elbow, which gave him not a little trouble, for fear he might poſſibly come to change his mind, and be brought over to terms of more moderation toward the children of Mariamne. This thought was ſtill uppermoſt in his head; but he purſued his firſt point ſtill; and what he could not now do by word of mouth, he ſupplied by ſpiteful letters to keep up the evil humour, upon the pretext of being wonderfully in pain for his father's ſafety, when he was, in truth, working his way all this while by under-hand practices to poſſeſs himſelf of the government, having already tranſported Herod to ſuch a degree of diſpleaſure, that his ſons had not in the world a greater enemy. But this unnatural rigour was not yet without ſome intervals of reluctancy; ſo that for fear of doing any raſh thing in his anger, eſpecially in the caſe of a father and his children, he took up a reſolution of another journey to Rome, and there openly to exhibit an accuſation againſt his ſons to Ceſar; but miſſing him at Rome, he follow'd him to Aquileia; where Herod, upon an application to him for leave to bring an unhappy cauſe before him, produced his two ſons, and charg'd them not only with inſolence, but an attempt to poiſon him; aggravating the malice and the horror of the wickedneſs to the degree of a conſpiracy againſt the crown and dignity of their father; and all this, notwithſtanding the licence Ceſar had given him to leave the ſucceſſion to which of the ſons he pleas'd, or to him of the two that he ſhould find moſt dutiful; nay, and in caſe of their failing of the ſovereignty themſelves, they would be content even with the ſingle death of their father, though with the uttermoſt peril of their own lives in the procuring of it; ſo inhuman, ſays he, and ſo impious is the rancour that is ſettled in the minds of theſe young men; adding how long he had born theſe indignities; which he was now at laſt enforced even againſt duty and good manners, to obtrude upon Ceſar's ear and patience. But what have I done, ſays he, to deſerve this? whom have I wrong'd? or with what face ſhall any man pretend to diſpoſſeſs a prince ſo long ſettled in the exerciſe of a power acquired by ſo many hazards? or to bar him the liberty of deviſing it, at death, to him that ſhall by his faithful piety beſt deſerve it? This would be reaſonable, if it were but to provoke a generous emulation, and to make virtue the way to honour, eſpecially when 'tis againſt religion and nature, ſo much as to entertain ſo lewd a thought; for whoever wiſhes himſelf on his father's throne, wiſhes the other dead, in regard that the one cannot ſucceed, while the other's living. Can they pretend, ſays he, that ever I was wanting to them in any office becoming a gracious prince, or an indulgent father, either in matter of ſtate, retinue, curioſities, or the like? Have I not match'd them to princeſſes of the firſt quality? Ariſtobulus to the daughter of my own ſiſter, and Alexander to the daughter of king Archelaus; nay, which is more than all the reſt, when I might have puniſh'd them by my own authority, I have rather appealed to Ceſar, the common patron and benefactor of us all; and ſetting aſide the authority of a prince, and of a father, over theſe treacherous violaters of their duty, I have now ſet myſelf upon a level with my ſubjects and children, to be determin'd by Ceſar, only with this requeſt to his imperial majeſty, that ſo enormous a wickedneſs may not paſs unpuniſh'd, and I myſelf ſtand condemn'd to ſpend the remainder of my days in a reſtleſs anxiety of apprehenſion. Theſe wretches deſerve certainly never to ſee the light again, after ſo audacious an affront, upon the moſt ſacred rights of ſociety and human nature.

Herod appeals to Ceſar in the caſe of his ſons.

The tender and generous behaviour of the brothers.

WHEN Herod had deliver'd his charge (and with warmth enough too) the young princes that could not forbear weeping all the while he was a ſpeaking, burſt out into a flood of tears, upon the finiſhing of his diſcourſe; not as conſcious of any crime, but out of an honourable ſenſe of piety to ſee their father their accuſer; with this proſpect before them, that they muſt either conteſt the cauſe, or abandon their own integrity; the former being undecent, and the other unſafe. In this heſitation and ſuſpence, they betook themſelves to ſighs and tears, without one word ſpeaking; and this ſilence, they were afraid, would be taken for guilt, when in truth it was only want of practice and aſſurance, being unwonted to ſpeak before ſuch an auditory. Ceſar made a right judgment of the matter, and ſo did the whole aſſembly; who were all mov'd, to the higheſt degree of tenderneſs and compaſſion, and the accuſer himſelf among the reſt.

CHAP. VIII.

Alexander's addreſs and defence. The two brothers clear'd. Herod preſents Auguſtus; and Auguſtus preſents Herod in return. Herod goes back with his ſons to Judea, and meets Archelaus at Eleuſa. He calls a council at Jeruſalem, and declares his ſucceſſor.

IT was by this time evident, that Ceſar and Herod were both tenderly affected to theſe unfortunate princes; inſomuch that ſeveral there preſent wept in pity for them. So ſoon as they came to take notice of this favourable diſpoſition, Alexander, the elder of the two, addreſs'd himſelf to his father upon the ſubject of their charge as follows:

Alexander's addreſs and defence.

" Sir, we cannot but take it for a clear evi" dence of your good intentions toward us,
" that you have brought us to this place before
" ſo great and juſt a judge, and ſo gracious a " prince, for the deciſion of our cauſe, with" out employing either your regal or paternal
" power over your own children and people.
" But in transferring us to Rome, and by way
" of an appeal to Ceſar too, it is given mani-
" feſtly to underſtand that you have a deſire
" and purpoſe to preſerve us; for men do not

" uſe to carry thoſe to temples and altars,
" whom they intend to deſtroy. But yet af" ter all this, for an aggravation of our miſ-
" fortune, we are conſcious to ourſelves that
" we are not worthy to live, had we been " guilty of any thing that look's like diſloyal-
" ty or ingratitude toward ſo good a father;
" and we had much rather die innocent, than " ſurvive the ſcandal of ſuch a ſuſpicion. If " providence ſhall enable us to defend the " truth, the proof of our innocence will be a
" much greater comfort to us than the deli-
" verance of our perſons; but if calumny
" ſhould prevail, a life under thoſe infamous
" circumſtances would be worſe than a thou-
" ſand deaths. The pretext of an ambitious
" deſign upon the government, is well enough
" accommodated to the intemperate heats of
" young men; and the inſtance of our unfor" tunate mother furniſhes more colour for it.
" But whoſe caſe, I beſeech you, Sir, may " not this be as well as ours; and why may
" not the children of all other princes under
" our circumſtances, be charged with the ſame
" deſign, if ſuſpicion ſhall paſs for a proof?
" For here is only an invidious accuſation,
" without the leaſt ſhadow of any evidence of " preſumption, or ſo much as a probability to
" ſupport it. Why is not the poiſon itſelf,
" or the accomplices and the inſtruments of the " practice produced? Where are the con-
" ſpirators, the conſpiracy, the bribery, or
" the defamatory letters? But the whole
" ſtory, in fine, is invention and ſlander, with" out any countenance to give it credit. A " divided court, 'tis true, is a great misfor-
" tune; but the hope of preferment, which
" you are pleaſed to call the reward of vir" tue, proves an incentive many times to all
" ſorts of wickedneſs; nay, we inſiſt ſo far
" upon our integrity, that we defy the whole
" earth to diſprove us. As for ſcandals, there's " no refuting them, where the ear is open to " the calumny, and deaf to the defence. If " we have talk'd at large, it was not meant " againſt yourſelf, Sir, (which would have " ill-becom'd us) but againſt your tale-bearers.
" If we have paſſionately lamented the loſs
" of our dear mother, it was not purely for
" the death itſelf, but out of a zeal to the " honour of her memory, which we found
" blaſted where ſhe leaſt deſerv'd it. And to " what end again ſhould we aſpire to the go" vernment in the life-time of our father?
" for if we do already enjoy the honours be" longing to the royal family, (as effectually
" we do) what have we farther to ſtruggle
" for? Or if we are at preſent debarr'd of our " right, may we not yet preſume to wiſh and " hope for't? Can it be imagin'd that ever
" the murderers, in ſuch an inſtance as this,
" ſhould ſet up for ſucceſſors, when ſea and
" land, after ſo flagitious a villany, would
" conſpire to ruin them? How would it con-
" ſiſt with the piety of the ſubjects, or with
" the religion of the country, to ſet up par-
" ricides for kings, and to ſee the holy tem" ple that you yourſelf erected to the great
" God, prophaned by the baſeſt of aſſaſſins?
" Or, all other conſiderations apart, how " ſhould any man think to deſtroy Herod,
" the emperor yet living, and not fall under
" the power and juſtice of Ceſar? We are " not ſuch fools and profligates as we are ſaid
" to be, but the misfortune of our family, ra" ther than the ſcandal. Now if there ap" pears nothing againſt us, upon any colour-
" able pretence, where is the ground of the " accuſation that expoſes us for ſuch impious
" wretches? As to the death of our mother,
" 'tis a conſideration to make us rather cau" tious than outrageous. We might multiply
" words endleſly; but there's no need of ex-
" cuſing a thing that never was done; where" fore we have only this now to beg of the " mighty Ceſar, and at preſent our ſovereign
" judge, that if you can, Sir, in your con-
" ſcience, diſcharge us of any farther ſuſpi-
" cion for the future, we may be allow'd to " live, how miſerable ſoever; for what can " be more grievous than to lie under the im-
" putation, even though falſely, of the moſt
" horrid of crimes! But if you go on ſuſ-
" pecting us, the torments of our own thoughts
" will do our buſineſs, without your help;
" for we are not ſo fond of life, as to think
" of preſerving it to the trouble of him from
" whom we receiv'd it."

THE accuſation was ſo extravagant, that Ceſar gave no great credence to it from the very beginning; but when he came to reflect upon the honeſty and frankneſs of Alexander's defence, and the change of countenance he obſerv'd in Herod, he was more and more confirm'd in an opinion that the young princes had been traduc'd. The whole court, in ſhort, was mightily in pain for them, and not without hard thoughts of the king himſelf, for ſo raſh and violent a proſecution; ſo that what with the nonſenſe of the ſtory, and the trouble they were in to ſee the lives of two ſuch lovely youths in danger, they reſolv'd, one and all, to do them the beſt offices they could, eſpecially after ſo ſober a reply to ſo provoking a charge; the princes ſtill continuing in the ſame poſture of modeſty and ſadneſs, with down-caſt eyes, waiting for the iſſue, which was not altogether hopeleſs in the concluſion; for the king himſelf diſcover'd a kind of conſcious confuſion in his looks; as who ſhould ſay, what temerity have I been guilty of to bring ſuch a cauſe as this in debate before Ceſar, without better proof! Ceſar took notice of all theſe things; and after a ſhort pauſe of deliberation, deliver'd himſelf to this effect: " That the ſons
" were in ſome ſort to blame to give their fa" ther any cauſe of jealouſy; but that, upon
" the main, he acquitted them ſo far, that he " pronounced them innocent; deſiring Herod
" at the ſame time to forgive and forget,
" without any farther diſtruſt, and ſo to make
" a final end of the controverſy, as being a
" moſt unreaſonable thing for a father to en" courage ill offices againſt his own children;
" telling him farther, that things would
" mend in time, and all breaches be intirely
" made up, if they could but once come to
" a mutual confidence, and a fair underſtand-
" ing one with another." After this declaration of himſelf, upon that occaſion, he beckon'd to the brothers to come forward, and as they were advancing with tears in their eyes, and ſubmiſſion in their hearts, and upon the very point of caſting themſelves at their father's feet, the king with infinite tenderneſs took them into his arms, one after the other, and prevented them. The ſurprize of this unexpected encounter drew tears of joy from the

the whole company; after which greeting, and the payment of their dutiful acknowledgments to Auguſtus, Herod and his two ſons went their way together, taking Antipater along with them; the moſt joy'd man in the world, as he pretended, at this reconciliation.

Herod preſents Auguſtus, and Auguſtus preſents Herod in return.

SOME few days after this, Herod, while Auguſtus was treating the people with ſpectacles and doles, made Ceſar a preſent of three * hundred talents; who in requital beſtow'd upon him one moiety of the profits of the mines of Cyprus, and the diſpoſition of the other, with ſeveral honourable bounties and commiſſions, over and above. He gave him liberty alſo to appoint which of his ſons he pleas'd for his ſucceſſor; or otherwiſe to divide the government betwixt them, which he lik'd beſt. Now Ceſar finding him ready to comply, put only this bar upon him, that he ſhould not reſign the government in his own life-time, but keep his kingdom in his power as well as his children.

Herod goes back with his ſons to Judea.

THIS was the poſture of affairs when Herod returned with his three ſons for Judea. The people at Trachonitis, a conſiderable part of that kingdom, had in his abſence revolted, it ſeems; but by the vigilance and good government of the officers he had left behind him, they were reduced to their duty. As He meets Archelaus at Eleuſa.

Herod and his ſons were upon their voyage, coming to Eleuſa, a city of Cilicia, now called Sebaſte, they found there Archelaus, the king of Cappadocia; who was even overjoy'd to ſee Herod and his ſons ſo well reconciled, and to underſtand that his ſon-in-law Alexander had acquitted himſelf upon his trial with ſo much honour. Archelaus, in fine, received Herod with all humanity imaginable; and ſo after a reciprocal exchange of endearments and preſents, the two kings parted. Herod immediately upon his arrival at Jeruſalem, called the people together into the temple, and there entertain'd them with an account of his expedition: and when he had run thro' the hiſtory of the honours Ceſar had done him, and other paſſages that he had a mind they ſhould know, he turn'd his diſcourſe at laſt to his ſons, with a particular recommendation of peace and unity, as well to the court as to the common people; "declaring

With theſe words he finiſh'd his ſpeech, and diſcharg'd the aſſembly. Some were well enough pleas'd with it, others as much the contrary; for upon the caſting of this bone of emulation among the ſons, matters look'd already toward a change.

Ceſarea finiſhed. The ſolemnity of the dedication. The Certamen Quinquennale. Herod builds Capharſaba, Cypron, Phaſael, &c. Rebuilds the temple of the Pythian Apollo, and ſettles an annuity for the olympick games. The character of Herod.

Ceſarea finiſh'd. The dedication of it celebrated with all manner of plays, ſpectacles, and games.

THE city of Ceſarea was now finiſh'd, in the tenth year from the laying of its foundation, in the 28th of Herod's reign, and and in the Olympiad one hundred ninety two. The dedication of it was celebrated with all the magnificence and ſplendor imaginable: maſters procur'd from all parts, and the beſt that could be gotten too in all faculties and exerciſes; as muſicians, wreſtlers, ſwordſmen, and the like; and theſe in their ſeveral profeſſions, to play their prizes. They had their horſe-races alſo, and ſeveral ſorts of wild beaſts, with all other varieties of ſpectacle and entertainment that were in vogue, either at Rome or elſewhere. This ſolemnity was inſtituted to the honour of Ceſar, under the appellation of Certamen Quinquennale; and the ceremony to be exhibited every fifth year. It was a prodigious charge that the king was at for the furniſhing of this pompous ſhew, in curioſities from all quarters far and near; beſide what Julia, the wife of Ceſar contributed toward it upon her own account, and in expenſive rarities out of Italy, computed at about five † hundred talents upon the whole: over and above the vaſt multitudes of people that flock'd thither upon this occaſion, and divers embaſſadors from abroad out of a compliment to Herod, which were all entertain'd, treated and diverted at the king's coſt, with ſpectacles by day, and ſumptuous feaſting and jollities by night, to the infinite reputation of his character for a generous and a magnanimous prince. He made it all his buſineſs, in fine, to out-do himſelf, and by the ſplendor of every ſucceeding action, to darken the glory of the former: inſomuch that both Ceſar and Agrippa had been often heard to ſay, that he deſerved the government both of Syria and Egypt, to be added to his province; for that the command and revenue of Judea was too narrow for his ſoul.

The Certamen Quinquennale.

Herod builds Capharſaba, Cypron, Phaſael, &c.

WHEN the ſolemnity of this feſtival was over, he ſet himſelf to the building of another city, upon a plain call'd Capharſaba, a ſpot of ground that was moſt deliciouſly provided with wood and water; a pleaſant river about it, and a grove with a delicate plantation of curious trees near the place. He gave this town the name of Antipatris, from Antipater his father: and he built after this a caſtle beyond Jericho, which he call'd Cypris,

* Three hundred talents weighed thirty four thouſand two hundred and eighteen pounds, nine ounces; and their value in ſilver amounted to one hundred two thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty ſix pounds, five ſhillings; and in gold to one million, ſix hundred forty two thouſand, five hundred pounds, Engliſh money.

† Five hundred talents weighed fifty ſeven thouſand thirty one pounds, three ounces, and their value in ſilver amounted to an hundred ſeventy one thouſand, ninety three pounds, fifteen ſhillings; and in gold to two millions, ſeven hundred thirty ſeven thouſand, five hundred pounds of our money.

from the name of his mother; a ſweet delightful ſeat well built and fortify'd: not forgetting his beloved brother all this while; to the honour of whoſe memory he dedicated ſeveral glorious and monumental ſtructures; as in the firſt place a tower in the city itſelf, not inferior for ſtrength and largeneſs to the Alexandrian Pharos, to which he gave the name of Phaſael; after which he erected a town upon the north-ſide of the valley of Jericho, which he called by the ſame name. By this means, the country round about, that was before abandon'd, came to be peopled again, and was called the Province of the Phaſaelites.

IT would be endleſs to run through the hiſtory of all his bounties in Syria, Greece, and, in truth, wherever he came, by giving his aſſiſtance to ſome; advancing publick works for others; and ſupplying monies elſewhere, for the perfecting of what ſome had begun, and could not go thorough with.

He rebuilds the temple of the Pythian Apollo

BUT to come to the moſt magnificent and illuſtrious of all his undertakings, there was the temple of the Pythian Apollo at Rhodes, that he rebuilt upon his own particular account, confering a great many talents of free gift, on the Rhodians for the building of ſo many ſhips. Another vaſt ſum he gave for the repairing and finiſhing of ſeveral publick edifices in the city of Nicopolis, which was erected by Ceſar, near Actium. He built two galleries in Antioch (which is the largeſt city of Syria) that went quite croſs the town, with a walk betwixt them. Theſe galleries were gloriouſly adorn'd, and the ſtreets pav'd with a ſmooth poliſh'd ſtone, both for the ornament of the place, and for the convenience of the inhabitants.

and ſettles an annuity for the Olympian games.

HE ſet apart alſo a yearly allowance out of his own revenue toward the maintenance of the olympick games, which began now to ſink in their reputation, for want of a maintenance to bear the charge of ſacrifices and pompous expences, ſuitable to ſuch a meeting: by which munificence he got the name of a perpetual maſter of the revels.

The character of Herod.

BUT after all this, there never was any man perhaps made up of ſo many ſeeming contradictions. Take him in the general, for his liberality and the external appearance of a diſpoſition to do good to all men, one would have concluded him the beſt-natur'd perſon under the ſun: but then to conſider, on the other hand, the extreme rigour and injuſtice of his practices, even upon his neareſt relations, as well as upon his ſubjects at large, it is not to be deny'd but that he was harſh and inexorable, without either pity or ſhame. Now upon this view, a body would take him to be a man divided within himſelf; but I am rather of opinion that he was uniform and ſteddy to the ſame meaſure and principle. As he was greedy of honour, and a perſon wholly abandon'd to that impotent vanity, he was conſequently magnificent, in order to the compaſſing of his end; and according to the proſpect he had either of a glorious life or of an honourable memory. This made him profuſe beyond his fortune, and burdenſome to his ſubjects; for there was no ſupplying of his extravagant expences by fair and warrantable means. He was then ſenſible of the ill-will he had drawn upon himſelf by his oppreſſion, and of the difficulty of allaying thoſe ſeditious diſcontents: which he ſaw was a thing not to be done, without either retrenching his diſburſements, or ſhortening his revenue. So that he had no way left now, but to improve the people's ſpite to his own benefit; which he did, firſt by provoking men beyond all patience, and then treating them as the worſt of enemies for murmuring: and this was the courſe he took, without diſtinction of perſons, whether friends or relations; being reſolved to aſſert his dignity in all caſes whatſoever. But he gave to underſtand by the honours he paid to others, as to Ceſar and Agrippa, and the reſt of his illuſtrious friends, what he expected to himſelf; and that he intended the one ſhould be exemplary to the other. This was enough to ſhew the bent and biaſs of his inclination. Now Herod's way of doing homage to ſuperiors was no precedent for the Jews to follow; but a flat contradiction to their laws and practice; being train'd up to principles of obedience for conſcience, without any regard to intereſt or power. This reſtraint was exceedingly to their loſs, for they might otherwiſe have inſinuated themſelves by the pompous dedications of temples and ſtatues, into the good graces of the king; and with other ſuch like flatteries have gratify'd the vanity of an ambitious man. This, in fine, do I take to be the true reaſon of Herod's exceſſive generoſity and bounty toward ſtrangers; and no leſs, of his inexorable cruelty toward his own ſubjects.

The Greeks petition Ceſar againſt the Jews.

THE Jews of Aſia and thoſe of Cyrene in Africa, were at this time ſo ill treated by the Greeks, and without any end or or meaſure, upon a pretence that they carry'd their money out of the country, and were in other reſpects a grievance to them, that having a grant from former kings, of free privileges and immunities, in common with the reſt of the citizens, and the natives themſelves, they ſent their ambaſſadors, upon this occaſion, with a petitionary complaint and appeal to Ceſar; who thereupon wrote back to the provinces, that "it was his will and pleaſure "the Jews ſhould continue in the enjoyment "of their exemptions." The copy of this edict I have here ſubjoin'd, for the better authority of our pretence, and to ſhew the world what opinion the emperors of former times had of the Jews.

Ceſar confirms them in their privileges.

Ceſar Auguſtus, high-prieſt and tribune of the people, hath decreed this.

Several decrees highly in favour of the Jews.

"WHEREAS the Jews have ever been "a people faithful and well affected "to the Romans, eſpecially to Ceſar, my im-"perial father, in the pontificate of Hyrca-"nus, and remain to this preſent in the ſame "diſpoſition of faith and good-will as for-"merly, we have deemed it reaſonable, with "the advice and conſent of the ſenate and "the people of Rome, to permit unto the "ſaid

" ſaid Jews the free exerciſe of their own " laws and rites, in as ample manner as they " enjoy'd them formerly in the days of Hyr- " canus, the high-prieſt of the great God; " we do likewiſe permit their temples ſtill to " continue ſanctuaries, and places of refuge; " their contribution-money toward holy uſes " to be committed to the treaſury of Jeruſa- " lem, by ſuch perſons as they ſhall appoint, " without any let or moleſtation: that they " be not forced upon appearances before the " magiſtrates on the day of their ſabbath, or " after nine of the clock on the eve before: " that it be made ſacrilege, and confiſcation " of goods, to ſteal out of their religious " places any of their holy books or treaſure. " And we do farther require, out of the ten- " derneſs and reſpect we bear to all mankind, " that the addreſs or memorial now preſented " us by Caius Marcius Cenſorinus on the behalf " of the Jews, together with this decree, be " ſet up in that eminent place at * Ancyra, " which was dedicated by the whole people " of Aſia, to the honour of our name. And " let no man do any thing contrary to the te- " nor hereof, at his uttermoſt peril." There was this following Inſcription alſo upon one of the pillars of the temple.

Ceſar to Norbanus Flaccus, greeting.

" LET no man preſume to hinder or in- " terrupt the Jews in any place whatſo- " ever, in the ſending up of their money to " Jeruſalem for holy uſes, according to their " ancient cuſtom." Thus far Ceſar. And Agrippa afterward wrote a letter on the Jews behalf in like manner too, as follows.

Agrippa to the magiſtrates, ſenate, and people of Epheſus, health.

" IT is our will that the Jews in Aſia have " the keeping and diſpoſing of the mo- " ney themſelves, that they ſend up to Jeru- " ſalem, according to ancient uſage for the " ſervice of their temple and their worſhip; " and in caſe any of that ſacred treaſure ſhould " be ſtolen, and the criminal fly to the altar " for ſanctuary, let him be taken away by " violence, and deliver'd up to the Jews to be " baniſh'd as a ſacrilegious perſon, and out of " protection."

THE ſame Agrippa wrote alſo to the pretor Syllanus, againſt compelling the Jews upon the ſabbath-day, before their courts of juſtice. And once again

Marcus Agrippa to the magiſtrates and ſenate of Cyrene, greeting.

" WHEREAS the Jews of your parts " have written complaining letters to " me, of the vexatious practices of ſome pick- " thank people among you, that take upon " them to put a ſtop to the tranſmitting of " their money to Jeruſalem, under pretext " of being in an arrear of tribute, which is " not ſo neither: and all this, notwithſtand- " ing the poſitive letters and orders from " from Auguſtus to Flavius, the pretor of Li- " bya, and the other magiſtrates of that pro- " vince, not to give them any interruption, " in ſending up their money as formerly, it " is my command that they be left wholly to " their own way and liberty, as heretofore; " and that commiſſioners be appointed for re- " ſtoring to the Jews as much of their trea- " ſure as ſhall be found either conceal'd or " miſapplied."

Caius Norbanus Flaccus, proconſul, to the magiſtrates of Sardis, health.

" BEING commanded by an expreſs from " Ceſar, to take care that no obſtruction " be given to the Jews in the collecting and " ſending up of monies to Jeruſalem to ſuch " purpoſes as they have formerly done; this is " to acquaint you that Auguſtus will have it " ſo, and that I expect his orders ſhall be " obey'd."

JULIUS ANTONIUS, proconſul, wrote alſo to the magiſtrates, ſenate, and people of Epheſus, to the ſame effect. " The Jews of Aſia, " ſays he, as I was upon the bench in a court " of juſtice at Epheſus, in the † Ides of Febru- " ary laſt paſt, gave me to underſtand that " Auguſtus Ceſar and Agrippa had granted " them the freedom of their own ways and " ceremonies, and liberty to diſpoſe of their " firſt-fruits as they thought fit among them- " ſelves; and ſo to carry the money to Jeru- " ſalem, without any interruption or controul, " and there to dedicate it to the temple of the " high God. So they made their application " to me, ſays he, for a ratification of theſe " privileges. This is therefore to inform you, " that I do abſolutely ſubſcribe to the reſolu- " tion and determination of Ceſar and Agrippa; " and I do farther require, that no trouble or " vexation be given them in any ſort what- " ſoever, either to diſtract or to diſappoint " them in the peaceable exerciſe of theſe im- " munities."

WE have the rather cited theſe inſtances and preſidents, to ſhew the Greeks upon the peruſal of theſe papers, the honour that has been done us by antiquity, and the privileges in matter of cuſtom, diſcipline, and worſhip, that have been from time to time allow'd us by the ſovereign powers, even to the degree of tolerating our religion itſelf, in the ſervice of the true God. And I do the more inculcate theſe notices and hints, becauſe I would ſoften ſtrangers, and deface, if poſſible, the impreſſions of a moſt unreaſonable averſion and prejudice. It is no new thing, for whole nations, as well as particular places, to change humours and manners; but juſtice is with all people, and in all times and places, evermore the ſame, a bleſſing that extends indifferently even to Greeks and Barbarians, the very reaſon and foundation of all our laws; ſo that if we do but maintain them ſacred, that virtue alone will both endear us, and make us friends to all mankind; wherefore it ſhould be my requeſt to the whole world, that people would not hate one another for differing in the way of living, ſo long as they agree in the main end and buſineſs of life. Virtue, in fine, is common to all men, and human ſociety can never be happy without it. But I ſhall return now to my text.

HEROD had ſquander'd away vaſt ſums of money both at home and abroad; and hearing that his predeceſſor Hyrcanus had fetch'd three * thouſand talents of ſilver out of David's ſepulchre, and that there was enough left behind there to anſwer any occaſion whatſoever: theſe thoughts poſſeſs'd his mind a long time before he could come to any reſolution upon it. But at laſt, taking ſome few of thoſe he could beſt truſt along with him, he convey'd himſelf by night into the ſepulchre; but with all care imaginable to conceal it from the people. He found a world of rich plate and veſſels, both gold and ſilver, and took it away with him; but for the ready money that he expected, there was none to be found; for Hyrcanus, it ſeems, had been before-hand with him. This ſucceſs however, ſuch as it was, gave him an encouragement to make a ſtricter ſearch: ſo he advanced farther in, till he came to the very coffins where the bodies of Solomon and David were depoſited. The ſtory ſays, that he loſt two of his guards there by a flaſh of fire that broke out of the receſs, which was interpreted as a judgment upon the temerity of the undertaking. The prodigy put Herod into ſuch a fright, that in a fit both of terror and of conſcience, he quitted his deſign; and Herod rifles divers ſepulchres, of plate and veſſels; but finds no ready money.

Two of his guards conſum'd by fire in the ſacrilegious attempt.

to expiate in ſome meaſure for the ſacrilege, he erected a moſt ſumptuous monument of marble to bar up the very entrance into the ſepulchre. Nicolaus an hiſtorian of thoſe times, makes mention of this work; but ſays nothing of the king's adventure, which he look'd upon to be ſo impious and diſhonourable, that he choſe rather to ſuppreſs it; for being cotemporary with the king, and writing his own ſtory to his face, he was to ſpeak only pleaſing things that might redound to his glory, without ever ſo much as touching upon his failings. And the courſe he took was either to palliate and diſguiſe his moſt notorious and extravagant cruelties, or in ſome caſes, perchance, intirely to ſuppreſs them. How does he colour the murder of Mariamne, and the horrid indignities put upon her two ſons, with a brand of incontinency in the one, and of a practice upon the life of their father in the other! and this is his way throughout, to elevate to the skies, what the king did well, and either to paſs over or extenuate what he did amiſs. But he has this to ſay for himſelf, however, that he wrote panegyrick rather than hiſtory; and not ſo much for the information of poſterity, as for the gratifying of his patron. But for my own part now, having in my veins the royal blood of the Aſamonæan family, and the dignity likewiſe of the prieſthood, I have no more to do but to report matters plainly as I find them, with all reverence to the deſcendants of that prince; but by their leave yet, with a greater reſpect to truth: for I would not willingly blaſt the reputation of my character with one falſe word.

Herod walls up the paſſage, upon this judgment.

Herod and his family puniſhed for the ſacrilege.

FROM the time that Herod broke in ſacrilegiouſly upon this ſepulchre, things went ſtill croſſer and croſſer in his family, whether upon a judicial vengeance upon that part of it that was before ill affected, or by the calamity of a ſeaſon that look'd ſo like the puniſhment of a flagitious wickedneſs. The fewd was a kind of civil war in the houſe, and carry'd on by ſome ſort of competition, betwixt outrage and calumny. But the maſterpiece of the whole ſtory was the artifice and hypocriſy of Antipater; who at the ſame time while he was on the one hand ſuborning of people to aſperſe and vilify his brothers, acted the part himſelf, on the other hand, of an advocate with Herod to defend them: under this diſguiſe the better to ſecure their ruin. Antipater wrought ſo far upon the king by theſe wiles, that he look'd upon him as the only zealous friend in the world that took care of him. Inſomuch that he recommended his chief miniſter Ptolemy, to adviſe with Antipater ſtill, about the ſtate of the government; who immediately conſulting with the mother, did every thing according to their own pleaſure; ſo that the king's love, or hatred, was managed for the better or the worſe, according as it ſerv'd their intereſt.

The artifice and hypocriſy of Antipater.

ALEXANDER and Ariſtobulus, on the other ſide, being men of honour and ſpirit, reſented this way of proceeding beyond all patience, to ſee themſelves degraded ſo much below their birth, and trampled upon by their inferiors; and their wives labour'd under the ſame paſſions too; for there was no love loſt

* Three thouſand Hebrew talents weighed three hundred forty two thouſand one hundred and eighty ſeven Pounds ſix ounces, and their value in ſilver amounted to one million twenty ſix thouſand five hundred and ſixty two Pounds ten ſhillings of our money.

betwixt Glaphyra, Alexander's wife, and the daughter of the king of Cappadocia: betwixt her, I ſay, and Salome; whom the other mortally hated, both out of the love ſhe bore her husband, and out of a womaniſh ſpirit to ſee her daughter that was marry'd to Ariſtobulus, ſit upon the ſame level with herſelf.

THERE happened likewiſe at the ſame time, another unlucky circumſtance, that engaged Pheroras, the king's brother, in the controverſy, and it was improv'd, in the concluſion, to a high degree of jealouſy and hatred. Herod made an offer to Pheroras of his daughter in marriage; who being deſperately in love with his own maid, prefer'd her embraces, and rejected the propoſal. The king could not but lay this refuſal to heart, eſpecially from a brother that he had been ſo kind to, even to the degree of ſharing his government with him. But, in ſhort, finding himſelf ſo ill-requited, the honour he offer'd him rejected, his good intentions diſappointed, and that there was no way of bringing him to reaſon, he marry'd this daughter upon it, to the ſon of Phaſael, his elder brother. Some time after Herod ſuppoſing his brother's love might be cool'd, went to Pheroras once again, and when he had reprov'd him ſufficiently about the affront of his former repulſe, as a freſh inſtance of his affection, he made yet another offer of his other daughter Cypras. Pheroras went preſently upon this propoſal to adviſe with Ptolemy about it; who told him, that if he were not a madman, he would cloſe with his brother, and not hazard his fortune as well as his quiet, in the loſs of the king's favour, which would make him an enemy inſtead of a friend; and all this for the poor ſatisfaction of a ſcandalous amour: Pheroras could not but approve this, and he embrac'd the counſel; begg'd the king's pardon; and diſcharging himſelf of the firſt woman, by whom he had one child, he promis'd the king within a month to marry the other daughter; binding himſelf by an oath to make good his word, and never to have any thing more to do with her he had now renounced. In this while, Pheroras relaps'd into his old fit of dotage again, took the former woman home to him; and when the month was expir'd, without any regard to his oaths and promiſes, moſt ſhamefully broke faith with his brother. The provocation of this affront, put Herod into ſo violent a paſſion, that he could not forbear laſhing out into intemperances of language againſt his brother: There were makebates enough to lay hold of this, and to heighten Herod's diſpleaſure by ſuggeſting lyes and ſcandals. So it was, in fine, that there ſcarce paſs'd a day, or an hour, without bringing ſome new trouble or other into the family, by the inflaming of piques and jealouſies, and ſetting the neareſt, and the tendereſt of friends and relations, one againſt another. Nay, ſo deadly was the rancorous hatred of Salome to the ſons of Mariamne, that ſhe would not ſuffer her daughter to enjoy ſo much as the conjugal converſation of her own husband Ariſtobulus; but was ſtill pumping her to blab, and divulge the moſt ſacred privacies that paſs'd betwixt them; or if they happen'd at any time to be but a little out of humour one with another, as that's a common caſe, ſhe never fail'd of blowing the coal, and doing her part toward the enflaming of the diſcontent. By this means ſhe div'd into all her ſecrets; and as ſhe ſaw occaſion, endeavour'd all ſhe could to make a breach betwixt the wife and the husband. She got out of her what the brothers ſaid of Mariamne, when they were by themſelves: how diſreſpectfully they talk'd of their father; and how they threaten'd all the ſons he had by other women, if ever they came to the throne, to make ſcribes and country town clerks of them, as a profeſſion that beſt ſuited with their way of education: and ſhe had heard them talk further, ſhe ſaid, that if ever they ſhould ſee any of Herod's wives ſet out with their mother Mariamne's jewels, they would, without any more ado, put them into ſackcloth, and lay them up where they ſhould never ſee the ſun. Salome, by this, thought the time long till the king had the ſtory, wherefore ſhe haſten'd to carry it to him herſelf. It gave him no ſmall diſturbance upon the main; but inclining yet to try if he could ſet things right by fair means, rather than by foul. In one word, they ply'd him ſo hard with infuſing continual jealouſies and whimſeys into his head, that they brought him at laſt to take a delight in liſtening after tales and calumnies; and to ſuch a degree of credulity, that he believed whatever was told him; but contenting himſelf however, for the preſent, with a ſevere rebuke to his ſons; and upon their anſwer he came pretty well to himſelf again.

Herod offers his daughter to Pheroras, and he refuſes her.

He offers him his other daughter Cypras.

Pheroras breaks his oath and promiſe.

Salome hates the children of Mariamne mortally.

She makes a ſpy of her own daughter againſt her husband.

The private confidences of man and wife betray'd.

BUT this was not the worſt on't yet; for Pheroras took an occaſion to inform Alexander, the husband of Glaphyra, that Salome had told him Herod was fallen ſo paſſionately in love with Glaphyra, that he could not be quiet for it. The young man, that was naturally of a jealous temper was ſo gaul'd at this diſcourſe, that whatever Herod did, day after day, in favour of Glaphyra, for his ſon's ſake, was ſtill interpreted in confirmation of his ſuſpicion. This paſſion, in ſhort, had made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion upon him, that when he could bear the importunity of it no longer, he went directly to his father, with tears in his eyes, and told him what he had heard from Pheroras. If he was outrageous before, this made him ſtark-mad, to ſee himſelf ſo baſely calumniated for the foulſt of crimes, and this out of his own inſenſible family too, in return for all the good offices he had done them. In this heat, he ſent for Pheroras, and angry reproved him in terms to this effect.

A ſtory from Pheroras to Alexander, of Herod's being in love with Glaphyra.

Alexander grows jealous upon it, and tells Herod the ſtory.

Herod calls Pheroras to account about it.

" How ſhould it come into thy head or mine, (ſays he) thou vileſt, and moſt ungrateful of mortals, to report, or but ſo much as to think me guilty of ſo horrid a wickedneſs! but the malice of the deſign is only this, under the colour of an office of confidence to my ſon, to incite him to ſome treacherous practice upon the life of his father; for what ſon that were not reſtrain'd by a ſpecial providence, would put up ſuch an indignity from a father, unreveng'd! where's the difference, at this rate, betwixt the putting of a jealouſy in the head of this ſon of mine, or a ſword in his hand againſt his own father? but what would you be at? for you hate both alike; and at the ſame time, with fair words to my face, make the lewdeſt wretch in nature of me behind my back.

" back. Go, go, thou moſt unthankful of " men, to ſo tender a brother; but I ſhall " rather deliver you up to your conſcience " for your tormentor, and endeavour to be " better than my relations, in not returning " evil for good, after your example; but, on " the contrary, good for evil!"

Pheroras ſays he had it of Salome. Salome denies and outfaces it.

THIS was ſo clear a caſe againſt Pheroras, that he had no way to come off but by diſcharging himſelf upon Salome, and laying the ſcandal at her door, as the original of the ſtory. Salome happening to be then preſent, the better to be believed, with a compos'd hypocritical face broke out into violent exclamations, " That it was all a lye, and only a ma- " licious practice and conſpiracy, for the tak- " ing away of her life in revenge of the zeal " and affection ſhe had expreſs'd for the ſav- " ing of the king's; who, at that inſtant (ſhe " ſaid) was in greater danger than ever. Phe- " roras, (ſays ſhe) abhors me to death; for " it was I that preſs'd him to turn off the " ſtrumpet he doated on, and marry the king's " daughter. This is the thing he hates me " for, (ſays ſhe) tearing her hair, and beating " her breaſt, with a rage ſo done to the life, " that never was a part better acted." Pheroras was all this while in the greateſt pain imaginable, betwixt two inextricable difficulties; for he could neither deny what he told to Alexander, nor prove what Salome ſaid to him. The diſpute, however, continued a good while; but the king grew ſick on't at laſt, and being now late, ſent them both away, and went to ſupper; Herod highly commending the moderation of his ſon, and the generous candour of his nature, in coming ſo frankly to him with the ſtory. This quarrel brought Salome under the ſcandal of being thought the authoreſs of this calumny, and the king's wives were ready enough to ſet it forward; for the woman being ſour, fickle, and of an uneven temper, kind and croſs by fits, as the toy took her, they did not like her humour at all; and in this diſguſt, they were perpetually ringing ſomething or other in Herod's ear againſt her; and this diſpoſition was aſſiſted by an accident as pat as could be to their purpoſe.

Salome ſuſpected for the authoreſs of this report.

Obodas, king of Arabia. Syllæus his prime miniſter.

OBODAS was at that time king of Arabia; a lazy ſlothful prince, that minded nothing but his eaſe. Now there was one Syllæus, who was his chief miniſter of ſtate, a man of ſenſe and addreſs, in the prime of his years, and a well-made graceful perſon. This ſame Syllæus, coming to Herod about buſineſs, as he was once at ſupper with him, and Salome in the company, he took a particular liking to this princeſs: inſomuch, that hearing ſhe was a widow, he ventur'd to make her ſome kind of overture toward marriage. The woman finding herſelf every day more and more uneaſy with her brother, and being well enough pleas'd with the young man's perſon; all theſe things conſidered, was not averſe to the propoſal: and upon further converſation, and better acquaintance, (for they were often together) people came to take notice by their countenances, and twenty little love-tricks, that the amour advanc'd on both ſides. This went all to the king; and the women made themſelves merry with it; but Herod was not yet ſatisfy'd with what the women told him, till he ſet Pheroras for a ſpy upon them; who brought him word, that by what he gather'd from the intelligence of looks and ſigns, there was undoubtedly a reciprocal paſſion betwixt them. Herod taking it now for granted, the Arabian went his way home again. Within ſome two or three months after this, he returned upon the ſame errand, and treated with Herod himſelf about the match; enlarging upon it how advantageous it would be to his intereſt, not only in the point of commerce, but in reſpect alſo of his own right and pretenſions to the government of the whole country, a conſiderable part of which he was in poſſeſſion of already. The king immediately put the queſtion to his ſiſter, whether ſhe had a mind to marry or not; who without any heſitation anſwer'd in the affirmative. This was told Syllæus; and that if he would turn Jew, he might have her: but otherwiſe by law of the country, it could not be. Syllæus reply'd on the other hand, that if he ſhould relinquiſh his religion, the Arabians would ſtone him to death; and ſo the treaty broke off. Pheroras took occaſion from hence to be ſeveral times hinting to the king how Salome expos'd her reputation; but the king's wives carry'd the liberties ſhe took with the Arabian, to the degree of incontinence itſelf.

Herod ſets a ſpy upon them.

And he is convinc'd of the amour.

Syllæus goes back again; and returning ſoon after, propoſes the match

Salome conſents; but they break off upon religion.

HEROD was now half reſolved, at the importunity of Salome, to marry his own daughter, that Pheroras had refuſed, to a ſon of hers that ſhe had by Coſtobarus. But Pheroras defeated the deſign, by telling him that the young man would never forgive his father-in-law the death of his father, and adviſed him rather to give her to his own ſon that was to ſucceed him in the government. The king took his counſel; gave her a * hundred talents for her portion, and all paſt miſunderſtandings with Pheroras were forgiven and forgotten.

A match betwixt Pheroras's ſon and Herod's daughter.

BUT this was ſo far yet from compoſing the diſorders of Herod's family, that they went every day from bad to worſe, and from diſhoneſt ſhameful beginnings, to tragical ends. Herod had three handſome eunuchs to attend him, for whom he had a mighty kindneſs; one ſerved him in the quality of a cupbearer; another, in the office of a ſteward, and a third waited upon him in his bed-chamber; over and above, that he made further uſe of them in matters of ſtate. Some body had told Herod, it ſeems, that Alexander had been tampering with theſe young men, for a large ſum of money, to betray him. Upon this information, they were put to the torture to make them diſcover what communication had paſs'd betwixt them. They acknowledg'd they had been together; but for any treaſonous deſign Alexander had upon the life of his father, they knew nothing of it. The torments being of Antipater's faction, preſs'd them ſtill harder and harder, till at laſt in the tolerable anguiſh of their pains, they extorted this declaration from them, (viz.) " That Alexander hated his father mortally,

The confeſſion of three eunuchs againſt Alexander.

" and did what he could to ſeduce them from " their allegiance to him, as a prince that was " now good for nothing, old, and out of date: " only he cover'd his decays the beſt he could " with paint and artifice. Now if they would " come over to him, it ſhould be his care, " (he ſaid) to ſee them prefer'd in a very " ſhort time; for the government was not " only to deſcend to him in courſe, but mat- " ters were ſo laid, it was not in his father's " power to diſappoint it: for over and above " the prerogative of his title, every thing " was ripe and ready for the putting of him " into the poſſeſſion of his pretences. He had " made a great party among the officers of " the army, (he ſaid) and the king's friends, " who were all reſolved to ſtand by him " with their lives and fortunes." This confeſſion put Herod into a fit of rage, and trembling, both at once; for there was contempt and menace in it; and in the diſtraction of an uncertainty, how to behave himſelf for fear of an immediate ſurprize, he could not reſolve, upon the ſudden, whether to avoid the danger, or to encounter it. But the reſult at laſt was this, to manage his buſineſs by ſpies and informers, without the pomp of any publick enquiries. Wherever he ſuſpected, he conſequently hated; and he ſuſpected thoſe too that did not deſerve it, as well as thoſe that did; for his own ſecurity depended upon it. And there was no end of this jealouſy neither, for the nearer the relations, the greater was his apprehenſion of them, as perſons that had it more in their power to do him miſchief. As for thoſe he never had any thing to do withal, the leaſt word of an informer's mouth was certain death to them; for he could never think himſelf ſafe while they were living. The condition of his domeſticks was yet more to be pitied than all the reſt, for they had no way to ſave their own lives, but by calumniating their fellows; by which practice, even when they ſucceeded in it, they drew upon themſelves ſuch an envy and deteſtation, that they ſeldom fail'd of being paid in their own coin, and of receiving the ſame meaſure themſelves that they had meted to others. And ſo in the caſe of private grudges, they inform'd againſt one another by turns, and were noos'd in their own ſnares. Not but that the king was now and then touch'd in conſcience, for putting ſo many to death without trial and conviction; but this did not yet hinder him from doing the ſame thing over again. He was ſo fair however in the concluſion, as after the deſtruction of ſo many innocents, to do juſtice at laſt upon the falſe witneſſes themſelves.

Herod's jealouſy ſpares neither friend nor foe.

The falſe witneſſes themſelves brought to juſtice at laſt.

THE court was at this time in ſuch a fright and conſternation, that many of the king's moſt intimate friends were baniſh'd his palace and preſence; and thoſe in the firſt place that were generally reputed to have merited beſt at his hands; as Andromachus, and Gemellus (two favourites of an antient ſtanding) were turn'd off among the reſt. Theſe miniſters had ſerv'd the king both abroad and at home, in embaſſies and counſels; the careful education of his ſons; and in places, in fine, of the greateſt confidence and truſt. He renounc'd Andromachus for the kindneſs Alexander ſhew'd to his ſon Demetrius, and then he diſcarded Gemellus, for the love he bore to Alexander; having been a kind of governour and tutor to him, as well as a companion in his travels to Rome. Nay, in all likelihood, he would not have ſtopt here neither, if the popular reputation of the perſons had not kept him in ſome ſort of awe; ſo that he contented himſelf with putting them out of office, and ſending them away, that he might be the more at liberty in their abſence, to exerciſe his rage and cruelties without controul.

Andromachus and Gemellus baniſh'd.

THE firſt, and the chief author of all this miſery was Antipater, who finding Herod fearful and ſuſpicious, inſinuated himſelf into his counſels, and apply'd to his humour; enflaming him to fierceneſs and cruelty; and inculcating this maxim to him, as a ſtate-maſterpiece, to make ſure of all thoſe that had it in their power to do him any miſchief. And this was the way that Herod went to work; for when he had expell'd Andromachus, and the reſt of his friends that had the honeſty and courage to be plain and free with him, he put all the confidents of Alexander to the queſtion, concerning treaſonous plots and commotions, who dy'd upon the torture, having nothing to confeſs. This generous conſtancy being taken for obſtinacy, they encreaſed the torments; in great admiration, that with all this extremity, they were not able to extort ſo much as the ſhadow of one diſloyal thought. Now Antipater craftily took the matter by another handle, and made it a point of honour in them, rather to deny the truth in queſtion, than to violate the faith and truſt repoſed in them by their friends and maſters. So that he was for putting more and more ſtill to the torture, making no doubt, as he pretended, but ſome or other of them would confeſs at laſt; and in the end one faint-hearted wretch, that ſhrunk under the pain, declared that upon occaſion of people's commending Alexander for a perſon of a goodly ſtature, an excellent markſman, and other laudable qualities, he had heard him ſay divers times, that theſe natural advantages were rather misfortunes to him than benefits; for his father bore him ſuch an envious hatred for them, that when they were walking together, he was fain to go ſtooping, that he might not ſeem the taller of the two, or ſo tall as he really was: and ſo at the chace, he durſt not ſtrike the mark; for his father he knew could not endure to ſee him do any thing well, or to hear him well ſpoken of. Upon this pretended diſcovery, they reſpited the poor man's torment, and ſo he went on with his tale, " How Alexander and Ariſtobulus enter'd in- " to a conſpiracy once to take away their fa- " ther's life, when he was abroad a hunting: " and if they ſucceeded, Alexander was to fly " to Rome to demand the ſucceſſion." There were certain letters alſo produced from him to his brother, complaining of his father for giving away two * hundred talents a year in land, to Antipater. Herod look'd upon all this together to be a ſufficient evidence to confirm the ſuſpicion he had of his children. And upon this he fell into another raging fit againſt his ſon Alexander, and order'd him to be caſt into priſon, and loaded with chains upon it: Not that he himſelf gave much credit to what he heard, for what intereſt could they have to deſtroy their father? Or what ſhould they go to Rome for, after the commiſſion of ſo notorious a parricide? There might be ſomewhat, I confeſs, in the turbulent and childiſh heats among the young ambitious people about Antipater, and that was all. But in the mean time, however, Alexander being impriſon'd, and no body knowing for what, Herod could not think himſelf ſafe, without giving the world ſome better ſatisfaction in the reaſon of it: So that he put divers of Alexander's confidents and friends of the beſt quality, firſt to the torture, and afterwards to death, the better to colour the pretence of Alexander's guilt; but they confeſs'd nothing. While the palace was in an uproar, and nothing to be ſeen or heard of in it but tumult, terror, and torments, a certain young man that had been tortur'd it ſeems beyond his ſtrength and reſolution, gave information, how "Alexander had written "to ſome friends of his at Rome, to inform "Ceſar that there was a conſpiracy againſt "him, and that if he were but ſent for thi-"ther, he could diſcover it; for that his fa-"ther had abandon'd the intereſt of Rome, "to treat with Mithridates, the king of the "Parthians; adding withal, that there was a "poiſon in readineſs that he had gotten pre-"par'd at Aſcalon." This invention had ſuch credit with Herod, that he preſently order'd the ſtricteſt enquiry after the poiſon that could be made; but there was no ſuch thing to be found. The paraſites he had all this while about him, comforted him in his calamity, pretending to juſtify the ſobriety of his conduct.

ALEXANDER was ſo far from ſinking under this oppreſſion, that he diſdain'd to advance ſo much as one word, either by way of denial or defence, partly to exaſperate his father by the contempt of theſe outrages, and partly to put him out of countenance for giving an ear to ſuch ſilly and inſignificant ſcandal: Or otherwiſe, in caſe he ſhould go on to ſwallow lyes and forgeries at that credulous rate, he took up a reſolution to involve him and his whole family in the moſt calamitous perplexities. He ſent him four pieces in writing, wherein he gave him to underſtand, that he ſhould not need to torture any more people upon interrogatories, to learn the truth of things; for he did aſſure him there was a conſpiracy againſt his life; and that Pheroras, and ſeveral others that he leaſt ſuſpected were in the bottom of it. He told him how Salome ſtole to bed to him one night, and lay with him, whether he would or not; telling him likewiſe, that in ſhort, all people were agreed upon the abſolute neceſſity of taking him off; for there was no freedom or happineſs to be expected without it: Naming Ptolemy, and Sapinnius (the two men of the world that he moſt confided in) among the conſpirators. The court was by this time rather a mad-houſe, or a medly of wild beaſts, than a ſociety of reaſonable men; the greateſt friends in nature one day, and tearing out one another's throats the next: And no time or place left for argument or proof; for the puniſhment went before the judgment. Some were put in chains; others kill'd outright, and the reſt in a deſpair more painful than death itſelf. There was nothing to be ſeen in the palace of what it had been; but inſtead of the gaiety and ſplendor of it in former times, there was little now but heavineſs of heart and inconſolable ſorrows. Nay, Herod himſelf was as weary of his own life, as he had made other people of theirs; for there was no body he could truſt; his preſent ſtate was miſerable, and no proſpect before him, but of confuſion and horror. He never took any reſt either ſleeping or waking for hideous frights and imaginations. One while he would fancy his ſon with a dagger at his heart; another while ſomewhat elſe; and in one word, he was upon the whole matter little better than a madman.

Archelaus moves Herod to be friends with Alexander, who palliates the matter with an artificial mediation. Pheroras asks Herod pardon, and all is well. Archelaus in great eſteem with Herod. He goes to Rome, and reconciles Titus to Archelaus.

WHILE Herod lay in this anguiſh and torment of thought, Archelaus the king of Cappadocia, reckon'd it the part, both of a father and of a friend, to make him a viſit, and to do the beſt offices he could toward the effecting a reconciliation betwixt Herod and his daughter and ſon-in-law; for whom he had an exceeding tenderneſs and compaſſion. Matters went very ill, he heard; and upon his arrival, he found them rather worſe than he imagin'd; but he thought it would not be proper however, to pick a downright quarrel with him for his temerity, and for taking ſo many ſenſeleſs ſhams as he did, upon truſt. A conteſt he thought would look like a reproach, and do more hurt probably than good; ſo that inſtead of falling upon Herod himſelf, he laid the blame upon Alexander; "For "the king (he ſaid) had done nothing but "what was honourable and juſt; and that for "his part, he would diſſolve the marriage, "and never own Glaphyra again for his "daughter, if he ſhould find that ſhe was "privy to the plot, and did not diſcover it. This paſſionate pretence and zeal of Archilaus, for the vindication of Herod, brought him, upon ſecond thoughts, to a more conſiderate ſenſe of what he had done, and by little and little to the ſoftneſs of a father again. In this merciful humour, the king, that before took any man for his enemy that gave Alexander a good word, fell now directly into tears to hear Archelaus ſpeak againſt him, begging of him that he would not break off the match, and tranſport himſelf to that degree for the folly of a young man. When the Cappadocian had now brought Herod into a more practicable temper, he palliated the miſtake as well as he could, by laying the fault in ſome meaſure upon evil counſel, and the company he kept. "He might be tractable, indeed (he "ſaid) but truly he never found him mali-"cious. He might perhaps be miſled and "cor-

Now Pheroras was come by this time ſufficiently to underſtand how deſperately he had loſt himſelf in the opinion of Herod; and reflecting upon it that no man was ſo proper for him to make uſe of as Archelaus, he made his addreſs to him in mourning, and with the humility of a moſt penitent ſuppliant, implor'd his interceſſion for him to the king. Archelaus was not wanting to him in any matter of reſpect, but he told him withal, that Herod's diſpleaſure was not ſo eaſily remov'd as he might imagine: But if he were to be his adviſer, he ſhould rather go and humble himſelf to his brother, and owning himſelf the cauſe of all the calamities of the family, crave his pardon. Such a confeſſion might perhaps * work upon him, and make way for a mediation. He follow'd the advice, and it ſucceeded both ways; for Alexander, beyond all expectation, was diſcharg'd of his pretended crime; and Herod at the inſtance of Archelaus, reconcil'd to his brother. Herod was now ſo ſenſible of the obligations he had to Archelaus in his extremity, that he look'd upon him as the beſt friend he had in the world: The other returning into Cappadocia, charg'd with rich preſents, and no leſs ſatisfaction in the ſucceſs of his voyage. They were now agreed upon it that Herod ſhould go to Rome to inform Ceſar of the preſent ſtate of his family, having written formerly to him upon the ſame ſubject. Saturnius and Volumnius order ſatisfaction to be given to Herod.*

In Herod's abſence the Trachonites revolt to the Arabians.

WHEN Herod had been at Rome, and was come back again, there broke out a war with the Arabians, upon this occaſion. The inhabitants of Trachon (a province that Ceſar took away from Zenodorus, and gave to Herod) when they could no longer exerciſe their old trade of free-booting, betook themſelves to planting and tillage; a courſe of life that yielded them neither ſatisfaction nor profit. But yet for a while, at firſt, Herod, to his honour, kept them in pretty good order, and without any barbarous inroads upon their neighbours; but upon the king's going into Italy to accuſe Alexander, and recommend Antipater; and a rumour ſpread at the ſame time, of the death of Herod, the Trachonites revolted, and betook themſelves to their former courſe of life; but they were quickly broken and ſuppreſs'd by the king's troops; only forty of the heads of them made their eſcapes and fled into Arabia; where Sylleus (who had not as yet digeſted the refuſal of Salome) gave them entertainment and a ſafe retreat, with a ſtrong, and a well fortify'd place for their habitation: from whence they did not only infeſt Judea, and Cele-Syria, and carry away booty and cattle into their holes, but they committed all theſe outrages, without oppoſition or controul. When Herod found at his return from Rome, what ſpoil the robbers had made, and that he was ty'd up from meddling with them ſo long as they were under the Arabians protection, the affront ſo highly provok'd him, that without any more ado he preſently made an incurſion into Trachon, where he put whole families of theſe people to the ſword. This tranſported the reſt into ſuch a rage, being obliged by a law of their own country not to paſs over ſuch an indignity unrevenged, that, in contempt of all danger and oppoſition, they would never let Herod be free from the vexation of their perpetual incurſions. Under theſe circumſtances, he apply'd himſelf to Ceſar's governors of thoſe provinces, Saturnius and Volumnius, to deliver up thoſe vagabonds into his hands. This complaint made them madder and madder: ſo that getting about a thouſand of them into a body, they ranged up and down in parties; ravaging town and country, and killing whatever they could come at: ſo that, in fine, theſe encounters had the face rather of a war than of a ſcuffle; Herod inſiſting upon the delivering up of the thieves, and the repayment of the ſixty ‡ talents (ſome time ſince due) which Herod by the hand of Sylleus lent to Obodas. Sylleus, who had now uſurped the government of Obodas to himſelf, flatly deny'd any of the thieves to be in Arabia, and artfully delay'd the payment of the money, till Saturnius and Volumnius order'd the full ſatisfaction of the debt, within the compaſs of thirty days; and that the fugitives ſhould be deliver'd up on both ſides. This article diſcover'd the fraud of Sylleus; for there was not ſo much as one Arabian that either upon the account of having committed robberies, or any other offence, had taken ſanctuary with Herod, but vaſt numbers of the robbers were found with the Arabians.

debt and for the article of delivering up the thieves. But finding the Arabians falſe and ſtubborn, he got leave of Saturnius and Volumnius, to attempt the recovery of his right by force. Having obtained their permiſſion, he fell with an army into Arabia, and in three days march'd ſeven ſtages. Coming at laſt to the caſtle, by name Repta, whither the robbers had withdrawn themſelves, he took it at the firſt attack, and then demoliſh'd the fortifications, without doing any other damage to the inhabitants. While this paſs'd, Nicebus the Arabian general march'd away to the ſuccour of his party, and brought it to an encounter, wherein a few of the Herodians were loſt; and five and twenty of the Arabians, together with their generals, ſlain upon the place, the remainder of them being ſcatter'd and put to flight. The king having now taken his revenge upon the thieves, he march'd with three thouſand Idumeans into Trachonitis, to keep the rovers there within compaſs. Herod ſent a narrative of this proceeding to the Roman governors alſo in Phenicia, giving them to underſtand, that he had done nothing without leave, in fighting with a party of rebellious Arabians: and this account upon a further enquiry, the governors found to be true.

THIS was the naked truth of the matter; but the Arabians report of it to Sylleus at Rome, as it was dreſs'd up in their way of amplification and diſguiſe, was quite another thing. Sylleus had already ſo far inſinuated himſelf, as to be perſonally known to Ceſar; and as he was walking before his palace, an expreſs brought him a packet; whereupon he ſhifted his clothes immediately, and in a mourning weed, with tears and lamentations, carry'd the ſad ſtory to Auguſtus: how Herod had enter'd Arabia with an army; overturn'd the government, and totally ruin'd the country; kill'd two thouſand five hundred noble Arabians upon the place, with his friend and kinſman Nicebus their general among the reſt; pillag'd Repta of a vaſt treaſure that was laid up there: and all this by the advantage Herod took of the weakneſs and neglect of Obodas, who had neither troops in readineſs to oppoſe him, nor a general in his abſence that was fit to command them. Sylleus ſaid further, that he ſhould never have undertaken this journey to Rome, but in confidence that Ceſar would provide for the publick peace of all his people; and that if he himſelf had been upon the place, Herod ſhould have paid dear for the undertaking. This unlucky buſineſs made Ceſar very uneaſy, and put him upon enquiring from one to another among Herod's friends as well as his own that came lately out of Syria, whether or no Herod had been any where with his army out of his own juriſdiction. When he ſaw this could not be deny'd, he took all the reſt for granted, and without any more ado immediately diſpatch'd a ſharp menacing letter to Herod, with a direction to this purpoſe; "Formerly to my friend, hereafter to "my ſubject." Sylleus wrote alſo to the Arabians at the ſame time. When they came to find by theſe letters, that Herod was in diſgrace with Ceſar, they grew ſo inſolent upon it, that there was no dealing with them. They would neither deliver up their malefactors, nor pay their debts; no, not ſo much as their rents, nor do any thing elſe, according to the rules of common faith and contract. The Trachonites made the ſame advantage of this occaſion too, againſt Herod's Idumean garriſons, by joining with the Arabian ravagers: committing all manner of outrages, and ſpoiling and pillaging, not ſo much for profit, as for revenge. But Herod having now offended Ceſar, was fain to diſpenſe with all this and more; for his courage as well as his credit fail'd him. He made two trials to juſtify his conduct by his embaſſadors; but Ceſar would not ſo much as ſee them the firſt time, nor take any notice of their buſineſs the next. Herod had a terrible apprehenſion of Sylleus all this while, who never fail'd of improving Ceſar's fears and diſtractions to his own benefit; for being ſtill within diſtance of making the beſt of opportunities, and finding him ductile and credulous, he could wind and turn him which way he pleas'd; beſide that he had far greater matters now in proſpect.

KING Obodas being by this time dead, Ænéas ſucceeded him by the name of Aretas: Sylleus doing all that was to be done by calumnies, court-bribes, and large promiſes to Auguſtus, toward the outing of him again, and engroſſing the power to himſelf. The thing that encourag'd him to this attempt, was the diſguſt that Ceſar had taken to Aretas, for entering upon the adminiſtration, without his privity and conſent. This new king complimented Ceſar by his embaſſadors, with letters and magnificent preſents; one above the reſt being a crown of gold of a prodigious value. Now theſe letters were in ſubſtance a flat accuſation of Sylleus for poiſoning his maſter Obodas, after the uſurping of his authority in his life-time: for debauching the wives of the Arabians, and taking up vaſt ſums of money to make way to his pretenſions. But Ceſar deny'd theſe ambaſſadors audience as well as Herod's; rejected their preſents, and ſent them away without having accompliſh'd what they came about. During this diſtemper, matters in Judea and Arabia went every day worſe than other: a general confuſion, and no body to compoſe it; one of the kings not being as yet eſtabliſh'd in his government, and the other as little maſter of his people; for Herod's condition was ſuch, that he could not defend himſelf without affronting Auguſtus: ſo that he lay under a kind of neceſſity of crouching and ſubmitting to all indignities. But being now brought to the laſt extremity, he took up a final reſolution of making the beſt intereſt he could to Ceſar by his friends, and trying the fortune of

The feud in Herod's family higher than ever.

HEROD's family was a houſe always divided againſt itſelf by inteſtine jealouſies, which are the plague of all courts; but the feud at this time ran much higher yet than ever, and it was upon this occaſion. "There was one Eurycles, a Lacedemonian; "a man nobly born, but of a peſtilent diſpo- "ſition; ſenſual and glorying to extremity; "but ſo artificial a diſſembler, that there was "nothing to be ſeen in him of either. This Eurycles makes an acquaintance with Herod.

"Eurycles made an acquaintance with Herod; enterchang'd preſents and other good "offices with him in the houſe of Antipater; "and by that means (being often together) "became familiarly acquainted with Alexander: and he would be often ſaying what "a wonderful friendſhip there was betwixt "him and Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, "and how great an honour he had for Glaphyra. So that under the ſemblance of the "moſt unconcerned and indifferent perſon in "nature, he lay upon the catch for every thing "that was ſaid or done, and never fail'd of "ſome pick-thank ſtory or other to carry "away with him. He had, in fine, ſo obliging a way of dividing his good humour, "that wherever he apply'd himſelf, he had "the faculty of making people believe that "he lov'd nothing elſe, and that it was only "for their ſakes and ſervice, if he had any "thing to do with others." By this addreſs he gain'd ſo far upon the affection and eſteem of Alexander, that he made choice of him for the ſingle confident of all his ſecrets, and the only man that he could ſafely truſt. So he diſcloſ'd to him the whole hiſtory of his misfortunes; the unkindneſs of his father, the death of his mother; Antipater's preference to his brothers in the good graces and affections of the king their father. This oppreſſion, he ſaid, was not to be endur'd; for the averſion was now come to that paſs, that he could neither eat nor talk with his children. Theſe ſecret grievances were ſafe, he thought, in the breaſt of a friend; but Eurycles however carry'd every word that paſs'd to Antipater.

Alexander makes Eurycles his Confident.

Eurycles carries the ſtory to Antipater and Herod.

"These are things (ſays he) that do not concern "me; and truly in matters of ſo dangerous "a conſequence, I cannot but adviſe you to "look to yourſelf, and to have a care of A- "lexander; for he is grown ſo confident, I "perceive, that he does not think it worth "his while to mince the matter; but with- "out any ſcruple throws out the very bot- "tom of his heart in words at length; and "the deſign he has upon the perſon of his fa- "ther." Antipater took this from Eurycles as ſo ſingular an inſtance of a reſpect and friendſhip, that he could not but acknowledge it with ſome very conſiderable preſents; and was prevail'd upon in the end to diſcourſe the matter with Herod. The king was ſo poſſeſs'd with a diſpoſition to believe any ill thing of Alexander, that what with that prejudice, and other ambiguous hints and circumſtances of diſcourſe, he contracted a hatred far more implacable than ever, as was given to underſtand ſoon after. Herod, in fine, made him a preſent of fifty * talents for the generous office he had done him. After this Eurycles went to Archelaus king of Cappadocia, extolling to the skies his ſon Alexander; and not forgetting the honour he had done himſelf upon ſeveral occaſions towards working a reconciliation betwixt him and his father. So that he got money of Archelaus too on the other hand; and carry'd it all off before the myſtery of this impoſture was detected. Eurycles was now returned into his own country, where he follow'd his old practices ſtill, till he was brought to juſtice upon the diſcovery, and baniſh'd Lacedemon.

Herod preſents him fifty talents for the good office.

Eurycles gets money out of Archelaus too.

Eurycles baniſh'd out of Lacedemon.

HEROD was not now of a humour as formerly, to content himſelf with lending an ear to calumnies againſt his ſons, and wait till the ſlanders were brought to him; but his ſuſpicions did the office of tale-bearers, and his particular ſcrutinies and enquiries ſav'd him the need and trouble of any other accuſation: not but that his ear was ſtill open to all informations againſt the brothers, let them come whence they would; neither was there any thing more welcome to him than thoſe ſtories: as he was told of one Evaratus of Cous, that was ſaid to be a confederate with Alexander.

Herod credulous and jealous.

IT was now come to a kind of ſtrife and competition, who ſhould do moſt miſchief; the worſe the office appear'd to the ſons, the more acceptable it was to the father; the care of the king's ſafety being the main pretence. The young princes fell at this time into the moſt deſperate calamity that had yet befallen them. There were two perſons, by name, Jucundus and Tyrannus, formerly of Herod's life-guard, and men of mighty credit with him for ſtrength and ſtature; but ſomewhat or other they had done that they were baniſh'd the court for. Alexander knowing theſe men to be very brave; took them into the guard of his perſon, and was a bountiful maſter to them. The king hereupon fell under jealous appre-

" They made a farther diſcovery of money " hid in the ſtable, and ſome of the king's " lances and darts deliver'd out by the maſter " of the game, to the ſervants of Alexander " by his own order."

The governor of Alexandrion put to the queſtion.

THE next man they put to the torture was the governor of Alexandrion, upon the queſtion of promiſing to receive the brothers into the caſtle, and of putting into their hands the king's treaſure that was there depoſited. The governour deny'd the charge; but his ſon declar'd it, and produc'd letters under Alexander's hand, as he pretended, to this effect:

Letters produc'd under Alexander's hand.

" You ſhall be ſure to hear of us, God wil- " ling, ſo ſoon as ever we are ready for you: " wherefore remember to take us into the " caſtle according to your promiſe." After theſe letters, Herod made no longer doubt of the conſpiracy; but Alexander all the while, inſiſted upon the whole ſtory to be only a contrivance of Antipater's, and a forgery of the ſecretary Diophantus; who was a man famous for counterfeiting other people's hands, and taken afterward in the very act, and puniſh'd for it.

Alexander affirms them to be counterfeits betwixt Antipater and Diophantus.

The brothers and the witneſſes againſt them brought to Jericho.

HEROD, being now at Jericho, after the tormenting the witneſſes, had them brought thither to accuſe his ſons before the people: where the multitude ſton'd them to death, and in this fury would have done as much for Alexander and Ariſtobulus, if Herod, by the means of Ptolemy and Pheroras, had not prevented it. They were however committed cloſe priſoners; ſpies ſet upon them to obſerve every thing they did or ſaid, and given over for dead men by every body elſe, as well as by themſelves.

The people ſtone the witneſſes, and would have ſton'd Alexander and Ariſtobulus if Ptolemy and Pheroras had not prevented it.

Ariſtobulus makes Salome his confident, and ſhe betrays him to Herod.

IN this extremity Ariſtobulus bethought himſelf of trying if he could work Salome his aunt and mother-in-law into ſome commiſeration of his diſtreſs, and to a juſt indignation for the author of it. " Madam, (ſays " he) can you think yourſelf ſafe under an " accuſation of holding a private intelligence " with Syllæus about the king's affairs in hopes " of marrying him?" Salome carried this to her brother, who in a rage forthwith commanded his ſons to be both bound, and laid apart one from another, and there to ſet down ſeverally in writing the particulars of their treaſonous deſign. They wrote as they were order'd, and both agreed in the ſame ſtory, that they were in no conſpiracy at all, and never ſo much as thought of any. They had ſome thoughts indeed of making an eſcape, they ſaid; for the life they led under perpetual jealouſies was worſe than death.

The brothers baffled, and contradict themſelves on cross information.

Mela, an ambaſſador from Archelaus to Herod.

THERE came at this time upon an embaſſy to Herod from Archelaus king of Cappadocia, one Mela, a perſon of eminent quality in that country. Herod was ſo fond of giving Archelaus to underſtand how ill he took ſomething at his hands, that he ſent for Alexander out of the priſon, and examin'd him over again in the preſence of Mela about his eſcape, whither he intended to go, and what he meant to do with himſelf. His anſwer was, that he propoſed to go to Archelaus, his father-in-law, upon his promiſe to convey him to Rome; and this is all, ſays he, that ever we were guilty of toward our father, whatever our calumniating adverſaries by falſe and feign'd reports may pretend to the contrary. He wiſh'd, he ſaid, that Tyrannus and his companions had but been a little more particularly examin'd; but it was Antipater's buſineſs to have them put out of danger of telling tales as ſoon as he could; and ſo upon the inſtigation of his inſtruments, they were hurried to death by the rabble.

Glaphyra examin'd alſo before Alexander and Mela.

HEROD, in this very inſtant, order'd Alexander and Mela to be carried to Glaphyra, and to have her put to the ſhift too to diſcover what ſhe knew of this abominable treaſon againſt Herod. They were no ſooner come within view of the princeſs, but upon the firſt ſight of her husband in chains, ſhe fell to tearing of her hair, with other violences upon herſelf; and into ſuch groans and paſſions, (the prince bearing her company alſo in her lamentations) that the people ſtood amaz'd and confounded, as if they had been planet-ſtruck at ſo ſurprizing a ſpectacle, without knowing what they did, or what they came for; but Ptolemy, at laſt, who had the guard of the prince, put it to him to know whether or no his wife was concern'd in his plot. " Why " you need never doubt that, ſays Alexander; " for wherever I am, ſhe is; a woman as " dear to me as my life and ſoul, and the beſt " wife, and the beſt mother both in one, upon " the face of the earth." " No, no, ſays the " princeſs, my conſcience acquits me; but " yet if my owning of a guilt might be any " caſe to my husband, I would frankly de- " clare it, though I were ſure to die with " that lye in my mouth." " No, no, again, " ſays Alexander, we are guilty of nothing " that's charg'd upon us, and we have de- " ſerv'd better things at their hands too, who " ſuſpect us. As to the thought we had of " getting away to our father, and thence to " Rome, if that be treaſon, we are both to " anſwer for it; and Glaphyra confeſs'd as " much." There was matter enough againſt Archelaus in this paſſage for a jealous head to work upon; ſo that Herod preſently ſent away Olympus and Volumnius with letters to him, with orders to call at Eleuſa, a city in Phenicia, and there to deliver them. They had farther inſtructions alſo to expoſtulate with him, upon a ſtrong preſumption of his being engaged with his ſons in the confederacy. Their orders were, after the delivery of theſe letters, to ſail forward for Rome; and in caſe they ſhould find by Nicolaus of Damaſcus, that Cæſar was any thing more tractable now than formerly, they were to preſent another expreſs to him with the proceedings againſt Alexander and Ariſtobulus, and copies of the evidence whereupon they were convicted. Archelaus in his anſwer own'd his willingneſs indeed to receive the young men, and that he undertook it as the beſt ſervice he could do both the father and ſons; for he was in truth afraid, leſt Herod, in that violent heat of wrath wrath and jealouſy, might put them to extremities; but affirming, upon the main, that he had no thought after all, either of ſending them to Ceſar, or of ſupporting them againſt their father.

Ceſar reconciled to Herod.

OLYMPUS and Volumnius, upon their coming to Rome, finding Ceſar reconciled to Herod, deliver'd their letters according to their order. They were framed by the addreſs of Nicolaus, who manag'd his commiſſion after this manner. So ſoon as ever he came to Rome, and to the emperor's palace, over and above the inſtructions that he had in charge, he drew up a formal accuſation againſt Sylleus, having gotten unqueſtionable proofs upon him from the Arabians themſelves (who were then miſerably divided) of the moſt flagitious practices that could be imagin'd; as the murder of Obodas, together with ſeveral of his relations, for one; and this was all to be made out undeniably by intercepted letters under his own hand. Now this Nicolaus, whoſe buſineſs it was to re-inſtate Herod in Ceſar's favour, took this providential diſcovery by the right handle, and improv'd it to the advantage of his principal. "If, ſays he, "I ſhould now begin my application with an "excuſe or defence of Herod, it would ſtrike "too point-blank upon the emperor; but if "I make my way to my matter by a previous "charge upon Sylleus, the king's juſtification "will fall in by-the-by." So that the cauſe being brought on, and a day appointed for the hearing, Nicolaus, with the aſſiſtance of the agents of Aretas, advanced an accuſation againſt Sylleus, as the murderer of his lord and maſter the king, and greater numbers of the Arabians; a man that took up extravagant ſums of money toward the embroiling of the publick peace; a profligate corrupter of women, both at Rome and in Arabia; beſide the moſt audacious affront of impoſing with lyes and calumnies upon Ceſar himſelf; as for inſtance, the account he gave of the action of Herod, which was all falſe from one end to the other. They proceeded upon the whole, till they came to the laſt article, and there Ceſar interpoſed with a command to Nicolaus to paſs over all the reſt, and ſpeak to that ſingle point. "Tell me, ſays the emperor, as "to that particular of Herod; did not he "come with an army into Arabia? Did he "not kill two thouſand five hundred men "there? Did he not carry away priſoners, "and ravage the country?" Nicolaus made anſwer, "That no body could give a better "account to theſe queſtions than himſelf; and "ſays he, there is little or nothing true in "this whole ſtory, as he has reported it. Neither, with ſubmiſſion, was Herod any Thing "to blame upon that occaſion." This was ſuch a ſurprize to Ceſar, that with very great attention he heard him forward; and ſo in order he told him firſt, "of five hundred * talents that Herod had lent him upon his "bond, the time of payment elaps'd, and "the law on his ſide, for the recovering of "the debt upon his country." He told further, "That this body of men that Sylleus calls an army, was no more than a "ſtrength barely competent for the putting of "a legal claim fairly in execution; and he "did not yet proceed raſhly neither, though "the time of payment being expir'd, he might "put the bond in ſuit when he pleaſed; but "he rather applied himſelf in the firſt place "to Saturninus and Volumnius, the governors "of Syria; and upon this appeal Sylleus in "their preſence at Beritum, obliged himſelf "upon his oath, by the fortune of Ceſar, to "make payment of the money to Herod, and "to deliver up all refugees to him in thirty "days. The time came, but Sylleus perform'd neither of the articles; ſo that Herod was forced to addreſs the governors "once again, who gave their opinion that he "might do himſelf right by diſtreſs. Now "this was the occaſion of his going into Arabia; and this the war that his adverſaries "have complain'd of with ſo much aggravation. But how can this be taken for a war, "that was done by the approbation and permiſſion of the governors, in proſecution of "a lawful right and compact, and after a "perjurious violation of a ſacred oath, both "in the name of the Gods and of Ceſar?"

Ceſar puts one ſingle queſtion to Nicolaus.

Nicolaus charges Sylleus, and defends Herod.

BUT to come now to the priſoners: "There "were firſt a matter of forty of the heads of "the Trachonite robbers, and after them a "great many more, that when they had broken into Judea, and made havock in the "country, fled from Herod into Arabia for "ſanctuary, where Sylleus did not only entertain them, though the common enemies "of mankind but gave them lands alſo and "protection, and went ſhares with them in "their booty. Theſe were the men now that "Sylleus bound himſelf by oath to reſtore, "together with the borrow'd money, within "the time prefix'd; and, Sir, I can with modeſty defy any mortal now to ſay that Herod took any other priſoners in Arabia than "theſe free-booters; nay, and there were ſeveral of theſe that eſcap'd too."

BUT now after this odious ſycophant ſtory of the priſoners, let Ceſar only vouchſafe to hear one impoſture more that is yet behind, and ſtill more ſcandalous and provoking than all the reſt. "I do affirm, that at the time "when we were invaded by a band of Arabians, and that ſome few of our men fell, "Herod in his own defence was forced to "make head againſt them; and upon defeating them, that their general Nacebus was "kill'd, and five and twenty of his people "with him, and not one man more. Now "this number Sylleus has enlarged, and made "every man a hundred." Ceſar was ſo mov'd at this Relation, that turning toward Sylleus, he ask'd him with an angry countenance, how many Arabians were ſlain in that action? He heſitated in his anſwer, and confeſs'd himſelf ſomewhat miſtaken in the number. After this they read the conditions of the bond, and the arbitrations of the governors, and the remonſtrances of the cities and towns, complaining of the robberies. Auguſtus being by this time fully inform'd in the whole matter, paſſed a ſentence of death upon Sylleus; took Herod into favour again, and not without acknowledgment of his miſtake, in hearkening to thoſe calumnies that tranſported him to

It came, in fine, to this, that Sylleus was order'd back into Arabia, there to pay his debts, and after that to be put to death. As for Aretas, his preſuming to uſurp royal authority, without the emperor's leave and conſent, ſtuck in Ceſar's ſtomach ſtill. This was a preſumptuous indignity that ſtill gaul'd him; inſomuch, that he was thinking to transfer the government of that province to Herod; but upon reading the letters which Olympus and Volumnius brought him, all full of invective and bitterneſs againſt his own ſons, Ceſar chang'd his purpoſe. Now their inſtructions were, in caſe they found Ceſar pacified, to deliver him thoſe letters, which they did accordingly; and Ceſar, upon the reading of them, conſidering his age, paſſion, and misfortunes, retracted his reſolution, and thereupon called for the ambaſſadors of Aretas, and gave them audience, with a check for the temerity of their maſter in aſſuming ſovereign power to himſelf upon his own account; and after this reprimand, to their great admiration, he accepted of their preſents, and confirm'd Aretas in his authority.

Ceſar writes Herod a condoling letter.

CESAR, upon this reconciliation, wrote Herod a condoling letter for the mortification he had in two ſuch ſons; giving him free leave and power to proceed againſt them as parricides, if he found them engag'd in ſo unnatural and impious a conſpiracy; but if there ſhould be no more in it at laſt, than the bare contrivance of an eſcape, it would become him, he ſaid, to content himſelf with ſome more moderate animadverſion. The advice he gave him upon the whole, was to call a council at Berytus, a place where there were a great many Romans; and there with the aſſiſtance of the governors of the neighbouring provinces, together with Archelaus, the king of Cappadocia, and men of quality, to hear and determine upon the whole matter, and to bring the point to a final deciſion. Alexander and Ariſtobulus ſtrangled at Sebaſte. The caſe of Herod and his ſons. Herod's inhuman cruelty.*

THIS letter of Ceſar's was joyful news to Herod, upon two accounts; firſt, as an aſſurance that he was in favour again; and ſecondly, as it left him at liberty to do with his ſons what he thought fit. It is remarkable, that though he had been formerly in the time of his proſperity a very ſevere father, he never appear'd in thoſe days yet to be raſh and bloody toward his children, where matter of life was the queſtion; but now upon this change and re-eſtabliſhment of his fortune (how it came to paſs I know not) he abandon'd himſelf to an outrageous and unbridled degree of hatred, more extravagant than ever. He ſent a ſummons to all the members of the convention that were to meet at Berytus, according to Ceſar's appointment, ſave only to Archelaus; perhaps out of an averſion to the man, or otherwiſe for fear he ſhould croſs him in his deſign. When they were all together according to the ſummons, he would not bring his ſons up to the council, but rather kept them a little way off at Platane, a village in Sidon, within diſtance of appearing, if they ſhould be call'd. The aſſembly being now met, Herod advanced into the council-chamber alone, and there deliver'd an accuſation againſt his ſons, in the preſence of a hundred and fifty perſons, but without any prologue to the ſtory upon the ſubject of his own misfortunes, or the neceſſity of ſuch a proceeding. It was a charge, in fine, of rage and bitterneſs, that very ill became the mouth of a father, and accompanied with words, countenance, and behaviour, that were all menacing and violent, and not without ſuſpicious ſymptoms even of a furious madneſs. His reaſonings were confuſed and inconſiſtent; his diſcourſe fluttering backward and forward, and dubious; no proofs produced for the guiding of the court; but every thing to be taken upon the credit of the accuſer, and the bench rather made parties than judges, and of counſel with the proſecutor againſt the priſoners. There were ſome letters of the young princes read, 'tis true; but not one ſyllable of treachery or malice in them. The crime was their conſulting how to get away, and here and there a word in them that imported ſome diſſatisfaction and offence; and when Herod came to that part of the letters, how did he exaggerate the matter with clamours and outcries, that there never was a clearer proof of a conſpiracy; backing thoſe exclamations alſo with oaths, that the very words were worſe to him than death. "I might, ſays he, inſiſt "upon the power I have received over my "own children, both from nature and from "Auguſtus; to ſay nothing of an expreſs pro-"viſion for it by the law of my own coun-"try, that if a ſtubborn and rebellious ſon "ſhall be accuſed by his parents, and they "lay their hands upon him, the men of the "city ſhall ſtone him with ſtones that he die. "But I ſhall yet rather decline my privileges "in this cauſe, and leave the matter to your "further conſideration, not as judge, whe-"ther it be ſo or no, in a caſe ſo indubita-"bly manifeſt; but to take your opinions "along with mine in the juſtification of the "ſentence; and for an inſtructive document "to poſterity, that ſuch exemplary impieties "ought not to eſcape unpuniſh'd."

Herod more outrageous in his proſperity than adverſity.

He ſummons a convention to Berytus.

Herod charges his ſons before an hundred and fifty perſons.

A charge of rage and bitterneſs.

A ſpeech upon the power of parents over children.

THE convention plainly perceiv'd by the king's violent and furious manner of expreſſing himſelf, the bitterneſs of his intentions; and, ſince he would not ſo much as ſuffer the brothers to ſpeak for themſelves, that the buſineſs was already reſolv'd upon, and hopeleſs; and ſo in a deſpondency they gave their votes that Herod might diſpoſe of his children as he pleaſed.

Saturninus for punishing, but not with death.

pleased. The first man that stood up was Saturninus, a person of consular authority, and one that had discharg'd many honourable commissions. "He was, 'tis true, for punishing "the prisoners, but not to death, he said; "for having children of his own, he was the "more sensible of the case; and would be "loth, after so many calamities as Herod "had endur'd already, to oppress him with "the heaviest of all at last." His three sons, as his deputies, spoke next in course, and gave the same sentence as their father; but Volumnius exclaimed, that nothing else but death would satisfy for so horrid a crime; and the majority, following his opinion, carried the question.

The sons of Saturninus give their vote with their father. Volumnius is for nothing less than death, and so they were condemn'd.

THE sentence was no sooner pass'd, but Herod went to Tyre, taking his sons along with him; and meeting Nicolaus in his return from Rome, he first gave him an account of what had pass'd at Berytus; and then ask'd him how affairs went at Rome, and what his friends there said of his sons. Nicolaus told him that every body blam'd them for their lewd practices, and said they deserv'd to be laid in chains for what they had done; nay, and to be put to death too, if the conspiracy should be made out unquestionably clear against them; for people would be apt to say else, that this prosecution had more of caprice or passion in it, than of justice or reason. But however, if Herod found himself otherwise dispos'd, he might do well to set them at liberty, without plunging himself into a difficulty never to be recall'd: this, he said, was the discourse and judgment of his friends at Rome. Herod, upon these words stood a good while, pausing and thoughtful, without one word speaking; and, in the end, bad Nicolaus put to sea with him, and so they went together to Cesarea.

Herod goes for Tyre, and meets Nicolaus in his way.

Herod takes him along with him to Cesarea.

WHEN they came thither, they found the whole town full of the story of Herod and his sons, and every body in pain, and solicitous to think where that prosecution would end; most people fearing the worst, and that so inveterate a rancour would very hardly be satisfied without the death of the brothers. They pitied them with all their hearts, but durst not either openly say so much themselves, or hear it from others; so that they were fain to smother all their resentments, as well of grief as of compassion.

ONLY there was one Tyro, a Veteran soldier of the king's, and a very brave fellow, who, having a son of about Alexander's age, and his particular friend, made no difficulty of speaking out and at liberty, those truths that others suppress'd and kept to themselves, crying out publickly many times, that there was neither truth nor justice left upon the face of the earth, but imposture and malice govern'd in their places; and such a mist cast before the eyes of all mortals, that they could no longer discern right from wrong, or good from evil. This was a dangerous freedom; but withal, so generous an instance of his virtue and courage, in such a time as this, that every person was pleas'd with it; and those who durst not venture so far themselves, had yet a reverence for his hazards; and the man, in truth, must have been insensible and inhuman, that was able to suppress his commiseration in such a case as this; nay, and he did not rest here neither, but march'd up boldly to the king himself, with a request to have a little private discourse with him; which being granted, he deliver'd himself as follows:

Tyro generously vindicates the unfortunate princes.

Tyro's expostulation with Herod.

"SIR, says he, I must either break my "heart, or give it vent, at what rate soever; "for I know the danger of the province I am "to undertake, and of the words I am now "about to utter; danger, I say, as to myself; "but on the other hand of as great a service "and advantage to Herod, if he pleases. "Pray give me leave to enquire, Sir, what is "become of your sense of things and your "understanding, that magnanimity of mind "and resolution, that in time past hath carried you through so many difficulties? What "have you done with all your friends and "relations? Have you none left? for I do not "reckon those people in that number, that "can see such horrid things done in your "once happy court and family, and stand idle "spectators and unconcern'd? Where are "your own eyes all this while? Do you "not see what is a doing? Are you resolv'd "then to destroy the children of once so dear "a wife, and a pair of such matchless hopeful youths too? Can you think at this time "of day, of trusting yourself in the hands of "an ambitious young man, and of those very "persons of your relations that you yourself "have so often doom'd to punishment? Do "you not find yourself tacitly condemn'd, and "your sons lamented by the very multitude, "in the profund silence and astonishment of the "people? And so for the military men, both "officers and common soldiers; they have all "aking hearts for the young princes, and lie "cursing the authors of their misery."

He tells him it makes the officers and soldiers hearts ake.

So far as Tyro's discourse ran upon the subject of his masters calamity, and the treachery of his domesticks, Herod took his liberty well enough; but when he came to pass the bounds of discretion and good manners, in a bold, blunt, military way of expostulation; this freedom look'd liker a reproach than a caution: And Herod taking it that way, ask'd him who those officers or soldiers were that he spoke of. Tyro, nam'd the men, and the king immediately order'd them all, together with Tyro himself, to be taken up and committed.

Herod bids Tyro name them, and then commits them with Tyro himself.

UPON this occasion, Tryphon, the king's barber, went to Herod with an information against Tyro, for tempting him several times with promises of money and Alexander's favour, to cut the king's throat when he was a shaving him. He had no sooner express'd these words, but the barber, Tyro and his son were all put to the torture. The son seeing his father so unmercifully tormented, and so resolute in his pains, and no hope of mitigation from so cruel a prince, call'd out to the tormentors to take him and his father off, and he would tell them the whole truth of the matter: So upon promise of case, he declar'd that his father having private access to Herod by himself, had resolved to kill him with his own hand, what risk soever he ran, for the service of Alexander. Upon this declaration, his father was deliver'd from that lingering torture; but whether this confession was a truth, or only a pretended shift to get present ease, it does not as yet appear.

HEROD was now finally resolv'd to proceed to the execution of his purpose, without any further doubt or deliberation about it, (if ever he had made any difficulty of it before) and to leave no place for repentance. So that calling the people together, there were brought forth three hundred captains, Tyro and his son, and the barber who was the evidence; and upon his accusation of them to the multitude, the rabble tore them all to pieces to a man: But Alexander and Aristobulus were sent away to Sebaste, where they were strangled by their father's order; and their bodies deposited at Alexandrion in a sepulchre, with their grandfather by their mother's side, and divers others of their progenitors.

Three hundred captains, Tyro and his son torn to pieces by the rabble.

Alexander and Aristobulus strangled at Sebaste

THERE was no great wonder in it perhaps, for an aversion of so long growth and continuance, to extinguish in Herod all sense of humanity and natural affection; but it may be yet a question where to lay the blame; whether upon the young princes forcing their father by a continu'd course of provocations to so implacable a displeasure, or to the hardness of the king's heart; and so insatiable a thirst of glory and absolute power, as not to bear any competition. Or shall we rather impute it to the irresistable power of fortune which no human wisdom can pretend to controul? For my own part, I am fully persuaded that all human actions are determin'd into a necessary train of consequences; and that providential power we commonly call fate, which orders every thing we do, though not without ascribing somewhat to our endeavours, and the freedom of searching into the causes of the variety of our actions: But this is a deep point, and we shall only touch upon it; the subject being handled more at large in the books of our laws: But now for the two first motives, as to what concerns the sons; they might perhaps in their heat of blood be too bold and imperious; too forward to entertain ill reports of their father, and partial judges of his life and practice; spitefully suspicious, intemperate in their discourses, and so laying themselves open to spies and informers that sought for matter against them to work upon. But then on the other hand, what could be more scandalous or unpardonable, than for Herod, without any proof, or conviction of any treasonous design, or so much as the presumption of any such contrivance to indulge an impotent passion in the putting of his own sons to death: Persons endow'd with such excellent accomplishments both of mind and body: Well skill'd in all manner of exercises for sports, as well as war; besides considerable for eloquence and polite literature; Alexander, the elder, especially. If nothing less than a condemnation would content him, why were they not rather imprison'd, or banish'd? There would have been no fear of treachery under those circumstances; and as little of any open force either, under the patronage of the power of Rome. Now the taking away their lives thus in such a hurry, to gratify an ungovernable phrenzy, what was it but an instance of an impious, and a tyrannical outrage; and at such an age too as admitted no plea of ignorance or want of experience? Neither does the delay in putting it off thus long, make it one jot the more excusable; for the deliberation aggravates the crime; and it would in some degree have extenuated the horror of the wickedness, if it had been committed in hot blood; or upon the surprize of some enflaming provocation. But to meditate, and consider so long upon so daring an affront to God and nature, and at last to go through with it, nothing but a barbarous and abandon'd profligate could ever have done it. But he liv'd to make this, and the remaining part of his life all of a piece; for he spared none of the rest of his relations, though never so dear to him. They were the less to be pity'd, 'tis true, because they perish'd deservedly; but his cruelty was never the less however, as will be seen further in what follows.

The case of Herod and his sons agitated.

Herod's cruelty to all people made his life all of a piece.

The death of the ſons, a ſtep to the murder of the father.

ANTIPATER had now made a large ſtep toward the compaſſing of his impious deſign upon the life of his father, in the abominable murder of his brothers; but his ambition ſpurring him on, things did not yet advance ſo faſt as he would have had them: For there were other obſtacles yet in the way. After this remove, there was no body left, 'tis true, betwixt him and home: So that there was no longer any fear or danger of competitors; but he had yet a greater difficulty to encounter, before he could gain his point: That is to ſay, the mortal hatred of the people and (what he dreaded more than all the reſt) that of the ſoldiery, the only ſafeguard and ſupport of princes againſt factions and tumults. Theſe miſchiefs he drew upon his own head, fooliſhly as well as wickedly by the deſtruction of the princes; for if the exerciſe of power would have tempted him, it was effectually Antipater that govern'd at that time, though Herod ſat upon the throne, and the adminiſtration of affairs was wholly committed to him: Nay, the very crime that he deſerv'd to die for, paſs'd for an inſtance of his affection and reſpect; as if he had only conſulted the ſafety and preſervation of the king in the death of the princes: Whereas he gratify'd his averſion to the father in what he did, as well as to the ſons; and ſuch was his peſtilent malice, that he deteſted them even for their father's ſake. It was his buſineſs, in ſhort, not to leave one ſoul alive that could either give evidence of his treaſon, or oppoſe him in the execution of it, or that might be in condition to protect Herod againſt him. But the project being now a-foot, he was upon his utmoſt peril to go thorough with it. He look'd upon the government as his own, 'tis true, after the death of Herod; but then delays he thought might be hazardous; for if he ſhould come, betwixt this and that, to be detected to his father, it would be his ruin for ever: Wherefore, he ſpared for no coſt or pains, to gain the good-will of his father's friends, by all the courtly ways of civil offices and magnificent preſents that are uſual in thoſe caſes, even to the degree of overcoming unkindneſſes with benefits: His friends at Rome eſpecially, and in the firſt place, Saturninus the governor of Syria, with his brother. He was not without hope neither of bringing over Salome to his intereſt, the wife of

of a particular friend and confident of Herod's. Now Antipater was a man of addreſs, and none better skill'd perhaps in the ways and arts of obliging; beſide that for a fair outſide to diſguiſe a falſe heart, no man upon earth was beyond him: But Salome, his aunt, that ſaw through him all this while, was not to be impos'd upon; but, countermining his miſchievous artifices, kept a watchful eye upon him through all his diſguiſes; tho' he had ſo order'd it, that her daughter, the widow of Ariſtobulus, was marry'd to his uncle by the mother's ſide, and the other daughter to Calleas. But neither the one affinity, nor the other, was ſufficient, either to cover the wickedneſs of his intent, or to extinguiſh the odium he had moſt juſtly incurr'd. Salome herſelf was all this while paſſionately in love with Sylleus; but Herod, with the aſſiſtance of the empreſs Julia, put her upon marrying Alexas; the empreſs charging her not to oppoſe it upon any terms, unleſs ſhe had a mind to break with her brother for ever, who had bound up himſelf with a ſolemn oath, never to own her for his ſiſter, after ſuch a refuſal. Salome could not ſay but it was wholſom counſel, and ſo yielded to the match.

He pretends to Salome, and ſhe countermines him

Herod forces her to marry Alexas.

HEROD, at the ſame time, ſent away Glaphyra, the widow of his ſon Alexander, and the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, back to her father again, together with the portion he had in marriage with her, that there might be no farther cauſe of controverſy; and, upon the whole matter, he took great care for the education of his grandchildren. Alexander had two ſons by Glaphyra; and Ariſtobulus, by Berenice, the daughter of Salome, three ſons, and two daughters. Herod frequently would be ſpeaking affectionately of theſe children to his friends, deploring the misfortune of his ſons, and putting up ejaculations to God, to preſerve their children from the like calamity, and that they might increaſe in virtue, as well as in years, and live to acknowledge their obligations to their parents. He deſign'd the daughter of his brother Pheroras for wife to the eldeſt ſon of Alexander; and the daughter of Antipater to the eldeſt ſon of Ariſtobulus; and to the ſon of Antipater, one of Ariſtobulus's daughters: the other daughter to his ſon Herod, that he had by the daughter of the high-prieſt; for Poligamy is allowable among us. The principal deſign the king had in theſe alliances, was in pity to the orphans, to oblige Antipater by this affinity, to treat them with the greater tenderneſs. But when all was done, he had juſt as much kindneſs afterward for the children, as he had for their fathers before; and Herod's commiſeration was ſo far from ſoftening Antipater, that on the contrary it made him fierce and jealous; and the more the king favour'd them on the one hand, the more Antipater hated them on the other, for fear when they were arriv'd at years of maturity they ſhould ſet up themſelves: eſpecially with the aſſiſtance of Archelaus the king, and Pheroras the Tetrarch, whoſe ſon at that time ſtood fair to marry one of the daughters. It was another dreadful mortification to him, to ſee the compaſſion the people had for the caſe and memory of the unfortunate princes, and with what deteſtation they look'd upon the contrivers of their ruin; waiting all this while over and above, for an opportunity of expoſing Antipater for his malicious practices againſt his brethren. And it vex'd him to the ſoul again, to think, according to the preſent ſtate of matters, how fair his nephews ſtood to put in for ſhares in the government; and no way to ſecure himſelf but by prevailing with Herod to diſſolve the aforeſaid contracts; which, with much importunity, he obtained, and got the promiſe of the daughter of Ariſtobulus for himſelf; and for his ſon, the daughter of Pheroras: Whereupon the former marriage agreements were all made void.

He ſends Glaphyra back to her father.

Alexander had two ſons by Glaphyra; and Ariſtobulus had three ſons and two daughters by Berenice.

Herod intends well for theſe orphans.

Herod prevail'd upon to diſſolve certain contracts.

The more Herod favours them, the more Antipater hates them.

The people's tenderneſs for the murder'd princes was a heartbreaking to Antipater.

HEROD had now nine wives; the firſt, was the mother of Antipater; the ſecond, the daughter of Simon the high-prieſt, by whom he had a ſon, whom he call'd by his own name. The third was the daughter of his brother; and the fourth his couſin-german, by which two he had no iſſue. The fifth, a Samaritan, by whom he had two ſons, Antipas and Archelaus, and one daughter call'd Olympias, who was afterwards marry'd to Joſeph the king's kinſman. Archelaus and Antipas were brought up at Rome by a particular friend. His ſixth wife was Cleopatra of Jeruſalem, by whom he had Herod and Philip, which Philip was alſo bred up at Rome. The name of his ſeventh wife was Ballas, by whom he had Phaſael. His eighth was Phedra; and the ninth Elpis, by whom he had two daughters, Roxana and Salome. As to his two daughters, the ſiſters of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, by Mariamne, (thoſe that Pheroras refus'd in marriage) he marry'd one of them to Antipater, the ſon of his ſiſter Salome; and the other (as we have ſaid already) to the ſon of his brother Phaſael: And let this ſuffice for the family of Herod.

Zamaris, a Jew, plants in Syria. Herod invites him to Bathanea. Herod ſecures the Jews in their profeſſion and liberties. Philip levies ſome ſmall taxes. Zamaris dies. Jacimus dies, and leaves his ſon Philip general of his army.

HEROD was now contriving how to fortify himſelf againſt the Trachonites; to which end he reſolv'd upon the building of a large ſpacious village in the middle of the country, which might ſerve as a ſtrong garriſon, both to ſecure that quarter from inroads, and upon any occaſion to ſally out upon the enemy. While Herod had this project in his head, ſome body happen'd to tell him of a certain Jew that came out of Babylon with five hundred horſe-men, with bows and arrows, and near a fifth part of them of his own relations: And that with theſe troops he paſſed the Euphrates to plant himſelf about Daphne in Syria, where Saturninus the governor gave him a caſtle called Valatha, not far from Antioch, for his habitation. Herod upon this intelligence, ſent an invitation to the Jew, and all his people to come over to him, with a promiſe of lands, and other conveniencies in the territory of Bathanea upon the borders of Trachonitis, with privileges of exemption from all duties and tributes, for the lands as well as for the men, and a commiſſion only to defend that quarter againſt the incurſions of vagavagabonds and robbers. Zamaris the Babylonian was well enough pleas'd with the conditions; accepted the offer, and built forts upon the ground that was allotted him, together with a town that he called by the name of Bathyra; and in this poſt he did not only protect the inhabitants againſt the free-booters, but ſecur'd the Jews alſo who travelled from Babylon to Jeruſalem, according to the duty and practice of their profeſſion.

They enjoy their liberties during Herod's reign.

UPON this proviſion, there join'd him vaſt numbers of ſuch of the Jews as made a conſcience of the laws and religion of their forefathers, peopling the country to admiration, for the ſake of the advantages and immunities above mentioned, which they enjoy'd without moleſtation or controverſy, during Herod's reign: But Philip indeed that ſucceeded him,

The government lodg'd in Antipater. Pheroras hates, but flatters the women; who are all of a piece. The conſpirators cautious. Salome diſcovers all. An information againſt the wife of Pheroras. Pheroras refuſes to part with his wife. Antipater and his mother forbid coming together.

WHILE Herod's affairs were in this poſture, as above, and himſelf poſſeſs'd with ſuch a confidence of the faith, zeal, and affection of his ſon, the authority and adminiſtration of all publick affairs was effectually lodg'd with Antipater, which truſt, however, he did moſt abominably abuſe; but daubing over the foulneſs of his hypocriſy with ſuch ſpecious and artificial pretences, that every word he ſaid paſs'd with his father for truth, and matter of fact: So that in effect he was not leſs dangerous for his craft, than for his power. But none ſo great in appearance, after all, as he and Pheroras; the latter being circumvented, and drawn into the ſnare by the women that were in the faction with the other. For Pheroras durſt not diſoblige, either his wife, his mother-in-law, or his ſiſter; though in his heart he hated them all mortally, for the indignities they had put upon his virgin-daughters. But theſe were things to be diſpens'd with, by one who had people to deal with ſo neceſſary to the main buſineſs, and privy, over and above, to ſo many dangerous ſecrets, and conſequently one to another: Beſide that Antipater was devoted to them to the higheſt degree, both upon his own account, and his mother's; for theſe four women were all of a piece. But Pheroras and Antipater would be peeviſh one with another yet for trifles: That is to ſay, at the inſtigation of Salome, that blew the coal betwixt them, and was ſo particularly inform'd in the whole train of the deſign from end to end, that ſhe was juſt upon the brink of diſcovering the conſpiracy to Herod himſelf. Now the accomplices finding their cabals watch'd, and obſerv'd their correſpondency ſuſpected of myſtery and intrigue, and themſelves under the jealouſy and diſpleaſure of the king; they laid their heads together, and came to a reſolution, not to meet ſo publickly for the time to come, but to pretend quarrellings and fallings-out, and be railing at one another continually; eſpecially when either Herod himſelf, or any body elſe that would be ſure to tell him again, was in hearing: But for the league and confidence, that was ſtill carry'd on in private; and at this rate they manag'd. Now Salome plainly ſaw thro' their whole deſign; tracing every ſtep of it from the firſt contrivance, quite through the whole conduct of it; and finally to the execution itſelf; and ſtill as ſhe pick'd up any thing to enflame the miſunderſtanding, ſhe immediately inform'd her brother of it, not without additions: As ſhe would be telling him every particular of the cloſe intelligence they held, their ſecret conſultations, and how much it concern'd him to provide for his ſafety betimes; for no leſs than his life was at ſtake. As for the contumelious language they uſed to one another before company, that was all counterfeit and colluſion, ſhe ſaid; for they were very good friends when they were alone; but enemies undoubtedly to all thoſe to whom they would have that friendſhip carry'd as a ſecret. She made the beſt, in fine, of her diſcoveries, and all went to her brother in courſe, who, by this time, had gotten ſome intelligence of the matter; but conceal'd his thoughts awhile, without taking all for granted that his ſiſter told him, whom he knew to be ill-natur'd enough to make the worſt of every thing.

The women all of a piece.

The conſpirators manage with more cautoin.

Salome diſcovers the intrigue and the cabal.

THIS ſet of women were mightily devoted to a certain ſect among the Jews that valu'd themſelves upon their legal righteouſneſs, and an oſtentation of being holier than their neighbours. Theſe people had the name of Phariſees; an arrogant, craſty ſort of men, that in the pride and vanity of their hearts, make no conſcience of affronting kings, and trampling royal authority under their feet. As for inſtance: When the whole nation of the Jews were call'd upon to ſwear allegiance to Ceſar, and to the king, theſe were the only refuſers, to the number of above ſeven thouſand: And being condemn'd afterwards in a ſum of money for this refuſal, the wife of Pheroras laid down the fine. Theſe people having gotten to themſelves the reputation of the ſpirit of propheſy, and the ſpecial direction and aſſiſtance of divine revelation, gave it out, in requital for the good office of paying the fine, that God had determin'd the tranſfering of the kingdom from Herod and his line, to the princeſs, and her husband Pheroras, and their iſſue. Salome gave the king notice of this, and of the bri-bribery and corruption that had been practis'd at court in favour of this interest. Upon a strict search and enquiry, there were several of the Pharisees taken up, and put to death, as the principal authors of this seditious presage; and among others there was Bagoas the eunuch, and Herod's minion Carus; a youth that he doted upon for the charms of his person and beauty: beside several others in his own family that were convicted of the conspiracy, upon the proof and testimony of the Pharisees themselves: who perswaded Bagoas into an opinion and belief, that he was to be celebrated as the parent and benefactor of the prince that was design'd for the throne; for every thing should succeed well to the new king, and the government be establish'd to his family in a legitimate issue.

The Phariſees fortel the tranſlation of the government to Pheroras.

Bagoas, and other Pharisees, taken up and put to death.

Soon after the trial, conviction and execution of the Pharisees, Herod call'd a council of his friends, and exhibited an accusation against the wife of Pheroras; "alledging, "that it was by her counsel and advice, that "his brother so contemptuously rejected the "tender of the royal virgins to him in mar-"riage, and that she had, most unnaturally "and against all law, fomented a feud be-"twixt brethren to the uttermost of her pow-"er, as well in deeds as in words: that she "herself had sided with the rebellious and "contumacious Pharisees, in paying the fine "that himself had impos'd upon them: "and in short, that she was guilty, more or "less, of the whole conspiracy. And there-"fore Pheroras should do well, he thought, "to cast off that lewd woman of himself, "that had done such wicked offices be-"twixt so near relations: especially consi-"dering the case to be now come to this "point, that Pheroras must either reject that "woman for his wife, or never expect to be "own'd by Herod for his brother."

Herod exhibits information against the wife of Pheroras;

and presses Pheroras to put her away.

These passionate expressions of Herod could not but affect Pheroras very sensibly; but yet with a saving to all the duty and respect that he ought, both to a prince, and to a brother; he made a publick protestation that nothing in the world should ever make him renounce his dear wife, and that he would rather die than live without her. Herod sufficiently resented this indignity; but stifled his resentment, only forbidding Antipater and his mother any communication with Pheroras, and barring the court ladies the freedom of their usual conversations. They all promis'd that they would observe the king's orders, but nevertheless kept up by stealth their private entertainments; Pheroras and Antipater especially. People talk'd at that time of an intrigue betwixt Antipater and the wife of Pheroras, and that the mother of Antipater brought them together.

Pheroras absolutely refuses.

Herod forbids Antipater and his mother, &c. all communication with Pheroras. But they meet still by stealth.

Antipater uneasy. He gets himself sent for to Rome. Herod sends him with presents, and his last will and testament. Sylleus charg'd with treason, and to be try'd at Rome.

Herod's ill humour makes Antipater uneasy.

Antipater began now to be uneasy, under the ill humour and growing jealousies of Herod; and fearing to be ruin'd by the effects of his displeasure, he wrote to his friends at Rome, to get him sent for in all haste to wait upon Augustus. This was done, and Herod dispatch'd Antipater with rich presents, and his last will and testament; wherein he declar'd Antipater his successor; or in case of his decease, his son Herod, that he had by the daughter of the high-priest.

Herod sends him to Rome with presents, and his last will and testament.

At the same time, Sylleus the Arabian went also to Rome, not having performed, it seems, what Cesar had order'd him. Antipater charged him there before Augustus, in like manner as Nicolaus had done before. Aretas accused him also, for having put several men of honour to death at Petra, contrary to his will and order, and among others Sohemus, a man upon all accounts eminent for his virtue: and so likewise Fabatus, a servant of Cesar's. The business was this: There was a certain Corinthian in Herod's guards, that the king very much confided in. Sylleus treated with this man for a sum of money to kill the king, and proceeded so far with him, that the thing was agreed upon. Fabatus had this account from the mouth of Sylleus, and forthwith went and inform'd the king of it. The Corinthian was presently put to the question, who upon a particular scrutiny, acknowledg'd the design, and brought two Arabians also into the plot; the one of them a person of great quality; and the other a singular friend of Sylleus, who being likewise put to the torture, confess'd that they came thither on purpose to press the Corinthian to the execution of what he had undertaken, and to assist him also in the exploit, if there should be occasion. The informations were sent by Herod to Saturninus, and by him to Rome, where the cause was to be heard and decided.

Pheroras sent to his government; who swears never to return, during Herod's life. Herod falls sick, and sends for Pheroras: who excuses himself upon his oath. Pheroras falls sick and dies.

When Herod saw that the love and tenderness Pheroras had for his wife cou'd not be shock'd, he sent him back to his government, which he very willingly comply'd with, binding himself by an oath never to return again during the life of Herod; and he was as good as his word; for the king soon after falling sick, and he himself being call'd upon to make him a visit, and receive some secret orders from him before he dy'd, Pheroras excus'd himself that he was under an oath, and durst not break it; but Herod lov'd his brother still as well as ever he did; and without following his example. Pheroras himself falling sick soon after, Herod, of his own accord, went to visit him. This distemper carry'd him off, and the king took order for the transporting of his body to Jerusalem, where it was honourably interr'd. This calamity was the forerunner of great mischiefs to Antipater, tho' at present at Rome; for divine justice call'd him afterward to an account for the blood of his brothers. I shall now give the story of it at length, and in order; for an exemplary case to Enquiry about the death of Pheroras.

PHERORAS being now dead, two of his Trachonite-freemen that he lov'd extremely were very earneſt with Herod for a ſtrict enquiry to be made how their maſter came to that miſerable end; and that in caſe it ſhould be found he was poiſon'd, his death might not paſs unreveng'd. They inform'd Herod (who laid a great ſtreſs upon every word they ſaid) that the night their maſter was taken ill, he ſupp'd with his wife, where he was treated with an odd and unuſual diſh of meat that ſtruck him to the heart upon the very taking of it. This was brought him by an Arabian woman under the name of a diſh to inſpire love, but was in truth, a mortal poiſon; the women of that country being the beſt skill'd in the art of poiſoning of any in the world. The woman they charg'd it upon, was found to be an intimate friend and acquaintance of Sylleus's miſtreſs, the mother and ſiſter of Pheroras's wife, the perſons that went to her for the poiſon; and that they came back together, the day before the adminiſtring of this deadly draught. The king was ſo tranſported upon the hearing of this ſtory, that he preſently order'd ſeveral of the women to be put to the torture, free, as well as ſlaves. They ſtood mute a long time; but one of them at laſt, in the horror of her pain, burſt out into this exclamation: "Ah! (ſays "ſhe) that the mother of Antipater were in "my place now; for that lewd woman has "been the cauſe of all our miſery." This diſcovery put Herod upon a reſolution to extort out of them every particular of the intrigue, and ſo to run thorough the whole hiſtory of it from point to point: as all their ſecret meetings, collations, cloſe conſultations and cabals; ſeveral occaſional diſcourſes that paſs'd betwixt Herod and Antipater, were made common talk among the women, even to the * hundred talents that were given to keep things from the knowledge of Pheroras. The women witneſſes farther enlarged upon the hatred he had for his father, and how he would be often complaining to his mother, that "he thought the old fellow would ne-"ver die;" when yet at the ſame time, he was ſo far in years himſelf, that the government wou'd have been but of little ſervice to him, had he acceded to it; beſide ſo many ſons, and grand-children in view, that he had a very uncertain proſpect of the ſucceſſion: nay, and as matters ſtood at preſent, the kingdom was to deſcend to his brother, not to his ſon, in caſe he himſelf ſhould be taken out of the way. The witneſſes ſpoke farther to his common practice of inveighing againſt his father for his cruelty and barbarity to his own ſons; inſomuch that he himſelf was forced away to Rome, and Pheroras to his government to get out of his reach.

A poiſon brought him by a confident of Sylleus's miſtreſs.

The ſiſter and mother of Pheroras's wife fetcht it.

Several women tortur'd about it.

The mother of Antipater charged with it.

The practice prov'd to every point.

THIS was all ſo conſonant to what his ſiſter had formerly told him, that without the ceremony of any farther doubt or deliberation, Doris, the mother of Antipater, was as good as convict of a moſt malicious part of the treaſon, and immediately ſtript of all her jewels to the value of many talents, and expell'd the palace: but for the women of Pheroras's family, the king was gentler to them, for the ſake of their information. There was matter abundantly againſt Antipater; but the moſt provoking and unpardonable Article of his accuſation, was drawn from the confeſſion of Antipater the Samaritan, an officer in a place of truſt under the other Antipater: who, among other things, declared, that his maſter had put a mortal poiſon into the hands of Pheroras for the king to take in his abſence, when the work might be done with the leſs ſuſpicion. This poiſon he ſaid, was brought out of Egypt by Antiphilus a friend of Antipater, whoſe uncle Theudion, the brother of his mother Doris, ſent it to Pheroras, who gave it to his wife to keep. Herod, upon this, took the woman into examination, who confeſs'd ſhe had it; and making a ſhew as if ſhe went to fetch it, ſhe caſt herſelf down from one of the palace galleries into the court: but falling upon her feet, the bruiſe was not mortal. So ſoon as ſhe came to herſelf again, the king promis'd both her, and her family their pardon, upon condition that they declar'd the whole truth; with menaces of the uttermoſt rigour of torments, if either by obſtinacy or otherwiſe, they ſhould conceal any part of the deſign. Upon this Pheroras's widow bound herſelf by a ſolemn oath to tell the whole matter of fact without any reſerve; and moſt people were of opinion, that her confeſſion was ingenuous and true. "That poiſon "(ſays ſhe) was brought by Antiphilus out "of Egypt, and prepar'd by a brother of his, "that was a phyſician there. Your ſon An-"tipater bought it with a deſign to poiſon "your majeſty. Theudion brought it to Phe-"roras, who deliver'd it to me. In the next place, the mother of Antiphilus, and another brother of his, were both put to the queſtion, and confirmed the ſame thing over again, with evidence to the very box itſelf. There was an accuſation exhibited alſo againſt one of the king's wives, the daughter of the high-prieſt; but they got nothing out of her: Herod however, caſt her off, and ſtruck her ſon, of his own name, out of his will, whom he deſign'd his ſucceſſor, if Antipater had dy'd before him. He depoſed Simon alſo, his father-in-law, and the ſon of Boethus, from the pontificate, and promoted Matthias of Jeruſalem, the ſon of Theophilus, in his ſtead.

Bathyllus brought poiſon from Rome, for Antipater's mother and Pheroras.

IN this interim, Bathyllus, one of Antipater's freemen, came from Rome, and being put to the torture, confeſs'd that he brought poiſon, for Antipater's mother and Pheroras, with an intent that if one fail'd, they might try the other. There came at the ſame time certain letters from Rome, to Herod, but of Antipater's direction and contrivance; and manag'd likewiſe by his friends, who in preſents and gratifications were well paid for their pains. Theſe letters inſiſted much upon the liberties that Archelaus and Philip took at every turn, to talk ſo ſcandalouſly of Herod for the murder of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, and of the compaſſion they had for the poor innocent brothers; ſuggeſting alſo, that they themſelves were now call'd back again only to be treated after the ſame manner with thoſe that went before them. This was all Antipater's contrivance from one end to the other, and not without fair letters to Herod of his own too, over and above, for the better colour of the buſineſs. They were hot young men, he ſaid, and the more excuſable, tho' perhaps not ſo temperate and reſpectful in their words, as they might have been; with a great deal more of ſuch ſtuff to the ſame purpoſe. The controverſy went on all this while with Sylleus; and Antipater had made as many friends at court as the expence of two * hundred talents, in preſents, and gallantries, could procure him. It was a ſtrange thing now, that in ſeven months time (for ſo long had this ſcrutiny been a foot) Antipater ſhould never get the leaſt intelligence of the matter; but what with the watches and guards that beſet the paſſages, and the univerſal malice of the people to Antipater, there was not a man to be found that would run any riſque for the informing, or the ſaving of him.

ANTIPATER, having written to the king that he was upon ſettling his affairs at Rome, and preparing for his return, Herod adviſed him by all means, in a ſly temperate way of anſwer, to make what haſte he could homeward, for fear any thing ſhould fall out amiſs in his abſence: and not one angry word in his letter, more than ſome ſlight glances upon his mother, which would be eaſily made up again when they came together. This was all carry'd with mighty profeſſions of candour and friendſhip from Herod; for he fear'd if Antipater had entertain'd the leaſt ſuſpicion of a trick in it, he would delay his journey upon it, nor did he know what intereſt he might make at Rome toward the ſupplanting of him in his government. Theſe letters came to Antipater's hand as he was upon the way in Cilicia; but for thoſe that brought him tidings of the death of Pheroras, he received them at Tarentum, and with a ſorrowful heart too, not for the love of Pheroras, but for the diſappointment of poiſoning the king, which he had undertaken for. Upon his coming to Celenderis, a city of Cilicia, he had a kind of miſgiving upon him, that ſtagger'd him, whether he ſhould go forward or no. The ſcandal that lay upon his mother very ſenſibly affected him; and deliberating what to do, his friends were divided upon the queſtion. Some adviſ'd him to delay his return a while, and wait the event; others, for haſtening all he could home again, making no doubt at all but upon his appearance he would clear himſelf to all manner of purpoſes; for what was it, even at preſent, but his being out of the way that gave his adverſaries ſo much advantage over him, by tales and calumnies! this advice carry'd it: ſo that he continu'd his courſe to Sebaſte, a port that Herod had erected at an incredible expence, in honour of Auguſtus. By this time, every body read Antipater's fate; for he that at his departure was follow'd with benedictions, vows and acclamations, had not ſo much as one perſon now to take any kind of notice of him, or to bid him welcome; but for curſes and imprecations, he had them in abundance; the people crying aloud to heaven for vengeance upon him for the blood of his murder'd brothers.

Quintilius Varus in counsel with Herod at Jerusalem. Antipater comes to the palace-gates in his robes. Himself admitted, but his followers shut out.

QUINTILIUS Varus, the successor of Saturninus in the government of Syria, happen'd to be now at Jerusalem, and at this very time in counsel with Herod. While they were sitting upon publick business, Antipater in his purple robes, comes to the palace gates, which were set open to him; but immediately shut again upon his followers. This struck him into such a damp (for he knew nothing as yet of the matter) that he began now to think with himself whereabouts he was: but more especially, when upon presenting himself to his father's embrace, he found himself rejected with indignation, and upbraided with reproaches of fratricide and treason; for these, he was told, were the crimes would be charg'd upon him the day following; and Varus there present to be his judge: this surprize daunted him as if he had been thunder-struck; so he went his way, meeting his mother and his wife in his passage. The latter was the daughter of Antigonus, Herod's predecessor, by whom being inform'd of all that had pass'd upon the state of the cause, he prepared for his trial.

Antipater charged with fratricide and treason, to be try'd next day, and Varus his judge. He consults his mother and his wife, and prepares for his trial.

NEXT day there met a great council; Varus and Herod presidents, and their friends about them. Salome the king's sister, was cited thither also, with others of their relations. There was likewise the discoverers of the conspiracy; the witnesses that had been upon the torture; and in the last place, some of the domesticks of the mother of Antipater that had been taken up a little before his return from Rome, and letters for him found about them to this effect: giving him caution, "That he should not by any means come "back; for the king knew all, and he had "best have a care how he fell into his hands: "concluding, in fine, that he had no way in "the world to save himself, but by casting "himself upon Cesar's clemency and protec-"tion." Antipater made it now his request to Herod, only to be admitted to his defence, and not condemn'd unheard. The king presently bad him rise, and stand forth to take his trial.

Salome, the witnesses and discoverers all produc'd.

"I AM (says Herod) an unfortunate man to "have been the father of such children, and "to fall at last in my old age now into the "hands of such a wretch as Antipater. And "so he amplify'd upon the care he had taken "for him in his institution and education; and "reproaching him, that he never ask'd, or "so much as wish'd for any thing out of his "fortune that he deny'd him. And what re-"turn for all this, but a conspiracy against "his life, in requital; and the seizing of a "crown, by an impious violence, that by "the double right of both title and free gift, "were to come to him in course? I cannot "imagine (says he) what advantage he could "propose to himself in the gratifying of so "extravagant an ambition; for he had made "him a successor (he said) by his will, and "effectually a partner with him in dignity, "glory and power, even in his life-time: be-"side the settling of * fifty talents a year "upon him for a revenue, and an allowance "of three † hundred more, for the expence "of his journey now to Rome. As for his "charge upon his brothers, either they were "guilty, and he himself at the same time "their imitator, as well as their accuser; or "on the other side, if innocent, then was "he again the calumniator and the murderer. "For he had nothing against them (he said) "but out of his own mouth, and so was the "sentence as well as the information: so that "in this act he had acquitted his brothers, "and taken the execrable impiety of treason "and parricide upon himself."

Herod aggravates Antipater's ingratitude.

Antipater charged with fratricide and treason.

HEROD was overcome with so passionate a fit of weeping upon this tender occasion, that he could go no further; and so desired Nicolaus of Damascus, his antient and particular friend, and one that was thoroughly instructed in this matter, to proceed to the examination of the criminals, and to the conviction of his son. Antipater, by way of prevention, apply'd himself to his defence, and improv'd all the instances of his father's kindness to the justification of his own piety and deserts, assuming to himself to have done his duty to all purposes. "What likelihood "(says he) that after the rescuing of my fa-"ther from the treacheries of so many other "people, I should at last turn traitor to him my-"self, and blast the reputation of a try'd and "an unspotted loyalty, with so foul a blot "in the conclusion? what could I pretend, "or but desire to make me greater, or better "than in truth I was? or how could I be "such a fool, as under these splendid cir-"cumstances, to make myself a scandalous "villain, only for infamy and loss? for the "succession was with all formality of law "already settled upon me, and myself so far "admitted by the king's bounty into a share "with him in the exercise of his royal pow-"er, that I was effectually in the very pos-"session of the government, rather than in "the expectancy of it; and no one either to "controul, or to envy my claim. Why should "I struggle now for that with danger, which "my virtue had put me in a quiet enjoyment "of; and expose myself by so doing, to a "most certain infamy, for the vain flattery of "an uncertain hope; especially considering "how this ambition sped with my brothers, "whom I myself accused, convicted and pu-"nish'd? this I did (says he) and this I shall "never repent of; but on the contrary, value "my self upon the merit of that service, as "the highest instance I could give my dear "father of a filial and inviolable love and "duty. As to my behaviour in the city of "Rome, I dare appeal to Cesar himself, who "is no more to be imposed upon than an ora-"cle, and to several of his letters that I "could produce under his own hand in my "favour. Pray then, would it not be hard "now to set up the calumnies of wicked "men, and profess'd enemies against the au-"thority of these sacred evidences? " and hot blood, it was not ſo much a won-

" an attempt upon the authority of the very

Nicolaus adjures Varus to do juſtice.

" SIR, (ſays Nicolaus to Varus) by the ma-
" jeſty of the Roman empire, and by your own

" king from the indignities of his own fleſh
" and blood, and deliver up this monſter of an
" hypocrite to death; that under a pretext
" of reverence to his father, hunts after the " blood of his brothers; and if he had not
" been ſeaſonably detected, his father's turn
" ſhould have been next, to make his own

" Sir, that parricide is no private crime, but
" a publick affront to the laws of life, and of " our reaſonable being; and ſo abominable a
" pollution in the very thought, as well as in
" the act, that whoever ſuffers it to paſs un-
" puniſh'd, offers an indignity to human na" ture itſelf, in that violence, and to the com" mon mother of us all."

Antipater charg'd with dealing with wizards.

NICOLAUS had a glance too upon ſome fooliſh words, that had imprudently dropp'd from the mouth of Antipater's mother; concerning prognoſticators, wizards, and ſacrifices, that had been conſulted about the life of the king, and the ſucceſſion of the crown: Reciting alſo the extravagant and beaſtly debauches of wine and women that Antipater had been guilty of in Pheroras's family. There were ſeveral particulars produced with proofs to every article; ſome extorted, others voluntary; ſome again deliver'd upon recollection, and others upon preſſing, and occaſional neceſſities: And theſe were by ſo much the more credible; for every thing came out now to Antipater's condemnation, but they durſt not ſo much as mutter ſo long as he was in favour. In ſhort, the people knew ill things by him, hated him, and told all.

All men exclaim againſt him.

HIS condition was every way miſerable; but the horror of his conſcience was yet the moſt inſupportable part of his calamity; having the blood of his father (in the ſight of God that knew his intention) together with the diviſion, the confuſion, and the treaſon of the family to anſwer for. His kindneſs, or his hatred, was altogether ſteer'd by his intereſt; and he never was either a friend, or an enemy to any man, but for his own ends: And this narrow ſoul of his was ſo well known, that all honeſt men liv'd in a kind of oppoſition to him, as if it had been impoſſible to have an eſteem for Antipater and for virtue together: Inſomuch that ſo ſoon as ever they found him abandon'd by the government, and expos'd for a mark, people brought in their informations againſt him in abundance, ſtriving as it were to outdo one another therein, and with outcries for juſtice; nor did there, in all the diſcoveries that were made, appear to be any falſity in any of the different crimes charged upon him, ſince there was not any room, need or pretence for ſubornation in the caſe; there being no place for a court-flattery on the one hand, nor any danger, if they ſhould have ſuppreſs'd the truth, on the other: But Antipater, for his vile practice, was condemn'd by the univerſal conſent of all men, as a wretch, whoſe death was not ſo neceſſary upon the ſingle ſcore of his father's ſafety, as for the ſake of mankind itſelf, in clearing the world of ſo abandon'd a miſcreant. And his accuſation was not grounded neither upon bare interrogatories, whether upon the torture, or the good faith of the witneſſes; but multitudes came throngingin with articles againſt him of their own accord, and made the matter ſo clear, that with all his art and impudence, he had not one word to reply.

WHEN Nicolaus had done ſpeaking, Varus told Antipater, that if he had any thing to ſay for himſelf, the court was ready to hear him: And that his father and himſelf ſhould be the gladdeſt men in the world to find him innocent. Antipater caſt himſelf immediately down upon the ground, with this ſhort prayer in his mouth. " Lord, (ſays he) thou who art " the ſearcher of hearts, I moſt earneſtly be- " ſeech thee to vindicate my innocence as to " any thought of miſchief to my father, by " ſome ſignal token from heaven, that may " convince the world of my integrity." This is the way of men harden'd in impiety, firſt to caſt off the fear of God in their practices, and ſo, by degrees, they come to renounce or affront him in their words; and yet when their wickedneſs hath brought them into danger, they go on calling upon God ſtill, and appealing to that righteous judge, with certain formal pretences of reſignation to his will and pleaſure. Antipater, that had gotten a habit of this way of proceeding; and after he had led the life of an atheiſt, without any regard to a divine power or providence, came in the concluſion to fall under the ſtroke of a juſt vengeance; and in that diſtreſs, for want of human aid, either by friends, or laws, " he caſt " himſelf (he ſaid) upon the power and good- " neſs of the Almighty, who had preſerv'd " him hitherto by a miracle, to take care of " the life of his father." Varus ſeeing that he could get no direct anſwer to any of his queſtions, nor any thing but invocations, and appeals to heaven, he found there would be no end of it that way, and ſo call'd for the poiſon to be brought out, and ſome trial made of the force of it. It was fetch'd preſently, and given to a condemn'd man, who no ſooner took it but he dy'd. Upon this experiment, the court roſe, and Varus went away the next day to Antioch, the place of his uſual abode, in regard that the kings of Syria commonly made that their reſidence.

Antipater's hypocriſy.

An experiment made of the poiſon.

HEROD and Varus having conferr'd upon the matter, Antipater was made a priſoner; the reſolution not known; but moſt people imagining that what the king did was with the advice of Varus. Soon after Antipater's commitment, Herod inform'd Ceſar, both by expreſs meſſengers, and by writing, with the whole hiſtory of his caſe and crimes. There happen'd at the ſame time to be ſome letters intercepted from Antiphilus out of Egypt, to Antipater, wherein were theſe words: " I " have ſent you here a letter of Acme's, and " you know I run the risk of my life in the do- " ing of it; if I ſhould be laid at the mercy of " two powerful families, and my deadly ene- " mies. Pray have a care that nothing miſ- " carry." This was the ſubſtance of the letter; but the king was at a loſs ſtill for the other letter of Acme's, and caus'd a ſtrict ſearch and enquiry to be made after it; but there was none ſuch to be found; and the ſervant of Antiphilus, upon examination, abſolutely deny'd the knowledge of any ſuch letter. When they had been a good while at a loſs how to find it out, one of the king's friends happen'd to ſpy a ſeam in the lining of the ſervant's inward-ward coat; (for he had two on) and which ſuggeſted to him a thought that perhaps the letter they look'd for might be in that fold: And his conjecture prov'd true; for there they found the letter; and this was the tenor of it.

A letter from Acme. A copy of a forg'd letter, as from Salome to the empreſs, enclos'd in one to Herod from Salome.

"Achme to Antipater. I have writen to your "father, according to your direction; and I "have put in a counterfeit copy of a letter, as "if it came from Salome to the empreſs, my "miſtreſs. I make no doubt, but upon the "reading of it, Herod, without any more ado, "will treat her as a traitreſs." This letter that pretends to be from Salome, was the project and invention of Antipater, with Salome's name to it; but dreſs'd up by Acme, who wrote to the king to this effect. "Acme to king "Herod. Out of the care and deſire I have "to ſerve you, in acquainting you with any "thing that may concern the ſafety of your "perſon, I have tranſcrib'd, and ſent you a "letter that I found of Salome's to my miſtreſs "the empreſs, againſt you; deſiring her leave "for the marrying of Syllæus. Pray let it be "torn to pieces, for the diſcovery would be "as much as my life is worth." Now the letter of Acme to Antipater laid open the whole cheat, in ſhewing that ſhe did nothing but by his order, writing to Herod and ſending a copy of Salome's counterfeit-letter to her miſtreſs, and a plot in the bottom of it.

Acme, a Jew; Julia's ſervant, and in penſion to Antipater.

Acme was by nation a Jew, in the ſervice of Julia, the wife of Ceſar, and brought over to Antipater's intereſt by a vaſt ſum of money, to aſſiſt him in his practices, both upon his aunt and his father. This diſcovery expoſed Antipater for ſo turbulent an incendiary, and ſo pernicious and dangerous a wretch, to himſelf and his ſiſter (to ſay nothing of his corrupting the honour and diſcipline even of Ceſar's roof and family) that Herod was within a very little of having him put to death upon the very inſtant; and Salome was not wanting neither to provoke him to it; breaking into extravagant outrages, as beating her breaſts, and other frantick violences, and offering herſelf to a thouſand deaths, if they could but prove againſt her ſo much as the leaſt colour for a ſuſpicion of one diſloyal thought. The king, upon this occaſion, ſent for his ſon, and bad him ſpeak the word freely, if he had any thing to ſay in his own defence. Antipater ſtood aſtoniſh'd, without one word ſpeaking; and Herod, finding him in that confuſion, put him to it once again, ſince he could not excuſe himſelf, to tell him at leaſt who were his accomplices. He laid the whole blame upon Antiphilus, without naming any body elſe. Herod took this way of trifling for ſuch an indignity, that he had ſome thoughts in his paſſion to ſend him away to Rome to take his trial before Ceſar. But upon ſecond thoughts, for fear he might be reſcu'd upon the way, or acquitted when he came thither, he kept him in priſon as before: but ſent his embaſſadors however with a ſtate of the caſe; inſtructions and copies of the letters given in evidence; and in particular, with an account of Acme's being a party in the plot.

Antipater moves Antiphilus to be a Compirator.

Herod ſends a ſtate of the caſe to Rome.

Herod falls ſick, and makes his will. A ſedition, and the occaſion of it. Judas and Matthias, two eminent Jews. Herod given over. Judas and Matthias againſt the golden eagle. News that Herod is dead. The golden eagle thrown down. Judas and Matthias taken priſoners. They juſtify themſelves. The king ſends them bound to Jericho. Matthias the high-prieſt depos'd, and Jozar put in his place. The mutineers burnt alive. Herod's ſickneſs, a judgment. Herod ſends for Salome and Alexas. A horrible order of Herod's for a farewel.

WHILE the embaſſadors were now with their letters and mandates upon the way toward Rome, Herod fell into a fit of ſickneſs; made his will; and being highly exaſperated againſt Archelaus and Philip by the calumnies of Antipater, he declared his youngeſt ſon his ſucceſſor. He gave in legacies, a thouſand * talents to Ceſar; to his wife Julia, his children, friends and freemen, five † hundred talents more. The reſt of his money, with his lands and revenues, he gave to his own ſons and grandchildren: and for his ſiſter Salome, he bequeathed her a very conſiderable fortune, in acknowledgment of the ſteddineſs of her affection to him. He was now in the ſeventieth year of his age; and, his illneſs increaſing upon him, paſt all hope of recovery: cholerick, and furious as a madman, and ſo miſchievouſly croſs-grain'd, that there was no poſſibility of pleaſing him. The thing that troubled him was the haughtineſs of his ſtomach, upon a fancy that he was fallen into the contempt and hatred of the people, even to the degree of their taking pleaſure in his miſery: beſide that he was further confirm'd in this opinion by a commotion that ſoon after follow'd upon it, at the inſtance and inſtigation of ſome popular men that headed the ſedition. The thing was this:

Herod falls ſick, and makes his will.

A ſedition, and the occaſion of it.

THERE were two men that had a mighty reputation among the Jews, both for the eminency of their learning in general, and likewiſe for their particular skill and excellence in the law. And they had yet further endeared themſelves to the people by the exceeding care and pains they took in the training up of their children to the knowledge and practice of their duty and profeſſion, which they made effectually the main buſineſs of their lives: their names were Judas the ſon of Sariphæus, and Matthias the ſon of Margalothus. No ſooner was it come to the ears of theſe two famous men, that the king was given over, but they put it preſently in the heads of the young men to ſet upon a reformation, and to deſtroy all thoſe new works and ſtructures that the king had erected contrary to the laws of their country; giving them all aſſurance that if they ſhew'd themſelves champions for the truth, they ſhould not fail of their reward. They bad them further conſider, that all the broils and factions of the king's family, and the deſperate condition of the king's ſickneſs,

The people encourag'd to deſtroy innovations againſt law.

were only divine judgments upon him for his innovations; which Judas and Matthias zealously insisted on. Among other instances of a superstitious magnificence, there was a dedication of a golden eagle set up over the portal of the temple, of a prodigious weight and value. Now this being a flat contradiction to our laws, that absolutely forbid the use and ornament of images in such cases, these doctors set their disciples at work to pluck down the eagle. "It would be an enterprize of ha"zard, (they told them) but withal, that a "glorious death was much more eligible than
"a life of pleasure, and that their blood could "not be better spent than in the vindication
"of the laws and rites of their country, which "would also make their names immortal:
"whereas otherwise the brave and the mean
"would lie undistinguished in the same com"mon fate; wherefore all men of honour and
"virtue should do well, (they said) to im"prove the irreversible necessity of death, by
"a right choice of the most glorious occasion
"for it; and so to quit the troublesome world
"with comfort. It takes away the sting and
"the terror of mortality itself both at once,
"to die in the conscience of an honest action
"and of a good life; and to transmit both the "fame and the reward of it to those that shall
"come after you."

Judas and Matthias inveigh against the golden eagle, &c.

and press the destroying of it.

JUST upon the finishing of this harangue, came a rumour that the king was dead: so that betwixt the discourse and the report, the people were so inflam'd to be upon action, that they mounted the portal at noon-day; tore down the eagle, and hack'd it to pieces with their axes, in the sight of a vast multitude of spectators in the temple. The king's commander in chief immediately upon the news of this uproar, hasten'd away to the tumult with a strong body of troops, to prevent further mischief; suspecting the matter, in truth, to be much more considerable than he found it. For coming to the place, there was no enemy to be seen, but a rude undisciplin'd rabble, without either order or arms, which was easily broken and scatter'd upon the first charge, only about forty of them, with their leaders Judas and Matthias, stood their ground, upon a point of honour not to turn their backs. These were all taken and carry'd prisoners to the king; who put it to them how they durst presume to lay violent hands upon that sacred figure. Their answer was, "That they had "thought of it a long time, and coming at last
"to a resolution, they did as became men of "honesty and courage, in the putting of it in "execution; and that what they had now
"done was only in vindication of the honour
"of God, and of the precepts of their great "master, whose disciples they profess them"selves to be; beseeching Herod not to make "it a matter of wonder, if they prefer'd the "laws that they had received from Moses,
"and he from God himself, before any other
"decrees whatsoever. They did not suffer
"(they said) for evil doing, but for consci"ence and duty; and that they were ready
"to deliver up their bodies in this cause, ei"ther to death, or to punishment." It was clear that their tongues and their hearts went together in all that they said and did; and they were now ready to suffer with the same constancy they acted with before. The king, after this, sent them bound to Jericho, where he call'd a great council of the Jews, and was himself (being sick and weakly) carry'd in his chair into the assembly; where "he gave them
"to understand what unwearied pains and la"bours he had undergone for the service of "the commonwealth; his rebuilding their
"temple at an immense charge: a work that
"the whole race of the Asmonean family had "not been able to compass in a hundred and "twenty-five years: setting forth also that "he had not only re-edify'd the fabrick, but "beautify'd, endow'd and enrich'd it with
"ornaments, presents and donatives, worthy
"of so magnificent an undertaking. And now
"(says he) in the conclusion, when I thought
"myself sure of surviving my own funerals in
"the fame of a happy memory, and an ever"lasting glory for the good offices I have "done, here am I treated with contempt
"whilst living, and paid with indignities for
"all my benefits and respects; affronted in
"the face of the sun and of the people; my "gifts and oblations torn from the very tem"ple, and an act of malice improv'd into a
"sacrilege; for the injury is to God, not to
"me."

After this comes news that the king is dead.

The people throw down the eagle.

The king sends them bound to Jericho; enters the council in his chair, and reasons the matter with them.

THE leading men of the council not knowing how far Herod's cruelty might transport him, thought it their safest course to purge themselves by way of prevention; which they did, "by declaring, not only their innocency
"of the fact, but their opinion also, that the
"rioters deserv'd to be severely punish'd for it."
These words sweeten'd him toward all the rest. He took away the high-priesthood from Matthias, upon a presumption that he was no stranger to the contrivance, and gave it to Jozar his brother-in-law. It so happen'd that while Matthias was in the exercise of his function, and upon the eve to a fasting-day, he dreamt that he lay with his wife; by which accident he became unqualify'd for the next day's service; so that Joseph, the son of Ellemus his near kinsman, was substituted for that day to supply his place. After Herod had deprived Matthias of the pontificate, he gave order for the burning of the other Matthias, the ring-leader of the sedition, and all his companions with him alive. The moon, as it fell out, was that night in an eclipse.

He deposes Matthias, and puts Jozar in his place.

The mutineers burnt alive.

A party of horse scatters them: only Judas and Matthias, with about 40 more, stand their ground, and are carry'd prisoners to the king.

They are charg'd with insolence, and justify what they have done.

THE king grew every day worse and worse, and his disease look'd like a judicial punishment for his wickedness. He was parch'd up with a faint inward fever, that almost burnt his heart out, and yet scarce sensible to the touch. He was tormented with an insatiable dog-appetite; ulcers and cholicks in his guts; phlegmatick tumors in his feet and groin; his privy parts putrifying and crawling with worms; a noisome and painful tentigo; asthma's, cramps and contractions of the nerves: all men, in short, of religion, philosophy, or observation, were agreed upon it, that the hand of God was evidently upon Herod in this visitation. But still in the hopeless extremity of this his intolerable as well as incurable misery, he himself was the only man that did not despair, but continu'd laying out every where for physicians and remedies. He went over the river Jordan himself, to the hot baths at Callirrhoe, that empty themselves into the lake of Asphaltitis. These waters, beside their mineral virtue, are no unpleasant drink. Upon his coming ing hither, his phyſicians order'd him to be ſet up to the ſhoulders in a veſſel of oil, which put him into ſuch a fit of fainting, that his domeſticks giving him for dead, broke out into lamentations and outcries, that brought him to himſelf again. By this time he found all his flattering hopes of life to be vain and idle; and therefore appointed a donative of fifty * drachma's a man to be diſtributed among the ſoldiers; large ſums among his friends and officers, and ſo he return'd to Jericho; where the evil humour ſo far prevail'd upon him, that he took up a final reſolution for a farewel; one of the horrideſt perhaps that ever enter'd into the heart of a man to imagine. He ſent out a ſummons to all the eminent Jews of the country to repair immediately to him at Jericho, and not to fail, on pain of death. Upon their appearance, according to the proclamation, they were all ſhut up in the Circus, or Tilt-yard, one with another, whether guilty, or innocent. He ſent in the next place for his ſiſter Salome, and Alexas, her husband, and ſpoke to them to this following effect.

His ſiſter Salome, and Alexas.

"My time (ſays he) is drawing on: I am "oppreſs'd with pains; and fleſh and blood "muſt yield to fate, which is no more than "the common lot of mankind. It would be "troubleſome, I muſt confeſs, to think of "wanting any of the funeral honours that "belong to crowned heads. I know very "well what ſort of treatment I am to expect "from the Jews. They hated me in my life-"time, and they'll be glad to ſee me dead. "But it lies in the power of you two (ſays "he) to give me ſome eaſe yet, even at my "laſt gaſp; and it is no more than what you "owe me too. Do but follow my counſel, "and I dare yet promiſe myſelf the moſt ho-"nourable funeral-ſolemnity that ever any "prince had under the ſun; the moſt to the "joy of my ſoul; and for a concluſion, an "univerſal mourning, without one ſingle tear "of hypocrity or affectation. Wherefore, ſo "ſoon as ever the breath is out of my body, "let the Circus be ſurrounded with ſoldiers, "and the word of command given to deſtroy "every man within the encloſure: but not a "ſyllable of my death, till the work be done. "In the due execution of this order you will "lay a double obligation upon me; one in "the performance of my will; the other in "the celebration of my death, with the ho-"nour of a publick mourning." He accompany'd theſe words with tears and lamentations, adjuring his relations by all that was ſacred in human faith, conſanguinity and friendſhip, to be true to him in the punctual diſcharge of all he had committed to their truſt; which they promis'd to make good to him in every particular.

A horrid order given for a farewel.

Some or other will pretend perhaps in the hiſtory of this bloody monſter's barbarities, to his neareſt relations in time paſt, that there might be dangerous jealouſies and competitions perchance; and conſequently a kind of neceſſity upon him to be cruel in his own defence. But in this laſt action of his, he has laid himſelf open, even in his pure naturals, for the verieſt brute that ever wore the ſhape of a reaſonable creature. When he could live no longer himſelf, he bequeathed deſtruction to thoſe he left behind him, and took care to make the whole nation mourners for him, by the order he left for the deſtroying of one at leaſt out of every family. And all this too, without any injury, provocation, exception, or ſo much as any reaſon given for the doing of it: whereas among people that have but the leaſt ſpark of humanity or religion, death puts an end to all controverſies, and reconciles even the greateſt enemies.

WHILE Herod was giving his laſt orders to his kindred, his embaſſadors brought him an anſwer from Ceſar to the letters they carry'd to Rome. The ſubſtance of it was briefly this; "that Auguſtus had put "Acme to death for a correſpondence with "Antipater; and that he left Antipater him-"ſelf to the king his father, either to be put "to death or baniſh'd, according to his diſ-"cretion." This news gave Herod ſome ſatisfaction and reſpect, to find himſelf both reveng'd upon Acme, and at liberty to do with his ſon what he pleas'd: but he relaps'd quickly again into his pains; and in an outragious fit of greedineſs and hunger, he call'd for a knife and an apple, it being uſual with him to pare his own apples, and ſo eat them little by little. He was obſerv'd to look ſuſpiciouſly about him, as if he had ſome thought of ſtabbing himſelf; but his nephew Achiab kept his eye upon him, and in the very inſtant of the attempt catch'd hold of his uncle's right-hand with an outcry, and prevented it. This noiſe put the court now a ſecond time into an uproar, all people taking it for granted that the king was juſt then expiring. Antipater took all for granted; and making no doubt at all but his father was dead, he made as little alſo of procuring his liberty, upon this occaſion, and by that means, clearing his way to the throne. In this confidence, he treated with his keeper about his diſcharge; with large offers and promiſes, both of rewards at preſent and of future preferments, when he ſhould come to the crown; but the keeper was ſo far from complying with his propoſals, that he went and diſcover'd the whole practice to the king, who hated him ſufficiently before; but this ſtory of the keeper's put him into ſo extravagant a paſſion, that he ſtarted up, tho' in the very agonies of death, and laſhing out into violent outrages upon himſelf, both in actions and exclamations, he commanded one of his guards in that very moment to go and kill him, and order'd his body to be buried privately in the caſtle of Hyrcania.

Herod alters his will, and declares Archelaus his ſucceſſor.

HEROD, upon change of mind, changed his will too, and made Antipas, whom he had deſign'd in his former teſtament for ſucceſſor to the government, Tetrarch of Galilee and Perea; but gave the kingdom to Archelaus: the provinces of Trachon and Gaulon, Batanea and Panias, to his ſon Philip, the brother-in-law of Archelaus, under the title of a Tetrarchy. Jamnia, Azotus, and Phaſaelis, he gave to his ſiſter Salome, with fifty thouſand pieces of minted money, not forgetting his other relations alſo, either in land or caſh. He left Ceſar, beſide gold and ſilver plate and rich furniture of all ſorts, ten millions of piecs in ready coin; and to the empreſs Julia, with her friends, five millions more of the ſame. Matters being thus ſettled, Herod departed this life five days after the death of Antipater, four and thirty years after the expulſion of Antigonus, and in the thirty ſeventh year from his being declar'd king of the Jews by the Romans. He was a man inexorably cruel; a ſlave to his paſſions; his will was his law, and yet no man in the general more fortunate than himſelf. He mounted the throne from the condition of a private man; fell into many difficulties, but ſurmounted them all, and liv'd at laſt to a great age. As to his domeſtick broils with his children and family, how unhappy ſoever he might be in my opinion, he was yet fortunate in his own; for he ſtill got the better of his enemies.

Herod's character.

Herod's death kept ſecret. Salome and Alexas diſcharge the people in the Circus in the king's name. The king's death publiſh'd. The ſoldiers ſummon'd to Jericho; and the king's letters to the army read. Archelaus the king's ſon and ſucceſſor ſet up. The teſtament read with a proviſo.

HEROD being now dead, Salome and Alexas kept it for the preſent as the greateſt ſecret in the world, and went directly to the nobility that were ſhut up in the Circus, telling them in the king's name, that they might go home, and follow their own buſineſs, for there was no further occaſion for them. This contrivance laid upon the Jews the higheſt obligation imaginable. It was now a proper time to make publication to the king's death; and the ſoldiery being ſummon'd to meet at the amphitheatre at Jericho, Herod's letters to the army were there read; full of gracious acknowledgments of their paſt faith and ſervices, and deſiring them to continue the ſame dutiful affection to his ſon Archelaus for the future, whom he had now declared his ſucceſſor. Ptolemy, the keeper of the king's ſeal, read after this the teſtament itſelf, with this conditional clauſe in it expreſs, that "the act "itſelf, was to be reputed to be of no force "without the conſent of Ceſar." This was follow'd with acclamations of God ſave king Archelaus, and wiſhes of a happy reign to him, both from officers and ſoldiers, with promiſes of the ſame fidelity to the new king, that they had paid to his predeceſſor.

The order and pomp of Herod's funeral.

THE next work was to provide for the funeral-ſolemnity, and this was the province of Archelaus, to ſee that nothing ſhould be wanting to the pomp and ſplendor of it; he himſelf reſolving in perſon to bear a part in the ceremony. The body was born upon a golden litter; ſparkling with variety of precious ſtones, * cover'd with purple, a diadem upon his head; and over that, a golden crown, with a ſcepter in his right-hand; his ſons and relations marching by his ſide. After theſe, follow'd the ſoldiers in their diſtinctions and diviſions; firſt the guards, then the Thracians; after them, the Germans; and next, the Galatians: all of them arm'd and appointed as for a battle. After theſe, follow'd the reſt of the army under their reſpective officers, with five hundred of the court-domeſticks in the rear, with aromaticks and perfumes. They march'd in this order as far as Herodium, eight † furlongs from Jericho, where the body was bury'd, according to a former appointment; and this was the end of Herod.

Archelaus waits the ratifying Herod's act by Ceſar.

WHEN Archelaus had celebrated the funerals of his father, for the ſpace of ſeven days, according to the cuſtom of the country, the appointed time of mourning being now at an end, he treated the multitude, and ſo went up to the temple; where he plac'd himſelf upon a golden throne to receive the gratulatory prayers and acclamations of the people; which were anſwer'd on his part, with great affability and reſpect; taking it very kindly, after the hard uſage they had met with from his father, to find them ſo well inclin'd towards himſelf, and aſſuring them withal, that their good-will ſhould never be forgotten. "He "did not pretend (he ſaid) as yet, to aſſume "the name of a king, having no right ſo to "do, without the aſſent and authority of Ce"ſar, in the ratifying of his father's teſta"ment; and that was it made him decline "the acceptance of the dignity when it was "preſs'd upon him by the army at Jericho, "for want of being lawfully veſted in the "poſſeſſion thereof. But, (ſays he) whenever "I ſhall come to be ſettled in this command, "it ſhall be my care to do all things to your "advantage and ſatisfaction, and to make my "reign much eaſier to you than ever you "found my father's." The people were mightily pleas'd with the modeſty of their new prince's behaviour and diſcourſe, depending (as is uſual in ſuch caſes) upon the good faith of every thing he ſaid: inſomuch that they put his good nature preſently to the trial by asking him boons; ſome one thing, ſome another: ſome to be eas'd of their taxes; others to have their friends and companions ſet at liberty; there being a great many of them that Herod had taken up, and kept a long time in priſon. Some again were wonderfully importunate and clamorous againſt duties and impoſitions, that were laid upon market-ſtuff and other proviſions. Archelaus, in fine, found it for his intereſt and convenience to deny them nothing, for fear of exaſperat-

Archelaus casts himself at Cesar's feet.*

A design to embroil the government.

THERE was at this time a dangerous faction of male-contented Jews, laying their heads together in conventicles and cabals, how to embroil the government. The fittest matter they could find to work upon, was the case of Matthias and his companions, that Herod had put him to death for the aforesaid riot upon the golden eagle. During the life of the king, they did not dare to make any publick attempt, either in the honour or in the vindication of these reformers; but now he was dead, all mouths were open against him in clamours and invectives, to the disgrace of his memory: Insomuch, that they gather'd together in tumultuary meetings, to demand justice and satisfaction from Archelaus, upon those friends of Herod, that were instrumental in the execution; as if that vengeance upon the living would have been some comfort to the dead. They insisted particularly upon the removal of the high-priest that Herod had promoted, and the putting of some worthy man in his place. This peremptory way of importunity was provoking enough; but * Archelaus however (who was now hastening away to Cesar, both for authority and orders) did what he could by fair means to set things right for the present; and to this end he dispatch'd away one of his prime offices to try what might be done upon terms of reason and moderation. "This was not a time (he told them) "for violence and revenge. The men that "suffer'd (he said) had a lawful trial; and "their interposing after that manner was the "usurpation of a power they had nothing to "do withal. They should do well to consider "that Archelaus was just now upon his expe- "dition to Rome, and that upon his coming "back with his commission ratify'd, all these "difficulties would be provided for to their "content: Only in the mean time, let them "live amicably and peaceably one with an- "other, without incurring the danger of a se- "dition." This discourse was encounter'd with so impetuous an outcry and opposition, that one sober word among them was as much as a man's life was worth. "They had the "law in their own hands, (they thought) and "nothing less would serve them, than a re- "venge, now Herod was dead, for the friends "he destroy'd of theirs while he was living; "which they reckon'd hard to be deny'd "them." In this eagerness of passion, they consulted no other measures of right or wrong than the impulses of their own humour and interest, and so intent all this while upon the ruin of other people, that they neglected the most necessary means of their own safety. In the mean time, there was no want of seasonable applications to them, as well from the king himself, as from others; but these gentle ways made them only more insolent and outrageous: Insomuch, that they wanted nothing but numbers, to improve this tumult into a direct rebellion.

A tumult little short of rebellion.

THE feast of unleavened bread, or the passover, being now at hand, the celebrated memorial of the Israelites being deliver'd out of Egypt; vast numbers of people coming up to Jerusalem, as well from abroad as at home, to worship and offer sacrifices upon that occasion: A seditious party of men crowded into the temple, and there made a stand, with a resolution not to stir out, though they were forced to beg their bread to keep themselves from starving: Their business there being to condole with the people for the loss of their two doctors, Judas and Matthias; and to irritate the rabble to a revenge. No body knew how far this riot might go: So that Archelaus, for fear of the worst, sent an officer with a party of soldiers to suppress it in time, before the whole body of the multitude had taken the infection; and with orders also to seize the ring-leaders of the tumult, and to bring them before him to make them exemplary, in case of any obstinate resistance. The guards no sooner appear'd, but the mutineers ran down the soldiers with such a torrent of rage and clamour, that the whole multitude falling upon them with stones and other weapons, destroy'd them all, save only the officer himself, who with some few wounded men escap'd. After this action, they went on with their sacrifices. The contest was now brought to such a height, that Archelaus must either crush that rabble, or fall himself: So that he sent out his whole army to encounter them, with orders to his horse, to put all to the sword that should endeavour to make their escapes; and to keep all succours out from them. This body of horse cut off three thousand of their men in the action, and the rest fled to the neighbouring mountains for shelter. So soon as this brunt was over, proclamation was made for every man to return to his own home; and after all their swaggering, tho' they were men of the most insolent and audacious spirits, they were glad to get off upon these terms, and to leave the festival, for fear of a worse mischief.

A party of factious Jews crowd into the temple. They irritate the people to a revenge for Judas and Matthias.

Archelaus sends a party to quiet the multitude.

The people destroy them all but the commander.

Archelaus, with his army, cuts off three thousand, and scatters the rest.

ARCHELAUS put himself now upon his journey to Rome; taking his mother, Nicolaus,

Ptolemy, and several other of his friends along with him; leaving the care of his kingdom and family to his brother Philip. Salome and her family went also, and were accompany'd by divers others of his kindred, under a colour of joining interests to assist Archelaus in his pretence to the succession. But in truth, rather to obstruct, than to farther it; for they were resolv'd beforehand, to exhibit an accusation against him for the business of the temple: But however, away they went, he and his company together, meeting Sabinus, Cesar's procurator of Syria, at Cesarea; posting in all haste toward Judea to take care of Herod's money: But Varus, very opportunely coming in the way, put off his journey; being himself, upon the invitation of Archelaus by Ptolemy on the same errand: So that out of a respect to Varus, he neither meddled with any of the forts in Judea, nor seal'd up their treasure; but left all things in the power and possession of Archelaus, till Cesar should declare himself upon the matter. This he promised, and so continu'd in Cesarea. But soon after, upon the embarking of Archelaus for Rome, and the departure of Varus for Antioch, Sabinus advanced directly for Jerusalem; took up his habitation in the palace; sent for the king's officers, military and civil, demanding their books and their keys: But they were ty'd up, they said, by the orders of Archelaus, to keep all things till his return, in the same state they received them, for the use and service of Cesar.

Salome an enemy to Archelaus. He meets Sabinus at Cesarea, in his way to Judea. Varus stops his journey, being engag'd on the same errand.

Archelaus goes for Rome.

Sabinus goes for Jerusalem, and demands Herod's books and keys.

AT the same time, Antipas, one of the sons of Herod, took a voyage to Rome, in hope of getting the kingdom to himself. Salome did her part to put him upon it, under the colour of a prior right to the succession by an antecedent will; and suggesting that the first will ought to stand. He took with him his mother, and Ptolemy, the brother of Nicolaus; a particular friend of Herod's, of a long standing, and ever well effected to his party. But the man above all the rest that fix'd him at last in his ambitious undertaking, and had the greatest stroke with him, was Ireneus; a man of a notable smooth tongue, and one that had been much, and long in the king's business. He was advised by others to consider the seniority of Archelaus, as elder brother, and the pretence he had to the succession by the will of his dead father; but the credit of Ireneus, and the incentive of his own ambition, carry'd it from all other considerations. To Rome, in fine, he went; and upon his arrival there, his kindred came all over to him; not so much out of any kindness to himself, as an aversion they had to Archelaus; their heads being altogether set upon liberty and a Roman governour: Or they fancy'd however, in case of the worst, that Antipas would be the easier to them of the two; and for these reasons they employ'd their interest that way.

Antipas goes to Rome, and sets up for himself. He takes his mother and Ptolemy to his assistance.

SABINUS had now sent an information to Cesar against Archelaus; and Archelaus, by the hand of Ptolemy, presented Augustus with a memorial of what he had to offer in his own defense, containing the ground of his claim; a recital of his father's will; an account of what monies he left; together with the ring that seal'd them up: remitting himself upon the whole to Cesar's good pleasure. When Cesar had perused these writings, with the letters also of Varus and Sabinus; what money Herod had left behind him; and the yearly revenue of the government, and what Antipas himself had suggested in his own right, he call'd a council of his friends to advise upon the whole, and so gave audience to the competitors: Caius the son of Agrippa by his daughter Julia, whom he had adopted, sitting president. Antipater the son of Salome stood up first: (an excellent speaker, and a bitter enemy to Archelaus, delivering himself in terms to this effect.

Sabinus exhibits an information against Archelaus, who presents Augustus a breviate of his defence.

Cesar compares it with the charge; calls a council; and gives the competitors a hearing.

Antipater against Archelaus.

"IT seems a strange thing to me, (says Antipater) that Archelaus should be so childish as to pretend title to a kingdom, after so absolute an exercise of sovereign power over it already; and not so much as troubling his head either for Cesar's ratification or assent. I speak of his late massacre of so many Jews upon one of their solemn festivals: or supposing the punishment itself never so reasonable, that which would have been an act of justice in a lawful prince, was yet a murder in an usurper. If he acted as a king without the emperor's approbation, it was an affront to Cesar: if he pretended to exercise acts of authority in the capacity of a private man, it was yet worse. So that he could not reasonably expect the benefit of a derivative power from Cesar in his favour, after what he had done to supplant it in the original. He charg'd him likewise with changing officers of the army at his own will and pleasure; placing himself upon the royal throne, and hearing causes there in the quality of a sovereign prince; receiving and answering publick addresses and petitions, and doing all those things, in fine, without any warrant, which Cesar himself could have enabled him to do; taking upon himself, in his own name also, to discharge those that were committed to the circus. He urged, upon the whole, a great many objections against him; some actually true, and others, considering the heat and ambition of a young man, raised on a sudden to such a pitch of dignity and power, not altogether improbable: beside the ill-natur'd extravagance of a revelling entertainment he made the very night after the death of his father: which the people look'd upon with so much horror for the unnatural ingratitude of it, toward so indulgent a parent, that they were ready to break out into an uproar, to see how he impos'd upon the world with a personated affectation of sorrow in the daytime, and spending the whole night in luxury and riot. How can the emperor imagin that this perverse man will ever be more thankful for a crown to him, than he has shew'd himself to so tender a father? What can be more inhuman than to sing, feast, dance and rejoice at the death of a parent, as if it were for the destruction of an enemy! With what face now shall this man desire Cesar to make him a king, that has already taken upon him to make himself one, even without Cesar! But the great aggravation of the wickedness in the temple, was the horridness of the murder in that sacred place; and the doing it upon a solemn festival, where both citizens and strangers promiscuously were slaughter'd like sacrifices; the holy place fill'd with carcasses; and this Usurpation charged upon him.

Exercise of arbitrary power.

" violence not committed by a ſtranger nei" ther, but by an uſurper under the counte-
" nance of royal power, the better to colour
" his tyrannical and barbarous cruelties. His " father knew his temper ſo very well, that he " never ſo much as dreamt of him for a ſuc-
" ceſſor, ſo long as he was in his right ſenſes;
" but Antipas was the man he pitch'd upon,
" in his former teſtament, while he was as yet
" in his ſenſes and in ſound health both of body
" and mind; or putting the caſe that Herod's
" opinion of Archelaus might have been the
" ſame upon the making of his firſt will, as it
" was afterward; has he not done enough
" ſince that time to ſhew what a king he is like
" to make, in aſſuming to act by a ſelf-created
" power, and in the circumſtances of a private
" man to cut throats in the very temple?"

Antipater appeals upon the matter of fact.

Antipater, upon theſe words, appeal'd to ſeveral of his relations that were there preſent for witneſſes to the truth of what he had deliver'd, and ſo made an end of his diſcourſe.

Nicolaus ſpeaks to the heads of the accuſation.

To this Nicolaus reply'd, and argu'd on the behalf of Archelaus, " that the blood of
" thoſe that were kill'd in the temple reſted
" upon their own heads; and that they had
" carry'd the tumult ſo far, there was no other " way of ſuppreſſing it. The inſolence, 'tis
" true, may ſeem to point at Archelaus; but

" trary to the laws of God and nations, and " without any reſpect to the ſacredneſs of the " place or occaſion, that were ſent in an order-
" ly way to quiet the mutineers. Now theſe
" are the people that Antipater ſtands up for,
" without either honeſty or ſhame, provided
" he may but gratify the rancour of his ſpleen
" to Archelaus. The fault was in the aggreſ-
" ſors; and not in thoſe that were both pro-
" voked and neceſſitated to take up arms in " their own juſt defence. As for the reſt of " the articles that were charg'd upon Arche-
" laus, they were all retorted upon the accu-
" ſers themſelves, who were all conſenting to
" the very action they complained of: beſide
" that they made the thing a great deal worſe
" than it really was, out of ſpite to the ma" nager, tho' a near relation, and one that
" had deſerved highly well of the father,
" and done many good offices to the family.
" As to the authority of the king's teſtament,
" he was not only in perfect ſenſe and memory
" when he wrote it; but ſecond wills, as well
" as ſecond thoughts are commonly beſt. And " for a further proof that it was written with " conſideration, he ſubmitted the validity of
" it to the good pleaſure of Ceſar. But Ceſar
" (ſays he) is too generous to encourage un-
" grateful examples in favour of a ſort of peo" ple, that after the higheſt obligations ima-
" ginable to Herod in his life-time, take ſuch
" pains to overthrow his will now he is dead.
" Ceſar will rather exerciſe his goodneſs in " favour of a faithful friend and ally, that lays
" himſelf at his feet, and not ſuffer his impe" rial dignity and juſtice that have made him
" ſo famous over the face of the earth, to be " impos'd upon by envy and calumny. Will " Antipater have Herod's to be the will of a " mad-man, becauſe it deſigns ſo dutiful a
" ſon for a ſucceſſor? Or is it a ſign of mad-
" neſs to pay ſo abſolute a deference to the " liking and authority of Ceſar? It would " be hard to conceive, how Herod ſhould be
" ſo miſtaken in the perſon, and at the ſame
" time ſo right in the prudential part of the
" method and direction."

Archelaus caſts himſelf at Ceſar's feet, who does him great honour.

When Nicolaus had now finiſh'd his ſpeech, Archelaus threw himſelf at Ceſar's feet; who preſently taking him up with great humanity, paſs'd this judgment upon him, that he was worthy of a crown, which was underſtood for a kind of owning his authority. Ceſar finding the young prince ſo well ſatisfied, diſcharg'd the meeting without coming to any final reſolution at preſent, and ſo took time to bethink himſelf whether he ſhould ſettle the government upon Archelaus alone, or in partition upon the whole family, in regard that they all depended upon him alike.

The mother of Archelaus dies.

BEFORE this affair could be ſettled, Marthace the mother of Archelaus fell ſick and dy'd; and news was brought from Varus the governor of Syria, that the Jews were revolted, having been very mutinous and troubleſome ever ſince the departure of Archelaus.

A ſedition in Jeruſalem.

Varus makes examples of the ring-leaders.

But Varus falling upon them with his troops before they could well gather to a head, made examples of the ringleaders, and ſo having, in a great meaſure, ſuppreſs'd the ſedition, went back again to Antioch; leaving only one legion in Jeruſalem to prevent tumults.

Sabinus oppoſes the Jews in Varus's abſence.

But this proviſion, it ſeems, was not ſufficient; for Varus was no ſooner gone, but Sabinus, Ceſar's deputy governor in Syria, looking upon himſelf now by the enforcement of theſe troops and guards, to be at leaſt a match for the multitude, he turned his arms againſt the Jews: galling and provoking them to the laſt degree of impatience; attacking ſeveral of their forts and caſtles; rifling and ſearching every where at pleaſure for conceal'd mony, under pretext of publick ſervices; but all this while advancing his own private ends of gain and booty. The feaſt of the paſſover; (which is the name of the moſt celebrated feſtival we have) that feſtival, I ſay, now drawing on, brought up to Jeruſalem a great many thouſands of the Jews from all quarters; ſome for worſhip and devotion, and others out of pure ſpite and revenge. Theſe numbers gather'd togetogether, not only from Judea, where the outrage fell heavieſt, but from Galilee, Idumea, Jericho, and from the towns beyond Jordan; being all unanimouſly reſolved to call Sabinus to a ſevere account for his inſolency. They divided their troops into three bodies; one of them took poſſeſſion of the circus; another was poſted upon the north and eaſt ſide of the temple; the third upon the weſt, where the king's palace ſtood. When they had thus begirt and hemm'd in the Romans, they made ready for the aſſault. Sabinus was not a little ſurpriz'd at the boldneſs of theſe people, and finding that they were deſperately reſolved either to conquer or die, he ſent with all ſpeed to Varus for immediate relief; for the legion that he had left there would undoubtedly be cut to pieces elſe. He himſelf, in the mean time, got up to the top of a high turret belonging to the caſtle of Phaſael, which was erected in memory of Herod's brother who was ſlain by the Parthians, and from thence gave the ſign with his hand to the Romans to ſally out upon the Jews; expecting that others ſhould expoſe their lives to gratify his avarice, at the ſame time when he himſelf durſt not ſo much as ſhew his head among his friends. But the Romans however made a ſally, from which enſued a ſharp encounter; for tho' the ſoldiers did all that was poſſible for brave men to do, the courage of the Jews was not abated, notwithſtanding a great loſs of their people. They poſſeſs'd themſelves after this, of ſome of the outward galleries of the temple, whence they gall'd the Romans from above, with ſtones and arrows from their ſlingers and archers, as ſpectators rather than actors in that part of the combat; for the Romans below, were out of diſtance of reaching their enemies. The fight continu'd a long time upon this diſadvantage, till in the end the Romans ſet fire to the timber-work under the galleries, and ply'd it ſo hard, by adding fewel to it, that the flame ſhot up to the roof in a moment, and laying hold of the pitch, wax and oils that were employ'd upon the ornament and guilding, put all into ſo furious a blaze, that it was certain death ſo much as to attempt a relief: for what with thoſe that were cruſh'd to death with the fall of the building, and thoſe that were put to the ſword upon the ground, there was not ſo much as one man eſcap'd of thoſe that had poſſeſs'd the galleries. Several of them in deſpair or aſtoniſhment, leapt into the flames in a fright; others caſt themſelves upon the points of their ſwords: and for thoſe that thought to ſave themſelves in holes and hiding-places, they were all cut off by the ſoldiers; for what could their courage avail them without arms? As the fire ſlacken'd, the Romans preſs'd thorough the ruins up to the very repoſitory of the holy treaſure, whereof a conſiderable part was pilfer'd and embezzled by the ſoldiers, and not above four * hundred talents (as Sabinus pretended) brought to him. The Jews were now in a double diſtreſs; partly for the loſs of ſo many of their dear friends, and partly for the ſacrilegious robbery committed upon their temple: but however, in this fit of deſperation, they got a body together of the moſt reſolute men they had, and beſet the palace with them; menacing immediately to ſet fire to it, and to put every man to the ſword that ſhould eſcape the flames, if they did not in that inſtant quit the place and depart; with a promiſe of impunity to Sabinus and all his people, if they went away preſently; the greater part of the court being alſo on their ſide. Rufus and Gratus, with three thouſand of Herod's choiceſt men, went over to the Romans, together with the horſe that were under Rufus's command, which was a ſeaſonable and a conſiderable enforcement; but the Jews ply'd their work yet neverthelefs, mining the walls, menacing and adviſing the enemy to be gone while they might, without putting a people to the laſt extremity of deſperation, that were reſolv'd at all hazards to maintain their liberties, with the laws and cuſtoms of their forefathers. Sabinus was willing enough to have complied; but being conſcious to himſelf of what he had deſerv'd from the Jews, he durſt not venture himſelf upon their promiſe; beſide, that the conditions were too advantageous to be made good, he thought; and ſo he determin'd to venture the holding of it out, in the hope and expectation of ſuccour from Varus.

They draw into three bodies.

Sabinus ſends to Varus for relief.

The Romans fire the galleries, and burn the Jews.

The temple rifled.

Rufus and Gratus go over to the Romans.

WHILE matters at Jeruſalem were in this poſture, there were ſeveral other inſurrections in different parts of Judea elſwhere, upon the inſtigation either of profit or of a vindictive malice. There was about two thouſand of Herod's disbanded men gather'd together upon this occaſion into a body, with a reſolution to encounter a party of the king's under the command of Ahiab, Herod's nephew; but Ahiab knowing the people he had to do withal to be old ſoldiers and try'd men, he kept off from fighting all that poſſible, by ſhifting into faſtneſſes and defilees, where there was no coming at them.

Several rebellions.

ON the other hand there was Judas the ſon of Ezekias, a notorious robber, that held Herod formerly ſo long in play, though at laſt he worſted him. This ſame Judas, with a band of deſperate men that he had gotten about him at Sepphoris, a city of Galilee, made an inroad into the king's country; ſeiz'd his magazines and military ſtores; arm'd all his people to a man; took the king's moneys; made himſelf formidable to the inhabitants; pillaging and ſpoiling wherever he came, and aſpiring, in fine, to the government itſelf; not by any arts and ways of honour (for he had no qualifications of that ſort) but purely upon the encouragement of doing what miſchief he pleas'd, in a licentious manner.

Judas the notorious robber haraſſes the king's country.

WHILE things were in this confuſion, there was one Simon, formerly a ſervant of king Herod's; but a man mightily celebrated for his prodigious ſtrength; the gracefulneſs and the goodlineſs of his perſon and ſtature. This man had the vanity and confidence to venture at the crown; took his guards about him, and and was ſaluted every where by the mad multitude, with acclamations of God ſave the king, and look'd upon himſelf, in fine, to be the fitteſt man in the whole world for the command: And for a prologue to his greatneſs, he began with the burning and the rifling of the palace at Jericho, making the ſame havock in other of the king's houſes; ſtill allowing his followers the advantage of the booty. And he would not have ſtop'd there neither, if he had not been ſeaſonably prevented; for Gratus, one of the king's captains, and at that time taking part with the Romans, advanced with his troops againſt Simon, and there paſs'd a very ſharp and an obſtinate fight betwixt them: But Simon's people that came from the other ſide of Jordan, managing the action with more courage than skill, were totally routed and cut to pieces, and Simon himſelf being taken priſoner in his flight over certain difficult paſſes; Gratus order'd his head to be ſtruck off.

A ſharp fight betwixt Simon and Gratus. Simon routed, taken, and his head ſtruck off.

THIS humour of the common people was up every where; for the royal palace at Amatha, by the river Jordan, was burnt to the ground too by ſuch another ſort of rabble as theſe that follow'd Simon. This rage was little better than an epidemical madneſs; and all for want of their own king, by good reaſon and diſcipline, to keep the people in their duty. But upon the bringing in of foreigners to reclaim them, what with their intolerable pride and avarice, the people were only the worſe for it.

THERE was one Athronges too, a man neither of birth, virtue, nor fortune, but one of the meaneſt even of ſhepherds; only a huge bulk of body, and a brutal ſtrength of limbs. With theſe qualifications, he put in for a pretence to the government, with a reſolution to venture his life for the obtaining of a prerogative to do miſchief at will and pleaſure. This Athonges had four brothers, as ſtrong and as gigantick as himſelf, and each of them a troop of ſoldiers under his command, which they look'd upon as a foundation ſufficient toward the gaining of their point. There were vaſt multitudes of people that came in to theſe five brothers; and Athronges made uſe of his four brethren to go upon parties, and to act as his lieutenants, while he himſelf ſat in counſel with a crown upon his head, giving orders and reſolutions in affairs of ſtate. This pageantry continu'd for ſome time, and the royal ſtile and title did not ſeem altogether idle neither; for they did what he would, and there was no diſputing of his commands: Unmercifully cruel, whenever either the Romans or the king's ſoldiers fell into his power: For he hated them both alike; the one for the liberties they had taken under Herod; and the other, for injuries of freſher date. The animoſity grew every day ſo much more mortal and implacable than another, that, betwixt the havock they made for profit and booty, and the cruelties they committed even for cruelty's ſake and to keep their hands in ure, there was no creature ſafe. They fell upon a Roman convoy out of an ambuſh near Emmaus, with corn and arms for the camp; kill'd the commander Arius, with forty of his ſoldiers, all brave men upon the place; and the reſt muſt have expected the ſame fate too, if Gratus had not brought them off with a party juſt in the nick, leaving their dead behind them. They continued skirmiſhing at this rate for a long time, to the great trouble of the Romans, but a much greater to themſelves; for in the concluſion they were all taken; one in an encounter with Gratus, another by Ptolemy. The eldeſt fell into the hands of Archelaus; and the laſt, finding the caſe deſperate, their men ſpent with toil and ſickneſs, and no hope of recruits or redreſs, yielded himſelf to Archelaus upon his oath and honour for the performance of conditions. But this was ſome time after.

Athronges ſits in council with a crown upon his head, and treats in the ſtile of king. Outrageous and cruel.

All taken and ſuppreſs'd.

IN this licence of robbery and confuſion, every new band of mutineers would be ſetting up new kings; which tore the commonwealth to pieces: the Jews that were ſtill dividing into feuds and factions among themſelves, ſuffer'd hereby extremely; but the Romans all this while came off at a cheaper rate.

THE news that Varus had received from Sabinus of the danger he was in, put him into ſo great an apprehenſion for the third legion (which was the whole number they had in Syria) that he took the other two, and four troops of horſe, with the auxiliaries of the king's, and the tetrarch's, and haſten'd away into Judea to the relief of the beſieged; appointing the rendezvous at Ptolemais, and taking fifteen hundred men along with him from Berytus by the way. There was alſo Aretas the petrean (he that eſpous'd the Roman intereſt out of a pique to Herod) who ſupply'd him with a conſiderable enforcement both of horſe and foot; but when the army was drawn all into a body at Ptolemais, Varus gave the command of part of it to his ſon, and one of his particular friends, with order to march into Galilee, which is not far from Ptolemais. Upon this inroad into the country, he carry'd all before him, wherever he met with any oppoſition; took Sepphoris, laid the city in aſhes, and ſold the people for ſlaves at an outcry. Varus himſelf advanced with his army toward Samaria, but there was no damage done to the city, becauſe he knew them to be well affected; and in their own diſpoſition, peaceable enough. But he encamped in a village call'd Arus, which belonged to Ptolemy. This village the Arabians burnt, in revenge to the very friends of Herod, for Herod's ſake. The army advanced afterward to Sampho, which the ſame Arabians rifled, tho' a ſtrong place, and afterward ſet it on fire: but, in ſhort, there was nothing eſcap'd them, that whole expedition, but all deſtroy'd by fire and ſword. Emmaus was burnt by the order of Varus, in revenge of his ſoldiers that were ſlain there; but the inhabitants had quitted it firſt. Upon his approach from thence toward Jeruſalem, the Jews who had beſieged the legion upon that quarter, immediately upon the ſight of the army, abandon'd their poſt, and in a fright brake up to ſhift for themſelves. Varus fell very ſeverely upon the Jeruſalem-Jews for this ſcandalous uproar; but they had this to ſay in their excuſe, that it falling out in a time when there was ſuch a prodigious recourſe of people to Jeruſalem, it was the ſtrangers made the war, not the inhabitants; and that they did not only oppoſe the Romans, but ran the very riſque with them in the fate of the ſame ſiege. As for Sabinus, he declined coming in Varus's ſight, and withdrew himſelf out of the city toward the ſea.

much againſt his will, in the heat and rage of a military licence; ſo that finding no further occaſion for his army, he ſent it away: but hearing afterward that ten thouſand of the Jews were got into a body, he order'd out a ſtrong detachment to fall upon them in their quarters; yet without daring to engage, they deliver'd themſelves up to Ahiab priſoners at diſcretion. Varus ſet the common people at liberty; ſent the heads of the riot to Ceſar, and forgave all the reſt, ſaving only ſome relations of Herod, that had ſo little honour or conſcience, as without any regard to affinity, or juſtice, to engage in ſo wicked a war. Matters being thus compos'd, Varus left the ſame legion ſtill in garriſon at Jeruſalem, and went back to Antioch.

Ten thouſand Jews in a body again. Varus leaves a garriſon at Jeruſalem, and returns to Antioch.

THIS difficulty was no ſooner over in Judea, but Archelaus was encounter'd with another at Rome, that happen'd as follows. "The "Jews, with the permiſſion of Varus, ſent an "embaſſy to Auguſtus, for leave to live ac- "cording to their own laws. There were "fifty Jews join'd in the commiſſion, and up- "ward of eight thouſand more of the city, "that preſented themſelves to ſecond them. "Ceſar hereupon, appointed a ſelect number "of his friends, and others of the firſt rank "in the city, to attend him in the temple of "Apollo, a moſt magnificent ſtructure of his "own erecting. Thither came the embaſſa- "dors alſo with a long train of Jews after "them, and Archelaus, with his friends like- "wiſe. But the king's relations could not "tell which way to turn themſelves: for on "the one hand, they abhorr'd Archelaus, and "therefore could not ſide with him; and on "the other hand, if they ſhould have clos'd "with the embaſſadors, they muſt have be- "tray'd themſelves to the king for enemies "to a prince of their own blood. There was "alſo Philip the brother too, that came out "of Syria by the advice of Varus in the pro- "ſpect of aſſiſting Archelaus, for whom he "had a particular tenderneſs and reſpect: but "yet Philip all this while was not without "hope, that if the embaſſadors ſhould gain "their end, and the dignity come to be di- "vided among Herod's children, he might "come to put in for a part of the kingdom "himſelf.

The Jews ſend an embaſſy to Ceſar.

Ceſar gives them audience in the temple of Apollo.

THE firſt thing the ambaſſadors inſiſted upon in their addreſs, was an earneſt requeſt that they might be no longer under the power of kings; and they began with the hiſtory of the miſgovernment and iniquity of Herod. "He was a king (they ſaid) only in name; "but in the exerciſe of his power, a tyrant; "and not only vers'd in the common arts of "oppreſſion, but fruitful in inventions of his "own, to improve the myſtery. It would be "to no purpoſe to reckon up how many lives "he has taken away, when the ſurvivors were "yet more miſerable than thoſe he deſtroy'd; "for they liv'd in perpetual danger and ter- "ror, under ſo mercileſs and rapacious a ma- "ſter, and as much at mercy in their fortunes "as in their perſons. What was all the pomp "and vanity of his expences upon ſtrangers "for? the repairing, rebuilding, beautifying, "and enriching of their cities; but a ſingu- "lar way he had found out by himſelf of "dreining and beggaring his own people at "home, to gratify his vanity abroad; and of "turning a flouriſhing and a plentiful country "into a deſart? how many of the nobility "has he put to death, upon falſe, frivolous "pretences, without any colour of law or ju- "ſtice, and purely for the benefit of their "forfeited eſtates! and how many others has "he neceſſitated to compound for their lives, "with the loſs of their fortunes! and ſo in "the matter of tributes, and ordinary taxes, "it was not enough for every man to pay ac- "cording to his aſſeſſment and proportion, "without bribes, and preſents over and above, "to court-minions, collectors, and other rak- "ing officers and ſervants, to prevent further "vexation. We ſhall ſay nothing of his bru- "tal practices, both upon virgins and matrons, "but paſs them over in ſilence, for the honour "of thoſe innocent names that ſuffer'd the "abuſe: but, in ſhort, (ſays he) if the fierce- "eſt beaſt in the foreſt had been ſet over us, "he would have govern'd us juſt as Herod "did: and of all the miſeries that ever this "nation indur'd, the calamity of his reign "was incomparably the greateſt: wherefore "the people might well be allow'd to com- "pliment Archelaus upon the death of his fa- "ther, for they were ſure beforehand, they "could never have a worſe in his place. They "were as frankly forward alſo, out of a re- "ſpect to the ſon, in promoting the funeral "honours of the father, and ſo in other of- "fices of deference and good manners, which "they thought might gain upon the good-will "of the ſucceſſor: but Archelaus quickly gave "the people to underſtand, that he was his "father's own ſon; and they might ſee even "before he was in the ſeat, what might af- "terward be expected from him, whenever "he came to govern. His whole fortune was "as yet at the mercy of Ceſar; and to give "his new ſubjects ſome taſte beforehand of "his virtue, modeſty, and juſtice, he ſacri- "ficed three thouſand citizens of his own "tribe to the honour of God, in the very "temple, with as little regret, as if they had "been but ſo many common victims. Let "the world judge now of the confidence of "this odious man, that can have the face, af- "ter the committing of ſo execrable an out- "rage himſelf, to charge the crime upon "others, and at the ſame time to lay claim "to the government." The embaſſadors, in fine, ſumm'd up their whole buſineſs in a ſhort requeſt to Ceſar, to change the form of their government, and deliver them from the oppreſſion of a monarchy; annexing them to Syria under ſuch rulers as Ceſar ſhould think fit to appoint: and it would then appear whether they were a people that delighted in broils and innovations, or men of order and obedience; under the authority of lawful governors.

An invective againſt Archelaus.

THE embaſſadors having now deliver'd what they had to ſay, Nicolaus ſtood up in the defence, both of Herod and Archelaus. "Pray, under favour, how came it (ſays he) "if Herod was guilty of all this, that he "ſhould never be call'd to an account for it "in his life-time, when they might have ap- "peal'd to the juſtice of Auguſtus for reme- "dy, and ſatisfaction? as for the caſe of Ar- "chelaus, it was not properly his act, but an "abſolute force put upon him by the contu- "macy of a faction that firſt trampled upon

" the laws in a ſeditious tumult; and then " with ſwords and ſtones, cut the throats, " and beat out the brains of thoſe that were " ſent to quiet them. And what was Arche- " laus's crime now, but the ſuppreſſing of an " outrageous inſurrection by a ſtronger pow- " er? but, (ſays he) turning to the accuſers; " ye are poſſeſs'd with a ſpirit of diſobedi- " ence and licentiouſneſs; ſedition and rebelli- " on are what you moſt delight in, now is there " any other nation under heaven whoſe peo- " ple are of ſuch an obſtinate and refractory " temper.

Cæſar's generoſity in favour of Herod. The portion of the ſons of Herod.

WHEN Cæſar had heard both ſides, he diſmiſs'd the aſſembly, and after ſome few days declared Archelaus ſucceſſor to the one moiety of Herod's juriſdiction, but under the title of an Ethnarch, not of a king, with a promiſe yet of the kingdom too, whenever he ſhould make himſelf worthy of that honour. The other half was divided betwixt the two ſons of Herod, Philip, and that Antipas who had the diſpute with Archelaus about the intire ſucceſſion. This Antipas had for his ſhare, Galilee, with the country beyond Jordan, and two * hundred talents a year in revenue. Philip's portion was Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis; and part of the palace of Zenodorus, (as they call'd it) and a hundred † talents in yearly revenue. Archelaus had Judea, Idumea, and likewiſe Samaria; which was diſcharg'd by Cæſar of a fourth part of the duty, for ſtanding loyal when the reſt were in rebellion. There fell to his lot alſo the tower of Straton, Sebaſte, Joppa, and Jeruſalem: for Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon, living in a conformity to the Greek cuſtoms and manners, were no longer dependencies upon the kingdom, but annexed by Auguſtus to Syria. The revenue of Archelaus upon the whole, was ſix ‡ hundred talents a year.

THUS ſtood the patrimony of the ſons of Herod. And for Salome; beſide the cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Phaſaelis, and five hundred thouſand pieces of minted ſilver, which her brother had given her by will, Auguſtus gave her alſo a palace in Aſcalon, within the dominion of Archelaus; and her income was reckon'd at * ſixty talents a year: all the other legacies to the reſt of the king's relations being made good alſo, according to the will of Herod. Auguſtus beſtow'd likewiſe upon Herod's two virgin daughters, over and above what their father left them, two hundred and fifty thouſand pieces of minted ſilver each, and marry'd them to the two ſons of Pheroras. Nay, and what was yet more magnificent and generous than all the reſt, he divided his own legacies, valued at fifteen † hundred talents, among the ſons of Herod too; ſome few pieces of plate excepted, which he kept to himſelf; not for the value of the thing, but for the memory of the donor.

A counterfeit Alexander. The management of the impoſture. The cheat paſſes among the Jews for current. He takes up money upon his royal credit. He goes to Rome with a princely train. The cheat is condemn'd to the gallies, and the adviſer put to death.

THE buſineſs of the will, and the legacies being now over; there was a certain young man, by nation a Jew, and trained up at Sidon, with a freeman of Rome, who bore ſo exact a reſemblance to Alexander the ſon of Herod, who was put to death by his father, that it was almoſt impoſſible to have diſtinguiſh'd the one from the other. This Jew took the hint by the right handle, and letting fall ſome words pointing at the relation he had to that family, he inſinuated, by this glancing way, ſome remote pretenſion that he might have to the crown. Upon this he form'd a project how to put his pretenſions in execution; to which end he communicated his deſign to a cunning fellow of his own tribe and way: one that had run through all the cabals and intrigues of the court; and endued with a genius for plots and miſchief. Upon laying their heads together, it was this politician's advice, that the young man ſhould ſet up for that very Alexander who was ſaid to be dead; and the ſtory, in ſhort, was to run thus: that the perſon entruſted with the execution of the two brothers, (Alexander and Ariſtobulus) had ſet up two other bodies in their places, and ſo preſerv'd them both. The impoſtor was not only inwardly pleaſed himſelf with the conceit of the part he had to play; but the cheat paſs'd as current upon other people too; inſomuch, that coming to Crete, and after that, to the iſle of Melos, the Jews were all ſo fully perſwaded of the truth of the fact, that he took up ſeveral ſums of money among them, upon the credit of his royal extraction. The deluſion had wrought ſo far by this time, that he began now to build caſtles in the air, and to dream of principalities and powers; what favourites he would raiſe, and to what places and preferments. Big with theſe hopes, he embark'd for Rome, attended with a fair troop of his new courtiers and diſciples. When he came to Puteoli, he had no ſooner ſet foot on ſhore there, but all the Jews, every man of them that ever had any friendſhip or acquaintance with Herod, gather'd about him, and receiv'd him as their king: people being naturally curious and credulous, where they have ſuch reſemblances and preſumptions to work upon: for this perſon was ſo very like the prince, that ſeveral of his intimate friends did not only affirm, but ſwear, upon the ſight of him, that this was Alexander himſelf, and could be no other. The rumour of this diſcovery coming to Rome, brought all the Jews out of that quarter to meet him upon the way; with praiſes and thankſgivings in their mouths, for the bleſſing of ſo wonderful and ſo ſurprizing a deliverance. He was carry'd in a ſedan with a princely pomp and equipage, (his friends ſparing for no coſt) follow'd with multitudes of people; loud acclamations, prayers, and good wiſhes, as we ſee commonly in ſuch extraordinary occaſions. But the great honour they did him was for the ſake of his ſuppoſed mother Mariamne. Now Ceſar looking upon Herod as a man not to be eaſily impos'd upon, in a matter of this importance, would not believe one ſyllable of the ſtory; but yet for ſureneſs ſake, he ſent a freeman of his, one Celadus, a contemporary and companion of the two brothers, to fetch this new Alexander, that he might have a ſight of him, which he did; and Celadus was impoſed upon as well as the reſt. But Ceſar after this, was not to be ſo eaſily put upon; for tho' they were as like as like could be upon the main, yet if a man look'd narrowly, he might find ſome particular diſagreements too, as the hands of the falſe Alexander were callous and harden'd with working; the grain of his skin coarſer than theirs are commonly that are brought up in delicacy and pleaſure. Ceſar obſerving alſo how exactly the maſter and the ſcholar agreed in the ſame tale, and that it was all but a made ſtory, asked him what was become of Ariſtobulus; and ſince they were both deliver'd together, how it came to paſs they did not both appear together, and put in for their pretenſions to their inheritance. The impoſtor made anſwer, that Ariſtobulus ſtay'd at Cyprus for fear of the danger of the ſeas; for if they ſhould both have miſcarry'd together, the whole race of Mariamne would have been extinct, and ſo care was taken for Ariſtobulus, in caſe of the worſt. The falſe Alexander affirming this, and the contriver of the ſtory joining exactly with him in the concert, Ceſar took the young man aſide. "Look ye, (ſays he) put none "of your tricks upon me at your own peril. "Speak truth now, and I'll give you your "life. Wherefore tell me immediately what "you are for a man, and who it was that put "you upon this practice; for you are not "old enough to be guilty of forming ſo cun-"ning and malicious a deſign, without ſome "other inſtigation." When the fellow found himſelf driven to this extremity, and that there was no evading, he told Auguſtus the whole hiſtory, with the author of the invention, and the manner of the proceeding. So Ceſar was as good as his word to the counterfeit, and condemn'd him only to the gallies, being of a robuſt conſtitution of body, and proper for that ſervice. His adviſer was put to death; and as for the Jews of Melos, they were ſufficiently puniſh'd in the expence they had been at for the honour of ſuch a piece of pageantry: and we are now come to the infamous end of a raſh and a bold impoſtor.

The hiſtory of Archelaus in his Ethnarchy. Archelaus baniſh'd, and his goods confiſcate. A foreboding dream of Archelaus's. Simon, an Eſſene, expounds it. Glaphyra's dream of her firſt husband.

ARCHELAUS being now returned to Judea, and in poſſeſſion of his Ethnarchy, removed Joazar the ſon of Boethus from the pontificate, for having taken part, (as was pretended) with a ſeditious faction; and ſo confer'd the dignity upon Eleazar his brother. He rebuilt the palace at Jericho, at a moſt magnificent expence, and drew down one half of the ſtream that water'd the village of Neara, to a grove of palm-trees that he had lately planted in the field below. He built alſo a new village, which he call'd Archelais, after his own name; and without any regard to the laws of his country, he took Glaphyra to wife, the daughter of king Archelaus, and the widow of his brother Alexander, to whom ſhe had born ſeveral children; tho' ſuch * marriages with brothers wives are expreſly forbidden by the Jewiſh law; neither had Eleazar any long joy of his dignity; for Jeſus the ſon of Sias was put into his office while he was yet living.

The hiſtory of Archelaus in his Ethnarchy.

IN the tenth year of the government of Archelaus, the head men of the Jews and Samaritans were ſo diſguſted at his tyrannical adminiſtration, that they join'd in a complaint againſt him to Ceſar. And they proceeded in it with the more confidence, becauſe they knew that extreme ſeverity to be directly contrary to the order and good liking of Auguſtus; who had expreſly charged him to govern his people with tenderneſs, impartiality, and juſtice. Upon the hearing of this complaint he ſent for Archelaus, who was his agent at Rome, to come to him immediately, and bad him go preſently and fetch the other Archelaus to him; without vouchſafing him a letter. Archelaus poſted away as faſt as he could into Judea; where he found the other Archelaus making merry with his friends; ſhew'd him Ceſar's order, and call'd upon him to haſten away. Upon his arrival at Rome, Ceſar heard both charge and defence; paſſed a ſentence of baniſhment upon Archelaus, with confiſcation of all his goods, and ſo ſent him away to Vienne, a city in Gaul.

Archelaus baniſh'd, and his goods confiſcated.

THIS

A foreboding dream of Archelaus's.

THIS Archelaus, a little before his being ſent for to Rome, had this following dream, as he told it himſelf to ſeveral of his friends. He fancy'd that he ſaw ten ears of wheat, all ripe and full, and the oxen eating them. This viſion, upon waking, ſeem'd to portend ſomething extraordinary; ſo that he conſulted ſeveral interpreters of dreams, about the meaning of it: but they being divided, one Simon an Eſſene, with leave of the reſt, gave his opinion upon the ſignification of that dream, which was, that it foreboded ſome misfortune to Archelaus; for the dreaming of oxen, a creature deſign'd for labour and ſlavery, ſeems to import * misery; and a change of affairs beſide, becauſe upon their turning up of the ground every thing chang'd its place and figure. By the ten ears of corn is intimated the ſame definite number of years, which take their revolutions in courſe, and the reign of Archelaus ſeem'd to be now near an end. This was his interpretation of the dream: and upon the fifth day after this viſion, Archelaus, Ceſar's agent, came into Judea by the order of Ceſar, to ſummon him before Auguſtus.

Simon, an Eſſene, expounds it.

HIS wife Glaphyra, the daughter of king Archelaus, had alſo an odd kind of a dream. This Glaphyra (as we have ſaid before) had for her firſt husband, Alexander, the ſon of Herod, and the brother of Archelaus. Her ſecond husband, after the putting of the firſt to death by his father, was Juba the king of Mauritania; and after his death, living a widow with her father in Cappadocia, Archelaus turn'd off his former wife Mariamne; and falling paſſionately in love with Glaphyra, he marry'd her. During the time of her cohabiting with Archelaus, ſhe had this dream.

Glaphyra's dream of her firſt husband.

"She fancy'd that ſhe ſaw her firſt husband Alexander coming toward her; and that when ſhe thought to receive him into her arms, with all poſſible joy and kindneſs, he enter'd with her into this manner of expoſtulation. Glaphyra, (ſays he) thou haſt made good the old ſaying, there's no truſting to women. Was not I the husband of your virginity? and had we not children betwixt us, the pledges of that love? how could you forget that obligation ſo far, as to engage yourſelf in a ſecond marriage? and after that, into a third; and ſo ſhamelefly to break into my family, and take my brother Archelaus for your husband? but, (ſays he) that ancient kindneſs ſhall never be forgotten, and it ſhall be my care to deliver thee from this reproach." She told this dream to ſeveral of her ſhe-friends; and within a few days after departed this life.

HAVING had occaſion in this place to diſcourſe of theſe princes, I thought it might not be improper to mention this circumſtance: eſpecially as the example is very well worth the conſideration; beſide that it is inſtructive alſo, with a reſpect to the divinity of the ſoul, and to the wiſdom of divine providence. He that will not believe this, is at liberty to think what he pleaſes, provided that others may be left to their freedom too, in making a moral uſe of theſe diſcourſes. As to the lands of Archelaus, Ceſar annex'd them to Syria, and ſent Cyrenius, a man of conſular authority, to tax the province, and to diſpoſe of the palace of Archelaus.

Cyrenius made governor of Syria: And Coponius governor of Judea, ſent along with him. Cyrenius levies a tax: The Jews murmur at it; but Joazar keeps them quiet. Judas, a Gaulanite of Gamala, and Sadducus, a Phariſee, commit horrible outrages, under the colour of a common good. The temple burnt to the ground. The fruit of innovations. Judas and Sadducus ſtart a fourth ſect.

Cyrenius governor of Syria, and cenſor of the tax.

CYRENIUS was at this time ſent governor by Ceſar into Syria. He was a man of eminent fame; a Roman ſenator, and one that had paſs'd through all the degrees and offices of honour, up to the dignity of a conſul. Coponius, who commanded the horſe, went along with him, as governor of Judea; but Judea being already annexed to Syria, it was Cyrenius's province to tax and aſſeſs thoſe people, and to make ſeizure of the monies and moveables of Archelaus.

Cyrenius levies a tax, and ſeizes the eſtates of Archelaus.

The Jews murmur, but Joazar the high-prieſt keeps them quiet.

THE Jews at firſt expreſs'd their diſlike of this way of aſſeſſing; but betwixt the perſuaſion and authority of the high-prieſt Joazar, the ſon of Boethus, they were prevail'd upon to ſubmit and comply without any farther trouble. There aroſe ſoon after this, one Judas, a Gaulanite, of the city of Gamala; who together with one Sadducus a Phariſee, inveigled the people into a revolt. "Taxes, "(they ſaid) were only marks of ſlavery, and "therefore the whole nation ſhould do well "to ſtand up for an univerſal liberty; and one "lucky hit would make them free and eaſy "for ever, and advance them in their reputa- "tion, as well as ſecure them in their poſſeſ- "ſions: But in order to effect this, they were "to ſtickle for themſelves, and ſtand up in their "own defence, otherwiſe they could not ex- "pect the aſſiſtance of heaven."

Judas a Gaulanite of Gamala, and Sadducus a Phariſee, ſtir up the people to a rebellion.

Horrible outrages, under pretext of liberty, property, and the common good.

THIS evil counſel diſpos'd the multitude, who liſtened to it with eager ears, to attempt the commiſſion of all ſorts of miſchief and outrage; and it is not to be expreſs'd, the havock theſe turbulent incendiaries made in the nation: What with murders, robberies, depredations, without diſtinction of friend or foe; aſſaſſinates, maſſacres, and what not? under a pretext all this while, of advancing the common good of liberty and property; and nothing at laſt but paſſion and private intereſt in the bottom. And at the ſame time, while the citizens were tearing one another to pieces at home with a civil war in their own bowels, a foreign war upon them from abroad, and a terrible famine to encounter over and above;

Wars and famine.

nothing could yet put a ſtop to the outrageous courſe they were in, of blood and deſolation; till the fire, in the concluſion, laid hold of the holy temple itſelf.

The temple burnt to the ground.

THIS was the fruit of hankering after new laws and cuſtoms, and quitting eſtabliſh'd foundations. And Judas and Sadducus, out of a capricious ſingularity of humour, would needs be ſuperadding a fourth ſect to the three former; by which bait of innovation, they drew in a mighty party to them, and not only prov'd the occaſion of a preſent confuſion, but laid the foundation of greater miſchiefs to come. Wherefore it would not be amiſs to ſay ſomewhat in this place of thoſe pernicious opinions and principles that have wrought us all this woe.

The fruit of innovations

Judas and Sadducus ſtart a fourth ſect.

CHAP. II.

The Phariſees practices and opinions. Men of great reputation with the people. The way of the Sadducees. The Eſſenes; their doctrine, courſe of life and government. A fourth ſect for abſolute liberty, that owns no ſuperior but God.

THERE were of old three famous ſects of religion among the Jews. The Eſſenes, the Sadducees, and thoſe that they call'd Phariſees. I ſhall touch upon them again, in the ſecond book of my wars of the Jews; though it will not be improper to ſay ſomewhat of them alſo in this place.

THE Phariſees manner of life is ſimple and auſtere, without any luxurious delicacies. They make a conſcience of keeping cloſe to the dictates of their reaſon, and pay ſuch a veneration to the counſels of their elders, that they hearken to them without any contradiction or controul. They aſcribe all things to fate; but not ſo, as abſolutely to exclude free will neither: for though all things are done, they ſay, by God's order and appointment; this does not yet hinder the concurrence of the will, in caſes that have a regard either to good or evil. They believe the immortality of the ſoul, and a future ſtate of rewards and puniſhments in another world: The wicked to be condemn'd to perpetual chains and darkneſs, and the good to riſe again with comfort. By theſe doctrines they have advanced themſelves to a mighty reputation among the people; and all things are done in the ſolemn offices of prayer and divine worſhip, according to their ſenſe and preſcription: Such is the veneration the people have for the wiſdom, temperance and integrity of theſe men.

The Phariſees practices and opinions.

Men of great reputation with the people.

THE Sadducees on the other hand, hold that our bodies and ſouls die together; and that we have no other obligation upon us than to obſerve the law: Inſomuch, that they value themſelves upon a right they have to diſpute the higheſt points with their teachers. Theſe people are not many in number, but for the moſt part men of quality, and matters go ſeldom their way; for when they come once to bear offices, how unwillingly ſoever, they are forc'd to go over in a conformity to the Phariſees; for the common people will not ſuffer it to be otherwiſe.

The way of the Sadducees.

THE Eſſenes aſcribe the government of the world to God's providence without any exception. They hold the immortality of the ſoul; and celebrate juſtice, both in practice and doctrine, as the ſovereign virtue. They ſend their gifts to the temple, without going thither themſelves; for they offer their ſacrifices apart, in a peculiar way of worſhip, and with more religious ceremonies. As to their converſation, they are men of excellent morals; and their whole buſineſs is husbandry. They are eminent for their juſtice, beyond either Greeks or Barbarians, as a virtue that hath been a long time their application and ſtudy. Their goods are all in common, without any diſtinction of rich and poor among them. They have neither wives, nor ſervants; for they look upon the one as an encroachment upon the natural liberty of mankind, and the other as a circumſtance that carries trouble and uneaſineſs along with it: So that they chuſe rather by a mutual exchange of good offices to help one another. This is their way of life, and they reckon themſelves to be upward of four thouſand ſouls in this ſociety. Their treaſurers and commiſſaries are men of integrity, choſen from among their prieſts; and it is their care to make proviſion out of the fruits of the earth for the feeding and maintaining of the whole body. They live upon the main, much at the rate of the Piſti among the Dacians.

The Eſſenes. Their opinions, courſe of life and government.

THE founder of the fourth ſect of religion was Judas Galileus, and this was much the ſame with that of the Phariſees, ſaving only in the maxim of an uncontroulable liberty; for they own no other lord and ſuperior than God himſelf, and will rather expoſe themſelves and their deareſt relations to the moſt exquiſite of torments, than call any man by the name of maſter. But this is ſo known a truth upon every day's obſervation and experience, that it will need no farther confirmation; beſide that all that can be ſaid of it will fall infinitely ſhort of expreſſing the invincible conſtancy of theſe people, in the contempt of pain: And this animoſity was yet farther inflamed, by the inſupportable cruelties of Geſſius Florus, the governor of Judea, which ended at laſt in a downright revolt from the Romans. And this is all I have to ſay of their ſects.

A fourth ſect for abſolute liberty. They own no king or maſter, but God.

happen'd in the thirty ſeventh year after the battle of Actium, wherein Ceſar got the better of Anthony, the people broke out into a tumult againſt Joazar the high-prieſt, and Cyrenius depos'd him from his dignity, ſubſtituting Ananus, the ſon of Seth, to ſucceed in his place.

Herod and Philip ſettled in their tetrarchy.

HEROD and Philip, being now ſettled in their tetrarchies, put all things in the beſt order they could. The former began with the fortifying and walling in of Sephoris, which he made the bullwark and the capital of all Galilee; and after that, he fortify'd another town alſo, which at that time was called Betaraphtha; but he changed the name afterward to Julias, in honour of the empreſs. Philip, for his part, beautify'd and enlarged Paleas at the head of the river Jordan, and gave it the name of Ceſarea; and ſo for the village of Bethſaida upon the bank of the lake of Genezareth; he built it up to the bulk and appearance of a magnificent city; enrich'd and peopled it, giving it the name alſo of Julias, out of a reſpect to Julia, the daughter of Ceſar.

Herod fortifies Sephoris, &c.

He enlarges Bethſaida, and calls it Julias.

In the time of Coponius, the Samaritans prophane the holy temple.

AS for Coponius, who was ſent (as we ſaid) with Cyrenius into Judea, there happen'd this diſorder while he was there in his government. It is uſual for the prieſts upon the feaſt of unleavened bread, or, as we call it, the paſchal feaſt, to open the doors of the temple after midnight. Now there was a company of Samaritans that ſtole privately into Jeruſalem; and waiting for the opening of the doors, ſtept immediately into the temple, and threw dead men's bones about into the galleries, and every where up and down. The prieſt took this inſolence for a warning; and after that, kept a better guard.

Coponius returns to Rome, and Marcus Ambivius ſucceeds him.

COPONIUS a little after this returning to Rome, Marcus Ambivius ſucceeded him to the government: in whoſe time died Salome, the ſiſter of Herod, and left to Julia over and above her toparchy, the city of Jamnia, Phaſelis upon the plain, and Archelais, with ſeveral plantations of palm-trees, that bear moſt excellent fruit.

The death of Salome.

Annius Rufus ſucceeds Ambivius.

ANNIUS Rufus ſucceeded Ambivius; and in his time, Auguſtus departed this life. He was the ſecond of the Roman emperors, and ruled the common-wealth fifty ſeven years, ſix months, and two days; having been for fourteen years of the time a partner and companion with Anthony in the goverment; and upon the whole, his age was ſeventy ſeven years.

ſent Valerius Gratus, to be governor of Judea inſtead of Annius Rufus, and remov'd Ananus from the pontificate, putting Iſrael the ſon of Fabius in his place; who was ſoon after depos'd, and the honour transfer'd to Eleazar the ſon of Ananus the high-prieſt: and it was taken from him in one year more too, and given to Simon the ſon of Camith; who after another year, was commanded to deliver it up to Joſeph, whoſe ſirname was Caiaphas. Gratus having been now eleven years in his government, went back to Rome, and Pontius Pilate ſucceeded him.

Ananus removed, and Iſmael high-prieſt in his place.

Eleazar comes after Iſmael.

Simon after Eleazar: and from Simon to Joſeph (or Caiaphas.)

HEROD the tetrarch was now in great favour with Tiberius, and erected a city to his honour by the name of Tiberias. He built it upon the beſt ſpot of ground in all Galilee, on the bank of the lake of Genezareth, and not far from the hot baths at Emmaus. This city was peopled, partly by ſtrangers, partly by Galileans: ſome were fain to live there upon force, and ſeveral of the better ſort took up their habitation there upon choice. And for the peopling of it ſo much the ſooner, there came a multitude thither from all quarters, and of all ſorts, even down to men of the meaneſt condition; and ſeveral of them ſuſpected to be ſlaves: but for their greater encouragement to fix and ſettle there, he gave them very conſiderable privileges and immunities; houſes to ſome, and lands to others, to make the violation of the laws go down ſo much the better; for the place being full of ſepulchres, and polluted with dead bodies, the inhabitants are accounted unclean for ſeven days after.

PHRAATES, the king of the Parthians, was at this time treacherouſly murder'd by his ſon * Phraataces: and the manner of it was this. Phraates, among other preſents that were ſent him by Ceſar, had an Italian woman for one, whoſe name was Thermuſa. He took her at firſt in the quality of a Concubine, but came in time to be ſo charm'd with her beauty and converſation, that having one ſon by her whoſe name was Phraataces, he took her to his lawful bed, having other legitimate children of his own already. This Thermuſa had ſo great an aſcendant over the king that ſhe cou'd perſwade him to any thing ſhe pleas'd; whereupon ſhe form'd a deſign to put her ſon in a way to be king of Parthia; but this ſhe ſaw could not poſſibly be effected without firſt ſending the legitimate ſons out of the way: ſo ſhe mov'd her husband in it, and it was done for the asking; ſo abſolute was the dominion ſhe had over the temper of that man. The young men being ſent away to Rome for hoſtages, Phraataces was train'd up at home alone to an expectancy of the kingdom. But it was ſo tedious a thing, he thought, for him to wait for a crown in reverſion, that he enter'd into a conſpiracy with his mother to ſhorten the buſineſs, by taking away the life of his father, which was accordingly done; and he more than ſuſpected alſo of an inceſtuous familiarity with that lewd woman: but Phraataces made himſelf ſo odious to the people, both for the parricide and for the inceſt, that before he could come to enter upon the government, he was driven out by a tumult, and ſo periſh'd.

Phraates murder'd by his ſon Phraataces.

The ſon deſtroy'd by a tumult.

Now the Parthian nobility, conſidering that there was no living for them without a king, and reſolving with themſelves not to ſet any prince upon the throne, but of the family of the Arſacide (the blood of Phraates being already ſufficiently tainted by the luſts of this beaſtly woman;) they ſent embaſſadors with an invitation to Herod; who was, 'tis true, of the royal line, but ſo hateful withal to the multitude, for the untractable outrageous cruelty of his nature, that a band of conſpirators ſet upon him, and kill'd him; the Parthians never going without their ſwords. the execution was done at a sacrifice or a banquet; but the most received account is, that he was kill'd a hunting.

An embassy recommending one of their hostages.

UPON this, they sent an embassy to Rome, desiring one of the Parthian hostages for their king, to supply the present vacancy; and making choice of Vonones before the rest of the brothers, he was recommended as a prince worthy of the honour that was now offer'd him, in the command of two of the most glorious empires upon the face of the earth, (the Roman, that is, and the Parthian.) But the Parthians being naturally fickle and haughty, quickly repented of their choice. Their stomachs were too big to truckle to a slave, they said, for so they translated the word hostage, and upbraided him at every turn with the reproach of that appellation: for this was not a king, they said, impos'd upon them by any law of arms, but a scandalous condition of a shameful peace. In this heat of indignation, they sent for Artabanus, who was then king of the Medes, and of the blood of the Arsacide, who was easily prevail'd upon, and came presently with a considerable army. Vonones engag'd him, and beat him back again into Media; the generality of the Parthians standing as yet firm to their duty; but Artabanus being in a short time reinforced, gave a notable overthrow to Vonones in a second battle, so that he had much ado with some few horse to save himself in Seleucia. Artabanus, taking advantage of the consternation the Barbarians were in, press'd upon the pursuit with a terrible slaughter, and so betook himself to Ctesiphon with his conquering army. This action put him in possession of the kingdom of Parthia. Vonones in the mean time fled into Armenia, with a project in his head to make himself master there; soliciting Cesar also at the same time by an embassy to assist him in his design; but whether it was that the emperor suspected his courage; or that he himself was afraid of disobliging the Parthians, who then threaten'd a war upon him, Tiberius absolutely stood off, and would not meddle in the matter. This repulse destroy'd all Vonones's hopes; especially finding that the great men of Armenia that border'd upon Niphates, sided all with Artabanus. So that in the conclusion, he deliver'd himself up to Syllanus the governor of Syria, who out of a respect to former acquaintance with him at Rome, gave him a very honourable reception and entertainment. Artabanus, being now at ease, made his son Orodes king of Armenia.

They dislike the word hostage, and send for Artabanus.

Artabanus advances, and Vonones beats him into Media.

Vonones totally routed. Artabanus follows the blow, and enters into Parthia.

Vonones flies into Armenia.

Cesar refuses to assist him. Armenia sides with Artabanus.

Vonones honourably received by Syllanus.

THERE happen'd about that time, upon the death of Antiochus king of Comagena, a controversy betwixt the lords and commons, the former were for reducing the kingdom into the state of a province, and the other for being under a king still, as they were before. Upon this dispute, Germanicus was order'd away into the east by a decree of the senate for the composing of this difference, and fortune improv'd this occasion to the ruin of that excellent prince: for after he had settled and quieted affairs in Syria, he was poison'd by the practice of Piso, as we shall set forth elsewhere.

Antiochus the king of Comagena dies.

A dispute about the form of government. Germanicus sent to compose the controversy.

He adjusts the matter, and is poison'd by Piso.

Standards set up in Jerusalem with Cesar's image upon them, &c. Pilate demands money out of the holy treasury, &c. Joseph's testimony of Jesus Christ. Decius Mundus falls in love with Paulina; and in despair, resolves to kill himself. Ide undertakes to bring it about, and concerts the matter with the priests of Isis. The priest gives her an invitation from the God Anubis, and puts one upon her for the other. Mundus twits her for it. The priest and Ide are crucify'd, and the temple of Isis is pull'd down.

PILATE the governor of Judea, upon the removal of certain troops from Cesarea to their winter-quarters in Jerusalem, brought several standards into the city with the image of Cesar upon them, to the scandal of the Jewish laws, which expressly prohibit the use of such figures; and for this reason it was that no former governors ever brought colours with pictures upon them into this city before. Pilate was the first that ever transgress'd this rule; and they were brought into the town by stealth too, and there planted in the dead of the night, when no body was aware of them. But when the citizens came to take notice of them the next morning, they gather'd together in great multitudes, and went their way to Pilate at Cesarea, with a petition for the removal of those images to some other place. After several days waiting, and Pilate still refusing, upon a pretext that it was a request not to be granted without an affront to Cesar, they still persisted in their importunities; but the governor, at last, upon the seventh day of the Jews attendance, commanded a party of soldiers to be privately ready in their arms, where he appointed them, and thereupon mounted a tribunal that he had caused to be erected in the Circus, as a place the most commodious for a surprize; the people pressing him over and over still, about the same business, till Pilate at last gave a signal to the soldiers to advance and surround them, order'd them immediately to cut all their throats; if in that instant they should not every man depart to his own home and be quiet: but the Jews cast themselves all flat upon the ground, and stretching out their necks, gave to understand that their very lives were not so dear to them as the laws of their country. This wonderful constancy wrought so far upon Pilate, that he presently caused the images to be carry'd back again from Jerusalem to Cesarea.

Standards set up in Jerusalem with Cesar's image upon them.

The Jews petition against them.

Pilate denies them, and they still persist.

Pilate lays an ambush for them.

He gives the word to cut them to pieces unless they depart.

The Jews peremptorily refuse.

Upon this, the images are remov'd.

PILATE being now upon a design of bringing an aqueduct to Jerusalem, some two hundred * furlongs off from the city, demanded money out of the holy treasury to defray the charge of the work. The people took this so heinously, that they got several thousands of them in a body together, to try what might be done by multitudes and clamour, to divert him from his purpose. Some there were in this rabble (as it falls out commonly in popular confusions) that gave Pilate personal provocations, with foul language: insomuch that he order'd a certain number of soldiers to put themselves in a ring about the multitude, with clubs under their coats, in the habit of country-fellows; telling them what they were to do, upon his giving the word, in case of any further reviling or reproach. The rabble went on with their ribaldry; and the word being given, the soldiers fell on with their clubs, and went in truth beyond their commission too, for the innocent escap'd no better than the guilty. The encounter, in fine, was so unequal, betwixt men with weapons on the one side, and naked men on the other, that the Jews were some killed; others wounded and dispers'd, and so an end put to the tumult.

The author's testimony of Jesus Christ.

AT the same time there was one Jesus, a wiseman, if one may justly stile him a man. He was a great worker of miracles, and a teacher of those that were curious and desirous to learn the truth, and he had a great many followers, both Jews and Gentiles. This was the Christ that was accused by the princes and great men of our nation. Pilate deliver'd him up to the cross; and notwithstanding all this, those that lov'd him at first did not forsake him. He was seen alive again the third day after his crucifixion, as had been foretold by several prophets; with other wonders that he wrought; and there are a sort of people that to this day bear the name of Christians, as owning him for their head.

ABOUT the same time there was another misfortune befel the Jews, and likewise a most scandalous passage discover'd at Rome, upon occasion of a sacrifice to Isis; but I shall begin with this, and proceed afterward to what concerns the Jews. There was at Rome one Paulina, a woman no less eminent for her virtue, than she was for her birth; rich, lovely, and in the very bloom of youth and beauty; and withal of a modesty beyond exception. She was marry'd to one Saturninus, a husband well deserving of such a wife; and one Decius Mundus, a Roman knight, and in the prime of his age, was fallen desperately in love with her. This Paulina being a person above the temptation of money or presents, the young man was the more enflam'd by the despair of gaining her; but proceeded so far however as to offer her two hundred † thousand drachma's for only one night's lodging. When he found this would not do, and that the rage of his love grew more and more intolerable, he took up a resolution of putting an end both to his passion, and to his life together, by starving himself. There was one Ide, a freed woman belonging to the father of Mundus, of a cunning and intriguing temper, and one that understood more tricks than were for her credit. This woman saw what he was about; and finding that there was no taking of him off by the force of argument and reason, she went another way to work by wheedling and encouraging him up to hope the best; for she did not yet despair, she said, of putting Paulina into his arms; and that she believ'd a present of fifty thousand * drachma's might do the work. Mundus was abundantly satisfy'd with the proposal, and gave her the money she desired; but that was not the way she knew to deal with Paulina: So that reflecting upon it, how passionate a reverence she had for the goddess Isis, she had recourse to this invention: She got together several of the priests of Isis, and in despair resolves to starve himself.

and having first sworn them to secrecy; and which is more, secur'd them of a reward of twenty five thousand drachma's down in hand, and as many more when the work was done; she told them the business of the amour, and most earnestly beg'd their assistance toward the bringing the young man and his mistress together. The charms of the money were strong and tempting, so that they promis'd fair; and the eldest of the company went presently to Paulina, where being admitted, he told her in a private audience, that he came with a message from the god Anubis, who was fallen extremely in love with her, and she must needs give him a visit. She made the messenger very welcome, and was so elated with the honour, that she could not forbear boasting of it among her she-companions, how great a kindness the god Anubis had for her. She also acquainted her husband with it too; and that the assignation was already pass'd for them to eat, and lie together: Which the good man was well enough pleas'd withal, considering the proof he had of his wife's insuperable and inviolable virtue. Paulina, in pursuance of this fancy, went into the temple; where, after supper, about sleeping time, she was lock'd up by one of the priests, and in the dark encounter'd, it seems, Mundus instead of Anubis, in whose arms she lay all that night; making no doubt all the while, but she had spent her time in the embraces of a god. Mundus left her the next morning before the priests got up that were privy to the plot, and Paulina went back in the morning to her husband, big with the story of this divine encounter; and the women after that, had the second part of it in most magnificent terms. The case was so extraordinary that they could hardly believe it; and yet Paulina's modesty on the other hand, was so untainted that they knew not how to doubt it neither. Upon the third day after this fact was committed, it was Mundus's hap to meet his mistress. O Paulina! says he, how much am I beholden to you for saving me the two hundred thousand drachma's that I would have given you, and yet I enjoy my will of you nevertheless. What do I care whether you love Mundus, or no, so long as you will do the same thing for me in the name of Anubis! With these words he went his way. When the woman came to reflect upon it, how she was trepann'd, she tore her garments; carry'd the whole history to her husband, and begg'd him, as ever he had any love for her, not to suffer so impious an indignity to pass unpunish'd. The husband represented the matter to Tiberius; who, upon a full inquiry and information, caus'd those holy impostors the priests, to be crucified, together with Ide, the authoress and inventress of the plot, and the main instrument in the infamy of this virtuous woman. He commanded the temple of Isis to be pull'd down, and her statue to be thrown into the Tyber; but contented himself with the banishment of Mundus, as a young man that was overborn by the force of an invincible passion. Let this suffice for the story of Isis: And I shall come now to what I promis'd, of the miserable calamities of the Jews that liv'd at Rome in that revolution.

Ide concerts the matter with a priest of Isis.

The Priest carries Paulian invitation from the god Anubis.

The priest carries her to Mundus instead of Anubis.

Marcellus made governor of Judea, and Pilate ſummoned before Ceſar.*

THERE was a certain Jew, one of the wickedeſt wretches upon the face of the earth, that was forc'd to fly his country to avoid the ſtroke of publick juſtice. This man paſs'd at Rome in thoſe days for a kind of Rabbi, in concert with three more of the ſame ſtamp and cabal: and theſe four held forth for readers and expoſitors upon the laws of Moſes. By this pretence, they gain'd ſeveral diſciples, and among others, one Fulvia, a woman of quality and conſcience, and one who had embraced the Jewiſh religion. This woman having deliver'd herſelf up to their authority and diſcipline, was by them prevail'd upon to ſend oblations of gold and purple to the holy temple at Jeruſalem, which from time to time they converted to their own uſe, as they ever intended it. When this abuſe came to be made known to Tiberius, by his friend Saturninus, in a complaint againſt them, by the * inſtigation of his wife Fulvia, he commanded all the Jews forthwith to depart the city. There were four thouſand ſoldiers enter'd upon the Conſul's roll, and ſent away for Sardinia; beſide a vaſt number of thoſe that made a conſcience of bearing arms, becauſe of their religion; and theſe were put to grievous torments: ſo that for the ſake of four flagitious hypocrites, the Jews were all baniſh'd to a man.

Four profligate Jews ſet up for doctors of the law.

The women follow them, and one Fulvia a good woman among the reſt.

They gather her money for the temple, and keep it to themſelves.

Saturninus complains of this to Tiberius.

The Jews are all baniſh'd upon't.

AND the Samaritans were not without their troubles too; for there was at that time a certain impoſtor who made no ſcruple to invent lyes and fantaſtical ſtories to draw the rabble together; and this fellow gave it out, that if the people would but meet at mount Garizin, a ſacred place in the eſteem of the country thereabouts, he would undertake to ſhew them the holy veſſels which Moſes had cauſed to be bury'd there ſo long ſince. Theſe credulous fools betook themſelves to their arms, and beſieged Tirathaba, waiting for others to come in and join them, and ſo to march up the mountain together with a conſiderable army. But Pilate prevented them, and with a ſtrong body of horſe and foot prepoſſeſs'd the mountain, whence they made a charge among the Samaritans that were gotten together about the village, routed and killed great numbers of them; took, and carry'd away a multitude of priſoners; and for thoſe among them that were of intereſt or quality, Pilate ſtruck off their heads. The principal men of the Samaritans, apply'd themſelves upon this defeat to Vitellius, a perſon of conſular dignity, and at that time governor of Syria, with a complaint againſt Pilate; and charging him with murder. For they inſiſted upon it, that their meeting at Tirathaba was no defection from the Romans, but the ſeeking for a refuge for themſelves againſt the violence of Pilate. Vitellius, upon this, ſent his friend Marcellus to take charge of the government of Judea, and order'd Pilate to Rome, to anſwer before Ceſar the accuſations that were exhibited againſt him. He had now been ten years in his government; and upon this order which he cou'd not diſobey, put himſelf upon a journey to Rome; but Tiberius dy'd before he got thither.

VITELLIUS went into Judea, and ſo to Jeruſalem, (this being at the feaſt of the paſſover, as we call it) where he was received with great honour; and very graciouſly remitted to the inhabitants the whole duty upon fruits. He reſtor'd to the prieſts alſo the keeping of the pontifical robes and habits in the temple again, as they had them of old, being as then depoſited in the caſtle of Antonia upon this occaſion.

The Jews treat Vitellius at Rome with great reſpect.

But Herod, upon his coming to the crown, was ſo well pleas'd with the ſituation of this fort, both for ſtrength and beauty, that he put himſelf to a mighty expenſe for the farther improvement of it, and call'd it by the name of Antonia, in honour of Anthony his particular friend. In this caſtle he found the holy ſtole, and there he kept it, upon an opinion, that the having that in his poſſeſſion, ſhould thereby the more eaſily keep the Jews in awe. Archelaus, his ſon and ſucceſſor, did the ſame thing too, and upon the ſame conſideration; and ſo did the Romans alſo, after the reduction of the kingdom into a province; and theſe pontifical veſts † were laid up in a cabinet that was made on purpoſe for that wardrobe, under the ſeal of the prieſts, and the keepers of the holy treaſury; the governor of the caſtle being obliged to have a lamp ſtill burning before the place. high-prieſt; who having gotten it well purg'd and cleans'd, did the holy office in it afterward in courſe, and the next day return'd it to the place where it was before; and this was done upon three feſtivals every year, and upon the ſolemn faſt.

Caiaphas removed, and Jonathan put in his place.

BUT Vitellius was now pleas'd, in favour of the Jews, to give up all the pontifical habits into the poſſeſſion of the prieſts again, and to diſcharge the governor from being any farther anſwerable what became of them. After this, he took away the high-prieſthood from Joſeph call'd Caiaphas, and gave it to Jonathan the ſon of the high-prieſt Ananus, and ſo returned to Antioch.

Vitellius order'd to make a league with Artabanus.

AT the ſame time he receiv'd letters of direction from Tiberius, to make a league with Artabanus; for he was afraid, if he ſhould make himſelf maſter of Armenia, that it might be dangerous to the empire: but this to be done only upon condition of one of the king's ſons for an hoſtage. This put Vitellius upon tampering with the kings of Iberia and Alania, by great ſums of money to engage them immediately in a war with Artabanus. The Iberians could not be prevail'd upon any farther, than to leave the Alanians a free paſſage through their city, and ſo by the Caſpian mountains to open them an inroad into the kingdom of Artabanus. Upon this irruption, the Parthians preſently loſt Armenia; and that blow was follow'd with ſo deſperate a ravage upon their own country, that the nobility was almoſt entirely cut off; together with the king's ſon, and ſo many thouſands of the common people, that they were in a manner unpeopled by this invaſion. Artabanus found by this time, that he was betray'd under his own roof, and that his very friends and relations were brib'd into a plot with Vitellius to deſtroy him: ſo that not knowing whom to truſt, for fear of treachery under the mask of friendſhip, and being convinc'd that men of the firſt rate and quality were in the practice, he made his eſcape out of hand into the upper provinces, where he was not only protected, but reinforc'd with ſo conſiderable an army of the Dahi and Saci, that he not only overthrew his enemies, but recover'd his kingdom.

Vitellius tampers with the Iberians and Alanians againſt him.

The Alanians break in upon Artabanus.

Armenia totally loſt.

Artabanus finds himſelf betray'd.

Artabanus reinforc'd by the Dahi, and Saci, recovers his kingdom.

UPON this turn of affairs, Tiberius propos'd an alliance with Artabanus, and the king and Vitellius, each with his guards, met by conſent to treat about it, upon the middle of a bridge over the river Euphrates. At the concluſion of the treaty, Herod the tetrarch gave them both a very ſplendid and magnificent treat, in a tent that he had erected at a great expenſe upon the ſame river; and Artabanus ſent his ſon Darius not long after, as an hoſtage to Tiberius, with variety of preſents; and one among the reſt was a man of ſeven * cubits in height, and by profeſſion a Jew, whom, for the prodigiouſneſs of his ſtature, they called Eleazar the giant. Vitellius, after this, return'd to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylon.

A treaty of alliance betwixt Tiberius and Artabanus.

The treaty concluded upon a bridge.

Darius the ſon of Artabanus ſent in hoſtage with rich preſents.

HEROD had a great mind to be the firſt author of the good news of this agreement about the hoſtages, and ſo diſpatch'd away a meſſenger with all poſſible ſpeed, with every particular of the treaty, to Tiberius; which was ſo circumſtantially exact, that there was nothing left for Vitellius, a conſular governor, to ſay farther; ſo that Ceſar, upon the receipt of a later intelligence from Vitellius, return'd only this ſhort anſwer, that he had ſent him no news; for Herod had given him a full account of the proceedings before. Vitellius took this officious anticipation very ill, but ſmother'd his reſentment of it till Caius came to the government.

Herod ſends Tiberius the whole ſtory to anticipate Vitellius.

Vitellius coming too late, Ceſar tells him he ſends him no news.

PHILIP, the brother of Herod, dy'd alſo at the ſame time in the † twentieth year of Tiberius, and when he himſelf had been thirty ſeven years in the tetrarchy of Trachonitis, Gaulanitis, and Batanea: a man of great moderation, and a lover of his eaſe and quiet; for he ſpent his whole life within the compaſs of his own juriſdiction. He hardly ever went abroad but in company with ſome few of his ſelect friends, with a chair after him; which upon ſeveral occaſions he made uſe of as a ſeat of juſtice. And if he happen'd to meet any body upon the way that had need of his aſſiſtance, he betook himſelf ſtill, without delay, to the examination of his cauſe, and either condemn'd or acquitted him, as he found him guilty or innocent. He dy'd at Julias, and was bury'd with great pomp and expenſe in a monument of his own preparing for himſelf: but dying without iſſue, Tiberius annexed his eſtate to Syria, upon condition that the tributes to be rais'd in that tetrarchy ſhould not go out of the country.

A war betwixt Herod and Aretas.

THERE happen'd a war, at this time, betwixt Herod and Aretas the king of Petra, upon this ground: Herod the tetrarch marry'd the daughter of Aretas, and they had now liv'd a long time together; but being call'd afterward to Rome, he took Herod his brother-in-law in his way; (the ſon of the daughter of Simon the high-prieſt) where he fell ſo paſſionately in love with ‡ Herodias, his brother's wife, and the daughter of Ariſtobulus, their brother, who was alſo the ſiſter of Agrippa, afterwards king; that he had the confidence to make a propoſal of marriage to her upon his return from Rome, and of parting with his wife, the daughter of Aretas; which was agreed to on both ſides, as the condition of their marriage. After this, he proſecuted his voyage for Rome: and ſo ſoon

as he had diſpatch'd the buſineſs he went about, he return'd home again. His wife having by this time got intelligence of his intrigue with Herodias, diſſembling her intentions, ſlily ask'd him to give her leave to go for ſome time to Macherus, a caſtle upon the borders of Aretas's dominions. Herod, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting the matter, gave way to her going. Now Macherus being a place belonging to her father, every thing was there in readineſs for her journey; ſo that the governor of the place furniſh'd her immediately upon her arrival with Arabian guards that conducted her with all imaginable ſpeed, ſafe to her father's palace: Where ſhe gave him at large the hiſtory of Herod's new amour. This begot a heart-burning, and there being a controverſy a-foot at that time about the bounds and abuttals of ſome lands in Gamala, and two armies ready in the field to diſpute the queſtion, they laid hold of this pretence, and by their deputies brought it to a battle, where Herod was utterly routed by the treachery of a certain band of refugees, that came over from Philip, and were at that time in Herod's pay. This prince had no ſooner given Tiberius intelligence of the diſaſter, but he preſently in a rage order'd Vitellius to make war upon Aretas for this inſolence; and either to bring him alive to Rome, or to ſend his head.

Tiberius orders Vitellius to make war upon Aretas

Now the generality of the Jews were of opinion that this was only a juſt judgment of God upon Herod and his army, for the buſineſs of John, ſirnamed the Baptiſt, which excellent man this tetrarch murder'd: And what was his crime, but only his exhorting the Jews to the love and practice of virtue; and in the firſt place, of piety and juſtice, and to a regeneration by baptiſm and a new life, not by abſtaining from this or that particular ſin, but by an habitual purity of mind, as well as of body! Now ſo great was the credit and the authority of this holy man, as appear'd by the multitude of his diſciples, and the veneration they had for his doctrine; (for he had them intirely at his devotion) that Herod did not know how far the reputation of a man of his ſpirit might influence the people toward a revolt. So that for fear of the worſt, he choſe rather to take him out of the way in time before any hurt was done, than to put it to the hazard of an unprofitable repentance when it ſhould be too late. Wherefore he ſent him away bound to Macherus, (the place before-mentioned) with order to have him put to death, which was accordingly executed; and that impious fact was follow'd with a divine vengeance upon Herod, for the blood of that juſt man, as the Jews reaſonably enough perſuaded themſelves,

A judgment upon Herod and his army.

St. John the Baptiſt put to death at Macherus by Herod's order.

VITELLIUS was now preparing for the Arabian war; and upon his march toward Petra with two legions and all the auxiliaries, horſe and foot, of the Roman allies. When he was advanced as far as Ptolemais, and thinking to take his paſſage a-croſs Judea, the great men of the country met him upon the way with earneſt ſupplications that he would ſteer ſome other courſe; for the images the Romans carry commonly in their colours, were a great ſcandal and offence to the Jewiſh laws and religion. The general was prevail'd upon, and ſo ſent his army about by the compaſs of a great plain; while he himſelf, with Herod the tetrarch and his friends, went up to Jeruſalem to worſhip upon a publick feſtival that was then at hand. His entertainment was with as much honour and reſpect as poſſible, and he made three days ſtay there; in which time he transfer'd the high-prieſthood from Jonathan to his brother Theophilus. Upon the fourth day came letters to him of the death of Tiberius; upon which intelligence he made the people ſwear allegiance to Caius Caligula, the ſucceſſor, call'd back his troops, and order'd them into winter quarters; putting a ſtop to the war upon this change in the government.

On the fourth day comes news of Tiberius's death.

THERE goes a report, that upon the news of this expedition of Vitellius, Aretas conſulted the ſoothſayers and diviners about the event of this undertaking; who gave him this reſolution; "That the army now upon their "march ſhould never come up to Petra; for "either one of the princes ſhould die; or he "that commanded the army; or he that exe-"cuted that command, or the perſon againſt "whom it was carry'd on. And ſo Vitellius "went back to Antioch."

Vitellius ſwears the people to Caius Caligula, and calls back the army.

AGRIPPA the ſon of Ariſtobulus, had been now a year at Rome, attending Ceſar about ſome important affair. But it will be more to my preſent purpoſe to ſay ſomewhat in the firſt place of Herod and his family, who was certainly a remarkable inſtance of the power and wiſdom of divine providence. For what ſignify the bleſſings of a plentiful iſſue, royal dignity and power, or a ſplendid fortune, without piety and juſtice? as we find it in Herod's caſe here, who in a hundred years time had hardly any remains left of ſo numerous family. This may ſerve for a check to the arrogant pretenſions of vain fleſh and blood, and to the raiſing of a ſober man's conſideration upon the wonderful advance of Agrippa out of a private fortune, and beyond all men's expectation, to ſo glorious a degree of power.

WE have touch'd upon this formerly in general, but we ſhall now be a little more particular. Herod the Great had by Mariamne, the daughter of Hyrcanus, two daughters; Salampſo the one, who marry'd Phaſael, the ſon of Phaſael, the king's elder brother, with the father's conſent. The other's name was Cypros, who marry'd Antipater, the nephew of Herod by his ſiſter Salome.

PHASAEL had by Salampſo, five children; Antipater, Herod, Alexander; and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros; who marry'd Agrippa the ſon of Ariſtobulus; but Alexandra was marry'd to one Timius, a nobleman of the iſle of Cyprus, who dy'd without children. Agrippa had by Cypros, two ſons and three daughters. The daughters were Berenice, Mariamne and Druſilla: The ſons were Agrippa and Druſus; the latter dying in his minority. Agrippa the father was brought up under his grandfather Herod the Great; together with his brothers, Herod and Ariſtobulus; and ſo was Berenice alſo, the daughter of Salome and Coſtobarus. The children of Ariſtobulus were at that time infants, when their father and his brother Alexander (as we have ſaid before) were put to death by Herod. But after they grew up, this Herod the brother of Agrippa marry'd Mariamne, the daughter of Olympias (who was king Herod's daughter) and of Joſeph, Herod's brother, by whom he had Ariſtobulus. Now Ariſtobulus, the

The family of Herod the Great.

the third brother of Agrippa marry'd Jotape the daughter of * Sampſigeram, king of the Emeſenes, by whom he had a daughter that bore her mother's name and was born deaf. Theſe were the children of the three brothers; but Herodias their ſiſter, marry'd Herod, the ſon of Herod the great, whom he had by Mariamne, the daughter of Simon the high-prieſt, and from thence came Salome; after whoſe birth, Herodias made no ſcruple, in defiance of all law and conſcience, to take Herod the tetrarch of Galilee for her ſecond husband, though her husband's brother by the father's ſide; having alſo abandon'd a former husband that was yet living. Salome the daughter marry'd Philip the ſon of Herod the tetrarch of Trachonitis, who dy'd without children, and then ſhe marry'd Ariſtobulus the ſon of Herod and the brother of Agrippa, by whom ſhe had three ſons, Herod, Agrippa, and Ariſtobulus. Let this ſuffice as to the family of Phaſael and Salampſo.

CYPROS had, by Antipater, a daughter of the mother's name, who was marry'd to Alexas Selcius, the ſon of Alexas, and by her he had one daughter, Cypros. But Herod and Alexander, who (as I told you) were the brothers of Antipater, dy'd without iſſue. Now Alexander the ſon of king Herod, that was put to death by his father, had by Glaphyra the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, Alexander and Tigranes.

THIS Tigranes was that king of Armenia that had an accuſation brought againſt him by the Romans, and dy'd without children. Alexander had a ſon Tigranes alſo, after the name of his uncle, whom Nero advanc'd to be king of Armenia, and had a ſon Alexander, who marry'd Jotape, the daughter of Antiochus king of Comagena, and was made king of † Leſis in Cilicia by Veſpaſian. The race of Alexander quickly declin'd from the Jewiſh laws and diſcipline to the religion of the Greeks; and the other daughters of Herod the great left no children behind them.

HAVING thus run through the poſterity of this prince, as far as to the reign of Agrippa, I ſhall now trace the hiſtory of Agrippa himſelf, and the wonderful variety of accidents in his fortune, that brought him in the end to ſo glorious a degree of dignity and power.

The riſe and humour of Agrippa.

A LITTLE before the death of Herod the great, Agrippa, being then at Rome, and frequently in the emperor's family, was got much in favour with his ſon Druſus, and ſo likewiſe in the good graces of Antonia, the wife of Druſus the elder, by the means of his mother Berenice, for whom, Antonia had a ſingular value. He was naturally of a liberal and generous diſpoſition; but while his mother liv'd, kept within compaſs, for fear of incurring her diſpleaſure. Till coming at laſt, by her death, to be left to his own conduct, what with expenſive treats, and extravagant bounties and profuſions; eſpecially among the emperor's freedmen and domeſticks, (where he made his chief intereſt) he had run himſelf ſo deſperately in debt, that he durſt not ſhew his head any longer in Rome. Tiberius, at the ſame time alſo loſing his ſon, would not endure any of Druſus's favourites ſo much as in his ſight, to mind him of his loſs.

His vaſt profuſions.

WHEN he had thus by ill conduct ſquander'd away his money and his reputation, his creditors alſo preſſing hard upon him, and no means of ſatisfaction, he returned into Judea; and partly out of deſpair of retrieving his fortune, partly out of ſhame for ſo inconſiderate a folly, he retired to Malatha, a caſtle in Idumea, with a reſolution, ſome way or other, there, to put an end to his miſerable life. Cypros finding her husband deſperately out of humour, and that his melancholy grew ſtill more and more dangerous, ſhe try'd all ways in the world to prevent miſchief, and in particular wrote to her ſiſter Herodias about it, with a very punctual account of his neceſſitous condition; adjuring her by all the ties of honour and affinity of blood, to give him ſome aſſiſtance. "She did what ſhe could herſelf "(ſhe ſaid) and deſired her ſiſter to follow "her example." This wrought ſo far upon Herodias, that both ſhe and her husband ſent away preſently to fetch Agrippa to them; gave him a penſion in money, and the command of Tiberias for his preſent ſubſiſtance: But Herod did not long hold in this mind; and Agrippa, on the other hand, was not thoroughly ſatisfy'd neither: Inſomuch that being in their cups once at Tyre, Herod contemptuouſly reflected upon Agrippa for his poverty, and caſt it in his teeth, that it was his purſe that maintain'd him.

He retires to Malatha.

Cypros writes to Herodias on his behalf.

Herodias gets him a penſion, and the command of Tiberias.

Herod in his cups twits Agrippa with his poverty.

AGRIPPA could not digeſt this indignity, and ſo he betook himſelf to Flaccus, an antient friend and acquaintance of his at Rome, and at that time governor of Syria. He gave him a frank reception and entertainment, having Ariſtobulus with him in the houſe before, who, though Agrippa's brother, was yet his enemy; but this animoſity betwixt the brothers did not hinder Flaccus from dividing his favours and civilities indifferently betwixt them. Ariſtobulus however kept up the grudge, and would never be quiet till he had wrought Flaccus into an ill opinion of Agrippa; which was thus brought about. There was a diſpute betwixt the people of Damaſcus, and thoſe of Sidon about the limits of their territory. The cauſe was to be try'd before Flaccus; and the people of Damaſcus being told that Agrippa and he were all one, they could not do better, they thought, than to engage Agrippa for a ſum of money in their intereſt. They ſtruck the bargain, and promiſes paſs'd on both ſides: So that Agrippa was to do all that lay in his power for Damaſcus againſt Sidon. Ariſtobulus, finding his brother had agreed for a ſum of money with the people of Damaſcus, to uſe his intereſt in their favour, went and complained of him to the governor; who upon examination and proof of the matter caſt off Agrippa, and left him in his extreme neceſſity to ſhift for himſelf in the wide world again: So that he return'd to Ptolemais, with a reſolution for pure want of bread, to go back again into Italy. In this extremity he engaged Marſyas, a freeman of his, to take up a ſum of money of the uſurers upon any terms, to ſupply his preſent occaſions. So he went to Protus, a freeman of Berenice the mother of Agrippa, and his late patroneſs, who in her laſt will and teſtament, had recommended him to the ſervice of Antonia; and ſo propounded the matter to him for the lending of a ſum of money to Agrippa, upon his bond. The other told him that he was indebted to him already: But yet for all this, he ſqueezed out of Protus twenty * thouſand Attic drachma's upon bond: That is to ſay, juſt ſeventeen thouſand five hundred pieces; diſcounting the other two thouſand † five hundred to himſelf, for procuration money; which Agrippa was not in condition to diſpute. Upon the receipt of the money, Agrippa went to Anthedon, where he met with a ſhip for his purpoſe, and prepar'd himſelf to put to ſea. But this coming to the ear of Herennius Capito, the procurator of Jamnia, he ſent ſoldiers to him to demand payment of a debt of 300000 pieces of ſilver, that he borrow'd out of the emperor's exchequer when he was at Rome. This unexpected rub did, for ſome time, retard his journey; but Agrippa however promis'd them fair, and ſo ſoon as it was dark, cut his cable, and put to ſea, ſtanding his courſe for Alexandria. When he came thither, he deſir'd Alexander the head officer about the revenue, to furniſh him with 200000 pieces upon his ſecurity. "As for your own part (ſays "the officer) I will not truſt you with ſuch a "ſum; but your wife ſeems to be an excel-"lent perſon, and a very good woman; and "if ſhe will ſtand bound for the money, ſhe "ſhall have it." So it was, in fine, that upon the ſecurity of Cypros, Alexander ſupply'd Agrippa with five ‡ talents at Alexandria, and letters of credit for the reſt at Puteoli; for knowing his profuſeneſs, he was not willing to venture the whole ſum in his hands together for fear of his miſpending it. Cypros found by this time, that there was no hindering her husband's journey; ſo that ſhe and her children went back again to Judea by land.

Agrippa, upon his coming to Puteoli, gave Tiberius Ceſar to underſtand by a letter, being then at Capree, that he was come ſo far to pay his reſpects and duty to him, deſiring leave to wait upon him. Tiberius without any delay ſent him back the kindeſt anſwer in the world, congratulating his ſafe return to Capree: And upon his arrival, Ceſar took him with great tenderneſs into his arms, introduced him into his palace, and ſeconded the frankneſs of his invitation with the generoſity of his reception and entertainment; but on the day following, Ceſar receiv'd letters of complaint from Herennius againſt Agrippa; ſetting forth, that being "three hundred thou-"ſand pieces in the emperor's debt, and the "money long ſince due, he had only demand-"ed ſatisfaction on the bond, and Agrippa "gave him the ſlip upon it: So that Ceſar was "now in danger to loſe his money." Tiberius took this ſo heinouſly, that he order'd the officers of his bed-chamber not to open a door to Agrippa till he had paid the debt. Agrippa, on the other hand, took no notice of the emperor's diſpleaſure, but addreſs'd himſelf to Antonia, the mother both of Germanicus and of Claudius, who came afterwards to the empire; and acquainting her with the exigency of his affairs, and how he was like to loſe Ceſar's favour for want of three hundred thouſand pieces, as aforeſaid, ſhe lent him the money in honour to the memory of Berenice, and of the friendſhip that had ever paſs'd betwixt them; beſide that Agrippa and her ſon Claudius had been brought up together from children, as play-fellows and companions. With this money Agrippa diſcharg'd the debt; and without any farther obſtacle or contradiction, reinſtated himſelf in the emperor's favour. This politick conduct gain'd ſo far upon Ceſar, that he committed his grand-child Tiberius Nero, the ſon of Druſus, to Agrippa's government and care; deſiring him to be ſtill about him, and watchful over him. Agrippa was ſo ſenſible of the obligations he had to Antonia, that he made his court in the firſt place however, to her grand child Caius, whom all people had a great honour and eſteem for, both for his own ſake, and for the reverence they bore to the memory of Germanicus, his his father. There was at that time one Allus, a freeman of Ceſar's, a Samaritan, who gave Agrippa credit for a million of pieces; part of it went to the payment of Antonia, and the reſt toward the expence of his entertainment in his attendances upon Caius, who had now taken him into the greateſt confidence and friendſhip imaginable.

As they two were one day together alone in a chariot, there happen'd to be ſome occaſion of mentioning Tiberius: "Ay, (ſays Agrip-"pa) I could wiſh with all my heart it would "pleaſe the heavens that Caius were in his "place." Theſe words were over-heard by Eutychus, Agrippa's freeman, and at that time charioteer; but for the preſent he made no words of it. Not long after, this man was charg'd with robbing his patron, and running away with ſome of his clothes; which in effect was true, and the man taken up upon it, and carry'd to Piſo, the governor of the place, to be examin'd about it. Piſo, upon the examination, ask'd him what made him run away. He made anſwer that Ceſar's life was in danger, and that he was going to make a diſcovery of the plot. Eutychus, upon this, was ſent bound to Capree, and there kept in chains by Tiberius, who was in all ſuch caſes the moſt unſettled dilatory man that ever was born, either prince or uſurper. He would not ſo much as admit embaſſadors, without delay, nor ſupply vacancies in governments of provinces, till the former deputies or governors were certainly dead. He had a way of letting priſoners lie a long time unheard too; and he gave his friends theſe reaſons for it. "If I "ſhould give embaſſadors (ſays he) too quick, "and too eaſy admittance, the ſooner they "are receiv'd the ſooner they are diſmiſs'd; "and the ſooner new ones would be ſent in "their places; ſo that I ſhould have nothing "elſe to do at this rate, but to give audiences, "and ſpend my whole time in admitting and "diſcharging embaſſadors. As for officers, "when places are once fill'd, it is eaſier to the "ſubject to keep them ſo than to change them; "for all magiſtrates are naturally covetous; "and eſpecially where they are upon their "behaviour for the keeping of their employ-"ments; for the leſs aſſurance they have to "continue in an office, the more haſte they "make to grow rich upon it; and to this pur-"poſe he made application of an old fable. "As a poor man (ſays he) lay wounded upon "the way, hardly in condition to help him-"ſelf, and ſwarms of flies upon his ſores, ſuck-"ing and tearing him, a compaſſionate good-"natur'd creature happening to paſs by, of-"fer'd him his ſervice to drive them away, "and eaſe him of his tormentors. No, no, "(ſays he) pray let them alone; for theſe flies "now their bellies are full are not near ſo "ſharp upon me as new comers will be that "are ſtarv'd and empty. This is the caſe, "(ſays he) betwixt ſubjects and freſh magiſ-"trates; who are but new tormentors." That this is the true character of Tiberius, needs no other proof than that in two and twenty years time of his reign, he ſent only two governors into Judea; that is to ſay, Gratus, and his ſucceſſor Pilate; and that he proceeded after the ſame dilatory manner in all other parts of the empire. The reaſon he gave alſo for the delay of bringing priſoners to their tryal, was to keep them the longer in pain, and to puniſh them for their paſt crimes, by a lingering torment worſe than death itſelf.

Eutychus overhears dangerous words betwixt Agrippa and Caius.

He informs Piſo, and is ſent bound to Tiberius.

The dilatory humour of Tiberius:

and his reaſons for't.

THIS was the true cauſe of Eutychus being kept ſo long in chains before Ceſar would vouchſafe to hear him; but Tiberius, after ſome time coming from Capree to Tuſculanum, about an hundred * furlongs from Rome, Agrippa deſired Antonia to move for Eutychus, that he might have a hearing, to the end it might be known once, what he had to object againſt his patron. Now Tiberius had a very great honour for Antonia, partly for nearneſs of blood, as being his ſiſter-in-law, and the widow of Druſus, and partly for the reputation of her modeſty and virtue in the refuſal of a ſecond marriage, tho' ſhe was earneſtly put upon it by Auguſtus himſelf; and this in the prime of her years too: Her whole converſation, in ſhort, being exemplary, without the leaſt blemiſh or ſcandal. Now Tiberius, over and above all other reſpects, had perſonal obligations alſo to Antonia never to be forgotten. For if it had not been for her ſagacity, faith, and induſtry, that deſperate plot of his minion Sejanus, had certainly coſt him his life; for he was a man of power and credit; the captain of his guards, and had engag'd ſeveral conſiderable men of the ſenators; divers of Ceſar's freemen, court-favourites, and military officers in the conſpiracy. In ſhort, he eſcap'd narrowly at laſt, and it was Antonia's vigilance and reſolution that defeated the treaſon, and brought him off; for ſo ſoon as ever ſhe heard of ſuch a practice a-foot, ſhe took minutes of every particular of the contrivance, and ſent them away from time to time to Capree, to Tiberius by the means of Pallas, a try'd ſervant and confident of Tiberius. By virtue of this diſcovery, both the confederacy itſelf, and the actors in it were laid open, and juſtice done upon Sejanus and his complices. If Antonia had a great hand with Tiberius before this mighty piece of ſervice, her power muſt be certainly much greater after it. So that upon the importunity of Agrippa, ſhe preſs'd Tiberius over and over to give Eutychus a hearing. "Well! ſays "Tiberius, if this fellow has bely'd Agrippa, "in any thing, let him content himſelf with "the puniſhment he has ſuffer'd already; but "let him have a care how he carries the pro-"ſecution too far, for fear the miſchief he "deſigns to Eutychus, ſhould upon a full ex-"amination of the matter, come at laſt home "to himſelf." Antonia gave Agrippa this caution; and the more ſhe inclin'd to moderation, the more eager was he to bring it to a ſcrutiny: inſomuch that Antonia, when ſhe ſaw he would not be ſaid nay, took her opportunity as Tiberius was paſſing by in a chair after dinner, Caius and Agrippa marching before him, to advance directly up to Tiberius; with a requeſt, that Eutychus might be call'd and hear'd: to which Tiberius gave her this anſwer: "I do here call the Gods to wit-"neſs, (ſays he) that what I am now about "to do, I do unwillingly, and only to grati-"fy your deſire." With theſe words, he commanded Macro the ſucceſſor to Sejanus in his commiſſion for the guards, to cauſe Eutychus to be brought thither. And immediately upon his coming, Ceſar put this queſtion to him. "What have you to ſay, (ſays he) "againſt your patron Agrippa, who gave you

Agrippa puts Antonia upon preſſing Tiberius to bring it to a hearing.

Ceſar at laſt yields to it, tho' unwillingly.

Macro brings Eutychus to Ceſar.

Eutychus delivers his information.

* An hundred furlongs amounted to almoſt thirteen Engliſh miles.

"your

" your freedom?" " Sir, (ſays Eutychus) as I " was driving Caius and Agrippa one day in " their chariot, and ſitting at their feet to do " my office, I overheard ſeveral diſcourſes " that paſs'd betwixt them, and among other " paſſages, Agrippa, I remember, ſpoke theſe " words to Caius. Ah, (ſays he) that we " could but once ſee the old man's exit, and " you left maſter of the world; for when he's " gone, his grandchild Tiberius might be ea- " ſily taken off; and over and above the uni- " verſal comfort it would bring mankind, I " myſelf might hope to come in for a part of " the bleſſing." Tiberius was apt enough to believe this information, for it ſtuck terribly in his ſtomach, that when he had ſo expreſly recommended Tiberius, his grandchild by Druſus, to the particular care and kindneſs of Agrippa, he ſhould never ſo much as look after him; but dedicate himſelf wholly to the ſervice of Caius. Tiberius, upon this, turning to Macro, " Put him in chains," ſays he; but Macro not underſtanding of whom he ſpoke (for he could not imagine any ſuch thing of Agrippa) made a little pauſe to be better informed in his meaning. Ceſar, in the mean time, after a turn or two in the Circus, ſeeing Agrippa ſtill at liberty, call'd to Macro again: " Did not I order, ſays he, that man to be " put in chains?" Which man, ſays Macro:" " That man, Agrippa, ſaid Tiberius." Agrippa then betook himſelf to prayers and ſupplications, adjuring Tiberius by the tenderneſs he had for the memory of his ſon, with whom he had the honour to be ſo well acquainted, and for the ſake of the ſervices he had been ſo happy as to render to his grandſon Tiberius, to vouchſafe him his pardon: but all to no purpoſe, for the guards dragg'd him away to priſon in his robes of honour, as they found him. The weather being extremely hot, and Agrippa ready to periſh with a burning raging drought, for want of drink, he ſpy'd one Thaumaſtus, a ſervant of Caius, with a pitcher of water in his hand, and call'd to him for a draught of it to quench his parching thirſt. He gave it him readily, and when he had taken it off: " Well! Thaumaſtus (ſays he) " ſince you have been ſo kind as to do me this " ſervice in my bonds, with the ſame frank- " neſs you formerly ſerv'd me in my better " fortunes, depend upon it that you ſhall ne- " ver repent this good office; for ſo ſoon as " ever I get over this difficulty, I will be " anſwerable to you that Caius ſhall give you " your liberty;" and he was afterward as good as his word; for ſo ſoon as ever he came to the crown, he begg'd Thaumaſtus of Caius, and made him free; entruſting him alſo with the management of his eſtate, and at his death recommended him to his ſon Agrippa, and to Berenice his daughter, to continue him in that charge, wherein he acquitted himſelf with great honour and eſteem all the remainder of his life.

Ceſar commands Macro to put Agrippa in chains.

The guards drag him to priſon in his robes.

As Agrippa was ſtanding in his chains before the palace, with other of his fellow-priſoners in the ſame condition, and leaning in a melancholick poſture upon a tree, there came an owl, and perch'd upon it. A German that was there in bonds taking notice of it, enquir'd of one of the ſoldiers who that man there in the purple was; and being given to underſtand that he was a Jew of the firſt quality, from an honourable extraction, he deſir'd the ſoldier to let him come a little nearer him; for he had a great mind to learn ſomething from him of his country. This being granted, and an interpreter allow'd him, the German ſpoke to him after this manner. " Young man, (ſays " he) this ſudden and ſurprizing change of " your fortune makes you ſad I perceive, and " you will not eaſily believe how near you " are to your deliverance under the favour " and protection of a divine providence that " watches over you. I call all the Gods to " witneſs, both yours, and ours, by whoſe " permiſſion it is that we are here in bonds, " that I do not ſpeak this to amuſe and flatter " you with vain hopes; for I know very well " that prognoſticks of this kind, if the event " does not anſwer the prediction, do a great " deal more hurt than good. But I reckon " it my duty, at what hazard ſoever, to tell " you, that you ſhall ſee ſuch a turn of times " and things, as ſhall advance you out of this " calamitous condition, to the moſt glorious " height of honour and power, and render " you the envy of thoſe that either deſpis'd " or pity'd you before. The remainder of " your days ſhall be happy, and you ſhall leave " children behind you to ſucceed to your good " fortunes. But now remember what I tell " you further, whenever you come to ſee this " bird again, the fifth day after it will be " your laſt. This is the ſhort ſum of what " heaven gives you to underſtand by this good " omen. My revelation is certain, and I de- " liver you the truth of the matter, to ſupport " you in your preſent trouble, with the hope " of better things to come. And I am now " to beſeech you further, that when you find " all this come to paſs, you will not forget " your fellow ſufferers; but conſult the de- " liverance of thoſe you leave behind you." This German's prophecy appear'd as ridiculous to Agrippa upon the telling of it, as it was afterwards wonderful in the accompliſhment. Antonia all this while laid the hard uſage of her friend extremely to heart; but taking for granted that Tiberius was not to be wrought upon, and conſequently that all applications and interceſſions would be but ſo much time caſt away, ſhe had no more to do, than by the means of Macro, to try if ſhe could make his priſon eaſier to him, by getting civil and good-natur'd ſoldiers about him, and leave to eat at the table with the officer that had him in cuſtody, allowing him the uſe of the bath every day, and the acceſs of his friends and freemen to viſit him: all which was granted accordingly, inſomuch that Silas, his friend, and Marſyas and Stychus, two of his freemen, brought him the diet ſtill that he loved beſt, and blankets (under a pretence of expoſing them to ſale) to lay under him in the night, the ſoldiers giving way to it, according to the hints they had from Macro.

A German's prediction upon it.

Tiberius inexorable. Antonia prevails with Macro to make Agrippa's condition eaſy to him.

WHEN Agrippa had been a priſoner in this ſort for a matter of ſix months, Tiberius returning from Capree, was taken at his firſt coming back with a faint indiſpoſition, which by degrees grew worſe and worſe, till he was quite given over. And now perceiving his caſe deſperate, he ſent Evodus his favourite-freemen to fetch his children to him early the next morning, to take the laſt leave of their dying father. I ſpeak of his adopted children; for Tiberius falls deſperately ſick, and orders Evodus to bring his children to him early the next morning.

An owl perches over Agrippa's head.

for he had none of his own: Druſus, his only ſon being dead and gone. But Druſus's ſon Tiberius, ſirnamed Gemellus, was yet alive; and ſo was Caius the ſon of his brother Germanicus, who was now at man's eſtate; a young man of letters, and excellently qualify'd for all honourable purpoſes: beſide, that he was the darling of the people, upon the account of the very reverence they had for the memory of his father's virtues; a prince of a wonderful modeſty in his manners, and gentleneſs in his converſation, without arrogating any thing to himſelf above others. By the reputation of this illuſtrious character, he did not only gain the favour of the ſenate and people, but of the provinces in general, whom he obliged with all manner of good offices and reſpects. His death, in fine, was not celebrated ſo much with pomp and ſhew, as with tears of tenderneſs and affection, and an inward ſorrow of heart: for the whole body of the people lamented the death of their prince, as if every particular man had loſt his own father. The reputation of Germanicus was of great advantage every way to his ſon Caius; but eſpecially among the ſoldiers, that were all ready to lay down their lives at his feet to ſerve him.

Caius generally belov'd.

TIBERIUS, after this, order'd Evodus to have his ſons come to him early the next morning, and put up a prayer to the Gods of his country to direct him by ſome particular token, which of the two he ſhould chuſe for his ſucceſſor, wiſhing with all his heart that the lot might fall upon Tiberius; but he durſt not venture, however, to prejudge and determine ſo high a point, without conſulting his oracle. And ſo he propoſed to govern himſelf by this token, that he of the two that came firſt to him in the morning, ſhould be his ſucceſſor. This reſolution being taken, he gave it in charge to his grandchild's tutor, to be ſure to bring his pupil to him by break of day, taking for granted, that heaven would declare itſelf in favour of Tiberius: but it fell out otherwiſe; for upon the emperor's ſending out Evodus by break of day next morning to look for his ſons at the door, and to bring him in firſt that he ſaw firſt, he found only Caius there, and told him that he muſt come to his father, and ſo took him in along with him. Young Tiberius, it ſeems, not imagining his Grandfather's buſineſs, ſlipt his time by ſtaying to take his breakfaſt. The emperor was not a little ſtartled at the ſight of Caius, to conſider how providence had defeated him in his deſign of diſpoſing of the government, by ſettling it contrary to his inclination: and the croſſing of his will was not the worſt of the caſe neither; for he was more concerned for the perſonal ſafety of his grandſon, than for the loſs of the empire. For where dominion is the queſtion, the longer ſword carries it; ambition knows no kindred; and among rivals for power, the one can never think himſelf ſafe, but in the ruin of the other. Tiberius was moſt ſuperſtitiouſly addicted to fortune-tellers, judicial aſtrologers, and that ſort of people; and govern'd his life in a great meaſure by their advice and direction. As he happen'd to caſt his eye upon Galba once, turning to ſome particular friends about him: "That man, (ſays he) will be emperor of "Rome." Upon the whole matter, none of the emperors ever put ſo much confidence in ſoothſayers and diviners as Tiberius, ſome of whoſe predictions were not altogether idle, as he ſometimes found by experience. But nothing ſtruck him deeper than this foreboding encounter of the two competitors; which wrought ſo ſenſibly upon him, that he gave his grandchild already for a dead man; and no body to blame neither, but himſelf, for giving heed to omens, when he might have liv'd free and eaſy, without preſſing into the ſecrets of God's hidden councils, and blaſting the peace of his life with unwarrantable hankerings after the knowledge of things to come; and this itch of preſcience was the plague he labour'd under. This unexpected diſappointment of the ſucceſſion, put his head quite out of tune for ſpeeches, but yet ſomewhat or other was to be ſaid, tho' never ſo much againſt his ſtomach, upon this occaſion; ſo that he deliver'd himſelf to this effect: "I ſhall "not need to tell you, my ſon Caius, (ſays "he) that Tiberius is the nearer to me in "blood of you two; but yet upon conſulting the good pleaſure of the immortal Gods, "and my own reaſon, I do here tranſfer the "rule of the Roman empire into your hands: "but I do likewiſe adjure you, that in the "exerciſe of this power, you do never forget "the obligation you have to him from whom "you receiv'd it; and that you ſhew your "gratitude to your patron, by all demonſtrations of love and friendſhip to your brother "Tiberius. I ask nothing more, in return for "the dignity I have now confer'd upon you; "(for next to the Gods, you owe it all to me) "than that you be not wanting in any thing "to him, whom nature itſelf hath made al-"moſt inſeparable from me. And I am to "mind you farther alſo, that it is as much "your intereſt as your duty to do what I ad-"viſe you to: for the ſecurity and ſplendor "of your own fortune depends in a great "meaſure upon the life and well-being of your "brother; and the day of his death will be "the eve to that of your miſery. Sovereign-"ty is a giddy and a ſlippery height, and it "is a dangerous place for a man to ſtand alone "upon; beſide that ſins againſt the ties and "inſtincts of conſanguinity and nature, never "fail of being follow'd by a divine vengeance." Theſe were the laſt words of Tiberius to Caius, who promis'd to pay a punctual obedience to all his orders, but never intended it. For ſo ſoon as ever he was poſſeſs'd of his command, he put his brother to death, according to the preſage of Tiberius, and he himſelf a few years afterwards was taken off by a conſpiracy.

He gives Caius the government, with a charge to be kind to his brother.

Caius promiſes fair, but takes away his brother's life upon the death of Tiberius.

TIBERIUS dy'd within a few days; declaring Caius his ſucceſſor, after a reign of two and twenty years, five months and thirteen days. Caius ſucceeded him, and the fourth in the roll of the emperors. The rumour of the death of Tiberius was joyful news to the Romans; but they durſt not build too much upon the truth of it; not that they did not wiſh it true with all their hearts, and would have given all the world long before to have had it ſo, but they were afraid of being over-credulous, and of diſcovering the ſatisfaction they conceiv'd upon it before they were ſure of the thing itſelf; for there were ſo many ſpies and informers up and down, Tiberius dies, and Caius ſucceeds him.

Tiberius conſults the oracle, which to make his ſucceſſor. The oracle bids him chuſe him that comes to him firſt next morning.

The character of Tiberius.

that ſuch a miſtake would have been certain death. He was fierce and implacable, to the higheſt degree; never any man was ſo tyrannically rigorous to the nobility. He had his inexorable averſions upon no other ground than mere humour and caprice; and ſo brutally cruel in his very inclination, that as he order'd it, death was a mercy from him. Wherefore it concern'd the people to be cautious how they ſeem'd pleas'd with the news, conſidering the mortal danger of it, if it ſhould be found a miſtake. The tidings of this emperor's death were no ſooner come to Marſyas, Agrippa's freeman, but he poſted away immediately to carry the bleſſed news to his patron, whom he found going into a bath, and whiſper'd him in Hebrew, theſe words; "The lion, (ſays he) is dead." Agrippa eaſily apprehended his meaning, and in a kind of extaſy of joy: "Well! (ſays he) how "ſhall I ever be able to requite thee for this, "and ſeveral other good offices that thou haſt "render'd me, if it be as thou ſay'ſt?" The captain that had him in cuſtody, obſerving what haſte Marſyas made to deliver his errand, and how well pleas'd Agrippa was with what he had told him, made no doubt but there was ſomething more than ordinary in the matter, and ſo deſir'd Agrippa to tell him the buſineſs; who made ſome difficulty at firſt, but upon preſſing him farther, Agrippa, in a kind of confidence, told him the whole ſtory. The officer joy'd him of the good news, and treated him with a ſplendid ſupper: but as they were in the middle of their jollity and cups, comes a meſſenger with intelligence that Tiberius was paſt danger, and would quickly come to town. Theſe words went to the very heart of the captain, who being conſcious to himſelf that he had forfeited his head for making merry with a priſoner, upon the news of Ceſar's death, puſh'd Agrippa in a rage from his ſeat, and in a menacing tone ſaid: "Do you think to come off thus with your "lies, and your tricks? and could you find "no body but me to impoſe your fictions up-"on, of the death of Ceſar? no no, (ſays "he) this ſawcineſs of your tongue ſhall coſt "you dear:" and ſo he call'd to have him put in chains again, and kept ſtricter than before. When Agrippa had paſs'd the whole night in this condition, the report of Ceſar's death was reviv'd the next day: every body talking of it publickly, and people offering up ſacrifices for joy. Soon after this, there came two letters from Caius; one to the ſenate, to inform them that Tiberius had declar'd him his ſucceſſor; and the other to Piſo, the governor of the city, to the ſame purpoſe; appointing alſo that Agrippa ſhould be diſcharg'd of the priſon, and allow'd the liberty of the houſe wherein he liv'd before; ſo that he was now out of all danger and apprehenſion; for tho' he was ſtill in cuſtody, he was in all other reſpects in a ſtate of freedom. Upon the return of Caius to Rome, and the body of Tiberius along with him, the funerals were celebrated with all magnificence and ſolemnity. The emperor would have diſcharg'd Agrippa the ſame day; but Antonia was againſt it, not for want of good-will to the man, but it would be an indecency ſhe thought, to do it ſo haſtily; and a kind of diſreſpect to Tiberius, to releaſe a priſoner of his committing all in a hurry. But it was not many days after this, however, that he took him home; had him ſhav'd, new rob'd, and a crown put upon his head, as ſucceſſor to the Tetrarchy that Philip had; created him king, with an addition to him of the Tetrarchy of Lyſania; and beſtowing upon him a golden chain of the ſame weight with the iron one he had before; ſending alſo Marallus governor into Judea.

IN the ſecond year of the reign of Caius, Agrippa obtain'd leave of Ceſar to go for a while, and ſettle affairs at home; with a promiſe to be back again by ſuch a time. It was a wonderful ſurprize to them, to ſee Agrippa with a crown upon his head; a remarkable inſtance of the inſtability of fortune, and the uncertainty of human affairs, in this change of his condition from one exceſs to another: ſome look'd upon him to be a wiſe and a happy man, and ſtanding ſo firm againſt all diſcouragements; but others were ſo amaz'd at the circumſtances of this revolution, that they could hardly believe what they ſaw.

*The envy of Herodias. She preſſes her husband to beg ſomething for himſelf. Herod and his wife ſets out for Rome. Agrippa ſets Fortunatus for a ſpy upon them. IT was ſo intolerable a mortification to Herodias, (the ſiſter of Agrippa, and the wife of Herod the Tetrarch of Gallilee and Perea, the country beyond Jordan,) to ſee her brother, who was forc'd but the other day to run away from his creditors, now upon his return ſo much advanced above her husband in ſplendor, dignity, and power, that the haughtineſs of her ſpirit was not able to brook it; eſpecially to ſee him in the pomp of his royal ſtate and robes, ſhewing himſelf to the people, and the mulitude crowding about him. The envy that this thought and ſpectacle gave her. was ſo inſupportable, that in the violence of her paſſion, nothing would ſerve her, but her huſband muſt immediately go to Rome, and never leave Ceſar till he had got the like honour and preferment for himſelf. "It would "be the breaking of her heart (ſhe ſaid) "to ſee her husband that was the ſon of "a king, and ſo fair both in the affections of "the people, and in his own reaſonable pre-"tenſions to ſucceed him, ſtand tamely look-"ing on like a private contented wretch; and "at the ſame time Agrippa the bankrupt "ſon of Ariſtobulus, a criminal that had ſuf-"fer'd under the hands of juſtice, advanced "to a throne: but my dear husband (ſaid ſhe) "if you have had the patience hitherto, to "live below the birth and quality of your "father's ſon, it is certainly high time now, "however, to bethink yourſelf of doing ſome "ſort of right, both to your credit, and to "your family, without truckling to a perſon

Herod oppoſes it, but yields at laſt. Agrippa ſets Fortunatus a ſpy upon them.

HEROD was a great lover of his eaſe, beſide that he had no great opinion of the court of Rome; ſo that he try'd all manner of ways to divert his wife from ſuch a reſolution, perſuading her to reſt ſatisfy'd with their preſent fortunes and enjoyments; but the more earneſt he was one way, the more eager was Herodias the other; having taken up an uncontroulable reſolution to purſue her point at any rate. She followed him ſo cloſe, in fine, that he was wrought upon at laſt, even in his own defence, to comply with her importunities, and ſo they ſet out for Rome together, with an equipage ſuitable enough to the occaſion. Agrippa being aware all this while of every thing that paſs'd, bethought himſelf of this way of countermining them. He kept his freeman Fortunatus in readineſs with letters and preſents for the emperor, who, ſo ſoon as ever Herod ſhould ſet ſail from Rome, was to put to ſea after him, with particular inſtructions how to behave himſelf when he came there. Fortunatus had a quick paſſage, and arriv'd at Puteoli juſt with Herod; but Caius happened to be at that time at the Baie, a little Town in Campagne, about five * furlongs from Puteoli; a place famous for royal palaces; the emperors that frequented the hot baths there, ſome for their pleaſure, others for their health, ſtriving to outdo one another in the ſtate and curioſity of their buildings. Upon coming to this place, Herod made his reverence to the emperor, and Fortunatus within one minute after preſented him his letters. Caius upon the peruſal found them to contain a direct accuſation of Herod: Firſt, for being a party to the conſpiracy of Sejanus againſt Tiberius; and now again for ſiding with Artabanus the Parthian againſt Caius, offering this for a proof againſt him, that he had at that inſtant a magazine of arms for ſeventy thouſand men. Ceſar, preſently in a paſſion, demanded of Herod whether he had ſuch a proviſion of arms or not? The thing was ſo plain and evident, that he could not deny it; ſo that the emperor never look'd further for any proof of the treaſon; but took away his government and gave it to Agrippa, with his money alſo, as a reward for his diſcovery. As for Herod, he ſentenced him to a perpetual baniſhment and confinement in Lyons, a famous city in France; but for Herodias, whom he knew to be Agrippa's ſiſter, he gave her the command of whatever belong'd to her, and without making her a partaker of her husband's calamity, he promis'd to treat her favourably for her brother's ſake; whereupon ſhe told him: " Sir, (ſays ſhe) " you ſpeak like a great emperor, and pray " give me leave to behave my ſelf like an " indulgent wife. I am not in a condition to " enjoy the benefit of this bounty; for I do " not think it reaſonable or honeſt, after the " ſhare I have had in my husband's better " fortunes, now to abandon him in his adver- " ſity." This greatneſs of mind in a woman gave ſuch an offence to Caius, that upon the ſenſe of this indignity he baniſh'd, confiſcated, and confined Herodias, together with her husband. And this was the vengeance that God brought upon Herodias for the malignity of her envy to the ſucceſs of her brother; and likewiſe the puniſhment that God inflicted upon Herod for being ſo eaſily overrul'd by a giddy, ſpiteful, and impetuous woman.

Caius. Agrippa being aware all this while of every thing that paſs'd, bethought himſelf of this way of countermining them. Caius writes a menacing letter to Petronius: But the news of Caius's death came to his hand before the letter. Petronius deliver'd by Providence.*

Caius takes himself to be affronted.

CAIUS took it for such an affront, to find that the Jews were the only people in the world who contemn'd his commands, that he presently sent away Petronius into Syria, in the place of Vitellius, with orders to enter Judea with a strong army, and set up his statue in the temple there. If they submitted to it, well and good! But in case of refusal, his orders were to force it upon them by dint of arms. Petronius took upon himself the administration, and made what haste he could towards the putting of Cesar's commands in execution: That is to say, he got a body of auxiliaries together, and two Roman legions, which he put into winter quarters in Ptolemais, to be ready to march early the next spring. Caius had an account of his proceedings from time to time, and gave him thanks for his industry; bidding him go on boldly, for he was resolv'd he said to bring down the contumacy of that stubborn people.

He sends Petronius to Judea, to set up his statue in the temple there.

Petronius follows his orders.

The Jews beg of Petronius at Ptolemais not to press them in it.

THERE came at this time vast multitudes of Jews to Petronius at Ptolemais, begging of him for Heaven's sake not to press them upon any thing against their consciences, and the rules of their profession. Or if it was of indispensable necessity that a statue must be set up in their temple, they desired he would take away their lives first, and then he might do afterwards what he pleased. But so long as they had breath in their bodies, they could never suffer the violation of those laws and precepts that had been handed down to them thro' so many generations from their famous progenitors. Petronius reply'd quick upon them, "This that you say might have some "influence upon me, (says he) if I were at "my own liberty; but being under Cesar's "command, I must obey Cesar's order, and I "dare do no other." To this the Jews reply'd, "That if he could not depart from his "master's orders, neither could they from "theirs; and that by the grace of God "they were resolv'd to tread in the steps "of their forefathers, as they had ever hitherto done. We are not so mean (said they) "as for the saving of a miserable temporary "life to hazard the forfeiture of a blessed "eternity, by prevaricating with the laws of "God. No, no, Sir, let but our laws and "our religion be safe, and what becomes of "our carcasses, and our fortunes, we matter "not. Our trust is in God, and in the "assurance of his providence and protection, "we are resolv'd to abide all hazards, "whether we shall rather chuse to incur a "perpetual infamy by our cowardice, on the "one hand, or the wrath of God by our "disobedience on the other; and in short, "whether we shall obey the voice of heaven, "or the voice of Caius, and which of the "two, be you the judge."

They expostulate with Petronius.

PETRONIUS gathering from his discourse the inflexible stiffness of these people, and that it was impossible for him to set up Cesar's statue, but by the last extremity of blood and slaughter, he took some of his friends and domesticks about him, with whom he went to Tiberias to be within distance of being more particularly inform'd in the manners, customs, and affairs of the people he had to deal with. This approach of the Romans put the Jews in a great dread of a war; but in a greater, for fear of an invasion upon their customs and religion. So that upon this alarum, several thousands of them in a body went directly to Petronius, desiring him with most passionate instances not to drive the multitude upon desperate necessities, by offering to prophane their holy city with forbidden images. "What, "says Patronius, and will you then rashly in-"gage in a war with Cesar, without so much "as considering either his strength, or your "own weakness?" They told Petronius, No; they did not propose to fight, but rather die themselves than to sacrifice their laws; casting themselves down upon the ground at the same time, and baring their necks, as who should say, "strike when you "will, we are ready for you." They continued at this pass for a matter of forty days without either ploughing or sowing, or attending any office of husbandry, tho' the season of the year requir'd it: For they were all unanimously agreed upon it, rather to die than to admit the statue.

Petronius informs himself in the Jewish customs.

The Jews draw into a body, and desire Petronius to desist.

They reason the case with Petronius.

and in the mean time neglect their tillage.

Aristobulus and several eminent Jews side with them.

WHILE matters were in this state, Aristobulus, the brother of king Agrippa, and Elcias sirnamed the Great, with several noblemen of the family, and others of the first quality among the Jews, apply'd themselves to Petronius; "desiring him to consider, that they "were an obstinate sort of People he had to "do withal, and how dangerous it might be "to hurry them into despair: But their ad-"vice was for him to inform Caius of the dif-"ficulties of the case; the stubbornness of the "party, how resolutely bent they were against "the setting up of the statue, and how they "neglected the tillage of their land at the "proper season of the year, not with any "thought of a rebellion, but in a determina-"tion rather to die than to blast the inte-"grity of their religion; that this neglect of "their husbandry must of necessity expose the "country to robbers and rapines, and disable "them from paying their taxes. They sug-"gested that possibly this might make Cesar "relent, and consequently remove all colour "for a rebellion: or if nothing could divert "him from carrying on the war, that might "be done at last as well as before." Thus far went Aristobulus.

They desire Petronius to lay the case before Cesar.

PETRONIUS was no stranger to the intemperate and revengeful humour of Caius; especially where any stop or delay was put to the execution of his commands; but yet such was the awe and reverence he had for God, and his own conscience, and such the horror he had had to think of ſacrificing ſo many lives to the fury of a madman, that was with theſe conſiderations, together with the credit of the interceſſor, the importance of the affair, and the danger of tranſporting an obſtinate ſort of people into deſperation, he came to a reſolution of writing plainly to Caius all the difficulties of the caſe, at what hazzard ſoever; for he thought thus with himſelf: "What if "all this ſhould do no good now! what if "inſtead of reaſoning him into a better mind, "theſe trifling expoſtulations ſhould rather "provoke and enflame him, and bring the "ſtorm upon my own head, that I am now "labouring to avert from others! I ſhall have "this comfort yet at the worſt, either that I "dye in the poſt of an honeſt man, or at leaſt "that I did not decline the expoſing of my "life, even to an appearing certainty of ruin, "in the diſcharge of a publick duty, and for "the common ſafety of an innocent people."

Petronius deliberates upon the matter.

PETRONIUS, upon this deliberation, ſummon'd a meeting of the Jews at Tiberius, where they attended in prodigious numbers; and that which he had to ſay to them was this: "It is not of my own head, (ſays he) "that I have undertaken this expedition; but "upon the command of Ceſar. I ſhall not "need to tell you the danger of deferring the "execution of my orders, for ſovereign pow-"ers will not be trifled with: to ſay nothing "of the equity and reaſon of the thing, in "my ſubmitting to the authority of a prince "that has been the raiſing and the making of "me. But yet after all this now, as the caſe "ſtands, I no not ſo much conſider my own "perſonal ſecurity, or my credit with my "maſter, as I do the welfare and preſervation "of a conſcious people in the warrantable "defence of their worſhip and laws. Neither "do I approve of the prophaning of God's "holy houſe at the pleaſure of lawleſs princes. "Wherefore I am now ſending an expreſs to "Caius, to let him know your final reſolu-"tion about the ſtatue. And it ſhall be none "of my fault neither, if the emperor does "not comply with you in every thing elſe that "you can honeſtly deſire. May the divine "providence that over-rules all human pow-"ers and purpoſes, preſerve your religion ſa-"cred and inviolate, and grant that the em-"peror's exceſſive affectation of glory in this "particular, may never be charged to his ac-"count. As for my on part, if it ſhall be my "lot to fall under his diſpleaſure for this "liberty; tho' to the loſs of life and fortune, "I am prepared for it: provided only that I "may never live to ſee ſo many good men de-"ſtroy'd only for well doing. Wherefore let "every man betake himſelf to his own home "and buſineſs. Go to your lands and tillage "again, and leave me to manage with the em-"peror. I am juſt now ſending away to "him; and you may depend upon it, that "nothing ſhall be wanting to your ſatisfac-"tion, that I myſelf and my friends are able "to do for you." With theſe words he diſmiſs'd the aſſembly; bad them hope the beſt, and take care of their husbandry. Petronius had no ſooner made an end of ſpeaking theſe comfortable things to the Jews, but the goodneſs of God appeared in ſo extraordinary a providence, that every body look'd upon it as a manifeſt declaration from heaven, in favour of what Petronius was now a doing; for ſo ſoon as ever he had deliver'd himſelf, there fell a ſhower to the admiration of all people, in as clear a day as ever ſhin'd, and without one cloud to be ſeen. This happened after ſo long a drought, that they were almoſt out of hope of having any more rain; and tho' now and then they ſaw perhaps a flying cloud, it blew over yet without any effect. This wonderful relief beyond all thought and expectation, was look'd upon by the Jews as a bleſſing upon Petronius's prayers, and as an earneſt of more to come: Neither was any body more ſenſible of it than Petronius himſelf, either of the prodigy, or of the interpretation of it: for it was ſo convincing an evidence from heaven in favour of the Jews, that it would not bear the leaſt doubt or contradiction. Petronius was very particular in his report to the emperor in this whole affair, and laid all the neceſſary points before him: As what might be the conſequence of purſuing ſuch a multitude of ſtubborn people to ſuch extremities, and making ſo many thouſand men deſperate; for nothing but abſolute violence could ever force them into a compliance: Beſide that in the violent proſecution of them, Caius would but ſink his own revenue, and puniſh himſelf, which would turn afterwards to his eternal reproach: Subjoining likewiſe to all the reſt, that the Jews were a people acceptable to God, who had given many wonderful inſtances of his peculiar care over them.

He ſummons the Jews to Tiberius.

Petronius's Letter to Ceſar.

WHEN Petronius's letters came to Ceſar, king Agrippa happen'd to be at Rome, and every day more and more in the good graces of the emperor; a kindneſs that he cultivated by all the ſtudy and application imaginable. As in particular, he made Caius one treat, that for expenſe, variety, curioſity, delicacy, order, and contrivance, out-did all that ever was heard of before him; not excepting the moſt ſplendid entertainments even of Ceſar himſelf. Caius was ſo taken with the generous magnificence of this collation, and with the hearty good will of it too; for to come up to it, Agrippa had expended even more than he could well afford, that he reſolved to enter into a kind of competition, and vie good offices with him. When the wine hand a little warm'd him, the humour took him in the head, to make Agrippa merry alſo, and ſo he accoſted him thus: "Agrippa (ſays he) this "is not the firſt proof I have had of your "friendſhip and affection. In the days of "Tiberius I had many evidences of it to your "hazard; and you have now oblig'd me to "your coſt; and in ſo exceſſive a manner too, "that you have conſulted my honour and plea-"ſure, more than your own convenience. It "would be a baſe thing for me now to ſuffer "myſelf to be overcome by benefits, and "therefore I am reſolved at preſent to make "you ſome amends for any thing that I ever "fell ſhort in before; and the addition that I "intend to my former bounty, ſhall be ſuch as "will very much advance the condition of "your life and fortune for the future." Caius expected, upon this frank and unlimited promiſe, that Agrippa ſhould preſently have begg'd lands, commiſſions, nay whole provinces, and ample revenues. But Agrippa, on the other ſide, though prepar'd beforehand what to ask,

Agrippa at Rome when Ceſar receiv'd it.

Agrippa preſents Ceſar with a ſplendid treat; who promiſes a large requital.

A ſtrange Providence in favour of Petronius.

Agrippa contents himself with the bleſſing of Ceſar's favour ſuſpended the declaring of it a while, till it might fall in afterward with the better grace as by the by. "Sir, (ſays he) as I had no "private ends of my own, in the little ſervi- "ces I did you in the time of Tiberius; ſo I "propoſe nothing more to myſelf at preſent, "than the comfort of your favour. You have "done more for me already than I could rea- "ſonably either hope, or ſo much as wiſh "for; and though I very well underſtand "that you have greater things yet in your "power; give me leave however to make this "profeſſion with acknowledgments for what I "have receiv'd, that I neither deſerve nor ſeek "for any thing farther." Caius was ſo amazed at the modeſty and moderation of the man, that he the more earneſtly importun'd Agrippa to ask him ſome boon or other, and let it be what it would, it ſhould never be deny'd him. "Well ſir, (ſays Agrippa) ſince you are ſo "generous as to lay this kind command upon "me, I ſhall preſume to offer you one requeſt; "and it ſhall be neither wealth nor honour; for "by your favour, (ſays he) I have enough of "both already: But the granting of that "which I have to deſire will eſtabliſh you in "the favour both of God and man; and it "will be to my own immortal glory too, if I "may but obtain this conceſſion, after ſo many "others, to crown all the reſt. My deſire is "only this, that you will recal your order to "Petronius for ſetting up your ſtatue in the "temple of the Jews." Agrippa knew well enough that this propoſal was like the chance of a die, for life or death, as that was the hazard of croſſing any of Caius's decrees; but yet however, betwixt the obliging influence of the treat, and the ſhame of refuſing a requeſt that he himſelf had ſo publickly extorted, together with a juſt deference to the virtue of a man that ſet a higher value upon the comfort of a good conſcience, and the peace of his country, than upon the ſplendid vanities of wealth and power; the emperor granted him what he ask'd, and ſo wrote to Petronius; approving all he had done in drawing his troops together, and obſerving his orders. "As for the ſtatue, (ſays he) if it be ſet up "already, let it ſtand; and if it be not, trou- "ble yourſelf no farther about it; but diſ- "charge your army, and go back again to Sy- "ria. I am content to remit this diſobedi- "ence for Agrippa's ſake, for whom I have "ſo great an honour and reſpect that I can "deny him nothing." This was the ſubſtance of the emperor's letter to Petronius, which was written before there was any ſuſpicion of an inſurrection intended among the Jews: But Caius, being a man without either honeſty or ſhame; and ſo abandon'd to the extravagant liberties of a furious choler, that he accounted it a mark of dignity and greatneſs to be ſwaggering and outrageous; this man, I ſay, upon the rumour of a commotion among the Jews that follow'd ſoon after, broke out into ſuch a paſſion to ſee his authority ſo affronted by that rebellious people, that he immediately chang'd his ſtile, and wrote a ſecond letter to Petronius to this effect. "Since you have "thought fit to do more for the Jews money "than for my commands, as appears by your "neglecting the one to gratify the other, "be you yourſelf the judge what you are to "expect now from my indignation and juſtice. "I am reſolv'd to make an example of you, "both to the preſent age and to poſterity, to "give the world to underſtand that ſovereign "power is not to be dally'd with." This letter was ſent to the preſident while Ceſar was yet alive, but not delivered till afterwards; the bearer of it having a ſlow paſſage: So that the death of Caius came firſt to Petronius, to whom God was infinitely merciful and gracious, in conſideration of the zeal he ſhew'd, and the dangers he underwent, for his honour, and for the religion of his people the Jews: But Caius, being cut off in the career of his blaſphemous vanity, for uſurping to himſelf divine honours, Petronius had the thanks of the Romans, as well as of the provincials, for his eminent ſervices to the publick upon that occaſion; and more eſpecially the acknowledgments of the prime men of the ſenate, whom Caius took a pride as well as a delight to torment and trample upon, in a more particular way of inſolence and ſcorn. He was cut off ſoon after that denouncing letter to Petronius: But as to the ground of the conſpiracy, and manner of executing it, we ſhall ſet it forth in another place. The news of the emperor's death to Petronius was follow'd with the letter that brought him the menace of his own: And as he could not under thoſe circumſtances but rejoice at the former; ſo neither could he but magnify and admire the goodneſs and providence of God, that in the ſame inſtant rewarded the veneration he had paid to the honour of his holy temple, and likewiſe deliver'd the Jews out of their diſtreſs. By this wonderful providence was the life of Petronius preſerv'd.

The town is well wall'd and fortify'd, with the river Euphrates about it; and not far from it, another ſtrong city call'd Niſibis, upon the ſame river. There was no fear or danger of any enemy breaking in upon this quarter: So that the Jews laid up in theſe two places the common ſtock of their holy treaſure, as it was dedicated and brought in from time to time according to cuſtom. From hence it was tranſmitted to Jeruſalem in the proper ſeaſon, under ſtrong convoys, for fear of the Parthians upon the road, who were then maſters of Babylon. There were among the Jews of Nearda, two brothers; Aſineus, and Anileus: Their father was dead, and their mother had put them out to the weaving trade, of learning to make ſail-cloth, which is accounted no diſparagement among thoſe people where the men are us'd to card and ſpin. Theſe brothers coming one day late to work, their maſter gave them correction for it, which they took ſo heinouſly, that they preſently arm'd themſelves with what came next in the houſe, and fled away to a place upon the parting of the river, where was great plenty of corn, graſs, fruit, and all manner of proviſions for a winter ſtore. While they lay in this retreat, there gather'd about them a neceſſitous crew of bold luſty young fellows, that armed and liſted themſelves under their command; no body daring to controul them. With the aſſiſtance of this party they erected an impregnable fort, and then they appointed officers and collectors whom they ſent up and down the neighbourhood to raiſe contributions; with ample aſſurances of friendſhip and protection to thoſe that comply'd, againſt all oppoſers whatſoever, and threatening deſtruction both to man and beaſt in caſe of refuſal: So that the people were under a kind of neceſſity of doing whatever they would have them; being by this time grown ſo numerous and powerful, that they were not able to reſiſt them: Inſomuch that the king of Parthia was ſtartled at this commotion.

The king of Parthia takes the Alarum.

THE prince of Babylon, upon this intelligence, finding himſelf concern'd to nip the ſedition in the bud, drew his troops together both out of Parthia, and Babylon, and march'd away preſently with the groſs of his army to get up with the mutineers time enough to ſurprize them. When he was advanced by defilees and by-ways, to the skirts of a mooriſh piece of ground, he made an halt; and depending upon it, that the next day, being the ſabbath, they would not venture a battle, he moved gently forward; propounding to fall upon them at unawares, and make ſure of a victory. While Aſineus was at this time repos'd upon a bank with his companions about him, and his arms lying by: "Hark ye fel"low ſoldiers (ſays he) methinks I hear the "neighing of horſes: Not ſuch a neighing, as "if they were ſcattered and at paſture, but
"the neighing of horſes preſſing to a battle.
"Nay I fancy I hear the champing of their "bits too; and had beſt have a care we be not
"circumvented: Wherefore for certainty
"ſake, let ſome body go out this inſtant for
"diſcovery: And I wiſh I may find myſelf
"miſtaken." Scouts were ſent out accordingly, and in a very little time came back again upon the ſpur, with news that Aſineus was in the right, for the enemy was at hand; and upon the very point of executing their revenge. They have horſes enough, ſays the ſcout, to over-run and trample us all under foot: Beſide, (ſays he) that we are but ſo many naked men, and forbidden by the very laws of our religion to prophane the ſabbath with any ſort of reſiſtance. But Aſineus was quite of another opinion, and told them it was an unreaſonable thing for them to ſtand ſtill, and have their throats cut only to gratify a barbarous enemy.
"No, my friends, (ſays he) conſult your cou"rage, and the ſovereign law of all laws, your "preſent neceſſity. Wherefore follow my "example, that at the worſt we may not fall
"unreveng'd, and ſo let us commit the reſt
"to providence." Upon this exhortation and encouragement, he betook himſelf to his arms, and led his companions to the combat, where finding the enemy careleſs and ſecure, and in a poſture, rather to take poſſeſſion of a victory, than to diſpute it, they took them unprovided; made a great ſlaughter upon the place, and put the reſt to flight.

The ſcouts give notice of an enemy at hand.

The law of neceſſity is a diſpenſation to that of the ſabbath.

Aſineus falls on, and gives the enemy a great overthrow.

THE bravery of the two brothers gave the king of Parthia, upon the news of this defeat, ſuch a curioſity and impatience to have an interview, and to exchange ſome diſcourſe with them, that he ſent them one of his guards that he moſt confided in, with this meſſage. "I have a commiſſion from Arta-
"banus the king of Parthia to tell you, (ſays
"he) that tho' you have been very injurious
"to him in making this inroad into his do-
"minions, he is yet ready to bury all paſt
"controverſies in the eſteem he has for the "character he hath heard of your perſons.
"And I am farther to acquaint you in my ma-
"ſter's name, that without any fraud, or in"direct meaning, he deſires to join in a "league of friendſhip with you. And I am

"nour, all aſſurances that you yourſelves can

"your journey back and forward. You will "find the king a munificent and a generous
"prince, and ready upon all occaſions to give
"you farther proofs of his gracious inclinati-
"on and bounty." Aſineus was not over fond of the journey, notwithſtanding the frankneſs of the invitation; but he ſent his brother Anileus however upon the compliment, with ſuch preſents, as he was able to furniſh. Upon his coming to the king, he found his acceſs open and eaſy; but Artabanus taking notice that he came alone, ask'd him why he did not bring his brother along with him: ſo Anileus gave the king to underſtand, that he was ſafe in the bog where he was, and not willing to truſt himſelf any where elſe at mercy. The king underſtanding diffidence to be the cauſe, ſwore by his Gods, that not a hair of either of their heads ſhould be touch'd: And for a ratification of his oath, he gave Anileus his right hand upon it; which, with the Barbarians, is the moſt ſacred tye of good faith that can be given: for after that ceremony paſt, they are ſo far from any apprehension of being deceiv'd, that there's no room after it, even for jealousy itself, or the very suspicion of false dealing. Artabanus, upon this assurance, sent Aniléus back again to bring his brother; in contemplation of the services they two might do him by keeping those provinces in awe, that were wavering toward a revolt in the king's absence, by the assistance of the party they brought along with them. And he did not know neither, but that when he himself was employ'd in the suppressing of a rebellion on the one hand, Asineus might be fortifying himself with men and strong forts, and doing mischief about Babylon on the other. This was the reason of the king's sending for Asineus.

Aniléus on the king's oath, fetches his brother.

Now Asineus understanding by the report of his brother, how great a tenderness Artabanus had express'd for them both, and with what earnestness of oaths and protestations he confirmed the sincerity of all his professions, was easily prevail'd upon to wait upon the king with Aniléus, and so they went together. Artabanus received them with great easiness and good will; but upon comparing the dignity of Asineus's mind with the simple appearance, and in truth the disagreeable figure of his person, he was not a little surpriz'd at the disproportion; and said to some of his friends, that the soul of that man was never made for his body. He took occasion one day as he was at the table to speak of him to Abdagasus, his general, of his martial performances, and feats of arms, very much, in fine, to his advantage. Abdagasus made no other reply, but only to beg his majesty's leave to cut his throat in revenge for the affront he had put upon the Parthians. "No, (says the king) I shall ne-"ver suffer such a thing as that, certainly, to "a man that has committed himself to my "honour, and whom I am bound both by oath "and contract to protect. But, (says he) if "you have such a mind to exercise your cou-"rage, you may find a way of vindicating "the Parthians without making me forsworn. "You have no more to do, than to attack him "in his return without making me privy to "your purpose." The next morning early the king call'd for Asineus again." "It is "time young man, (says he) for you to go home "again, before the animosity of my officers "run too high, for you may have mischief "done you, and not in my power perhaps to "prevent it. Pray let me commend Babylon "to your care, and do what you can to main-"tain peace there, and preserve the province "from robberies. Once for all, you have "committed your life into my hands, and "your safety shall be to me as that of my "own heart:" And so with those words, and a competency of honourable presents, the king dispatch'd him away to take charge of his command, where he apply'd himself instantly to the business of his commission, in building of forts; repairing and fortifying as he saw occasion; acquitting himself, in fine, to so universal a satisfaction, that never any man before him arrived at such a degree of reputation and power in so short a time, and from so slender a beginning: and this, not only among the great men of Babylon, but the Parthian governors and commanders had likewise the same esteem for him; his authority all this while increasing with the strength of his arms and party: insomuch that Mesopotamia was as good as entirely under his direction.

The two brothers go to the king together

Abdagasus the general, asks Artabanus leave to cut Asineus's throat.

The king of Parthia's answer.

Artabanus advises Asineus to be gone, and gives him the command of Babylon.

Asineus departs, and betakes himself to the business of his commission.

The brothers gain a general esteem.

Things went on in this prosperous way with the two brothers, for a matter of fifteen years, highly to the satisfaction of the world, and their own glory. But when they came once to decline in their piety and manners, and abandoning the study of virtue, and the discipline and precepts of their forefathers, to give themselves up to sensual pleasures and foreign innovations, they sunk then in their credit too. As for example: There happen'd to come into these provinces a certain Parthian governor, and his wife along with him: a miracle of a woman, as well for her admirable qualities, as for the charms of her person and beauty. This woman (whether upon fame, or upon sight, is uncertain) Aniléus fell desperately in love with; and in the impotency of his passion, having no other way to compass his end, he made war upon her husband; kill'd him upon the first encounter; got possession of the woman, and so took her to his bed. This adventure was the source of all the terrible calamities that befel them afterward. This woman, whether she was at home or abroad, had constantly about her certain images of Barbarian Gods. She was now a widow and a prisoner, and having privately conceal'd some of these idols, she took her opportunity of worshipping them for a while, only by stealth. But upon Aniléus's taking her to himself, and owning her publickly for his wife, she did as publickly own the exercise of her religion too, without carrying the business any longer as a secret. The best friends that the two brothers had, were most horridly disgusted at the licence of this abominable practice in the marrying of a barbarous woman, and an idolatress, in so audacious a defiance of the rites, laws and customs of the Jews. Let this serve for a caution to princes in time to come, how they depart from their duty to God, to gratify their carnal pleasures. But there was no room left here for the good offices of reason and wholesome counsel; for one of the most eminent advisers was stabb'd to death upon the place, only for the honest liberty of discharging his conscience; breathing out his last with this prophetical imprecation in his mouth against the brothers and their complices: "May a vengeance fall upon them, (says he) "for the indignities they have committed "both against religion and against friendship; "may their enemies repay them with the "same measure they have meted to others: "the brethren, as the capital authors of this "violence; the rest, for assisting toward the "barbarous murder of the patron of their "laws and liberties, whom they ought to "have defended." Not but that they were all extremely afflicted for the death of this good man, but the past kindnesses of the brothers, and the sense they had of an obligation to them for the advantage of their present condition, made them stifle their resentment. They kept however for a while within some tolerable bounds, till at last the barefac'd and impudent profession of idolatry put the affront past all sufferance; insomuch that the people, upon that scandal, came in crowds and tumults to Asineus, with heavy complaints against his brother; telling him plainly, that tho' it had been better let alone at first, yet since the thing was done, he should do well to take some severe course in time to prevent further mischief: for it would certainly put all in a flame else. The marriage, they said, was so manifest an usurpation upon their religion, that no person could approve it; and then for the idolatrous practice of this lewd woman, it was as gross an encroachment upon the worship of the true God. Asineus could not but own himself to be fully convinc'd of the dangerous consequences both to himself and to his people, of this his brother's wickedness; yet what with the tenderness of so near a relation in the case, and what with an allowance for human frailty, in so invincible an affection, he palliated the matter, without proceeding to any exemplary severity upon it. But finding himself day after day more and more persecuted and clamour'd at, he was so plain with his brother, as to check him for what was past, and to caution him for the future; charging him without any more ado, to send the woman home to her friends again: But this wrought nothing upon him; for the woman finding the mutinous humour of the people to increase, and consequently fearing that some mischief might befal Anileus for her sake, she poison'd Asineus, making no doubt of coming off well enough herself when a doting husband should be her Judge.

But upon falling off from their religion and manners, they lose it again.

The people clamour at it to Asineus.

Asineus chides his brother, and bids him send his wife back again.

The woman poisons Asineus.

ANILEUS having now gotten the whole power into his hands, made an incursion with his army into the country of Mithridates; a person of prime quality among the Parthians, and the son-in-law of Artabanus. He found money, slaves, and cattle there in abundance, beside other rich booty that he carried away, to a prodigious value. Mithridates was not far off at that time, and hearing of this inroad and ravage, and how it was managed, not only without any sort of provocation, but in a contemptuous freak of insolence and scorn, he drew together a body of his choicest troops, and so march'd away with his army to give Anileus battle. The next day being the Jews sabbath, which they most religiously celebrated for a day of rest, he stopt short at a village that night, with an intent to fall upon them by surprize on the day following. A Syrian that liv'd there in the neighbourhood, gave Anileus instance of the design, and particularly where Mithridates was to be that night, at a solemn entertainment. Anileus, upon this advice, order'd his people to go to supper, marching afterwards that night up to the enemy, to take them at unawares: Wherein he succeeded to his wish; for about the fourth watch, he fell into their quarters, and some he took asleep; others in a consternation were put to shift for themselves in the dark. Mithridates also was taken alive, made prisoner, and mounted naked upon an ass; which the Parthenians look'd upon as the highest degree of ignominy. When they had carried him thus into a certain wood, several of Anileus's friends were for killing him out of hand; but he himself was against it, and gave his reasons for his opinion. "This person, (says he) is "one of the greatest men of the whole coun- "try, and match'd, you see, into the royal "family. Give him his Life now you have "him at mercy, and you may depend upon "it, that he will forgive all past affronts, and "never forget the obligation: Beside the "preserving of an interest, that in case of the "worst, will be able to procure an accommo- "dation. And on the other hand, if you "put Mithridates to extremities, you may "besure the king will never rest till he has "avenged his blood upon all the Jews in "Babylon: And those are a people whom "we ought to be tender of, both for sangui- "nity sake, and in point of common pru- "dence: For the chance of war is uncertain, "and it is good, even in case of any dis- "aster, to make sure of a retreat." The whole multitude, in fine, were of the same mind, unanimously with Anileus: So that Mithridates, by consent, was set at liberty and discharg'd. But his wife perceiving at his coming back, upon what terms he was return'd, welcomed him home with a thousand reproaches. "You (says she) the son- "in-law of a king! after so many noto- "rious battles, and disgraces put upon you "by the Jews, and now at last their prisoner, "to have so mean a soul as but to own a life "upon the title of their charity! Either re- "deem your honour, (says she) or by those "powers I swear that guard the thrones of "kings, I'll have no more to do with you." Now so it was, that betwixt the bitterness of these daily taunts, and the apprehension that this high-spirited woman would proceed to divorce, he put himself, how unwilling soever, at the head of an army; but with this conviction upon him, that the Parthian did not in truth deserve to live that would truckle to a Jew. So soon as Anileus heard that Mithridates was marching towards him, he made a point of honour of it, not to take advantage of the fastnesses he was possessed of, but rather to put it to the issue of a battle in the plain field: so that Anileus marched forward to meet the enemy at the head of a body of men that scarce knew what it was to be worsted; for over and above their veteran troops, they were joined also by several inforcements that fell in with them for the sake of booty: And upon the whole matter, they reckon'd the day as good as their own, before ever they came to dispute it. In this confidence they travell'd about ninety * furlongs into a dry sandy country; and when they were now so spent with the drought of the place, the fatigue of the march, and the heat of the day, that they were hardly able to stand upon their legs, Mithridates fell upon them with fresh men; put them to a total rout, and cut off several thousands of them upon the chace. Anileus, with a band of the choicest men he had, got off, making to a forest there near hand, in the greatest confusion imaginable, and leaving Mithridates in the happy possession of an absolute victory. There came in to Anileus, after this defeat, such multitudes of loose desperadoes, that his army was not long a recruiting up to its former number; but they were raw, undisciplined men, and not comparable for valour to those that fell. With these men however he march'd into the quarters of the Babylonians, and laid waste all before him. Hereupon the Babylonians sent to the Jews at Neerda, to deliver up Anileus to justice;

Mithridates draws out to give Anileus battle: Anileus gets intelligence how Mithridate's army lay; surprizes him, takes him prisoner, and routs his army.

stice; but this could not be obtain'd; for in truth, the man was not in their power. The next proposal was to invite him to a peace, or at least to a treaty; to try if they could accommodate matters upon terms. This they agreed to, and sent commissioners on both sides, Jews as well as Babylonians, to manage the debate. The Babylonions taking strict notice of the place where Anileus and his companions were together, broke in upon them in the dead of the night by surprize; and finding them drunk and drowsy, they kill'd all in their way without any opposition, and Anileus himself among the rest.

The Jews and Babylonians treat about an Alliance

Anileus, and his people surpriz'd and put to the Sword.

The Babylonians and the Jews can never agree.

THE Babylonians and the Jews were perpetually at variance one with another upon the subject of differing rites, customs, and ways of living, and some times one would get the better of it, sometimes the other: So that the controversy ended commonly in a kind of drawn battle. But the Babylonians that were kept in some sort of awe while Anileus was yet living, and his complices about him, took heart now upon this riddance and execution, to affront the Jews at every turn, and made them weary of their lives: Insomuch that they forced them by their intolerable insolences to quit their habitations, and to withdraw themselves to Seleucia, the capital city of that province; and so called from Seleucus Nicanor the founder of it, being a place of liberty, where Macedonians, Greeks, and Syrians, liv'd promiscuously together in abundance. The Jews were quiet and easy enough here for the first five years; but the plague breaking out at Babylon in the sixth, those that had remain'd were forced to withdraw in great numbers to Seleucia; which prov'd the occasion of the greatest misery they had felt yet, as shall be made appear in few words. The Greeks and the Syrians in this city could never agree; but in all their bickerings the Greeks had still the advantage, till upon the coming in of the Jews, being a bold and warlike people, the Syrians with their assistance got the upper hand. The Greeks finding themselves over-power'd, and their condition wholly desperate, unless they could break this amity betwixt the Syrians and the Jews; they dealt clandestinely with some particular friends and acquiantances they had among the Syrians to think of some way of accommodation, and how they they might bring matters to a better understanding betwixt them. This proposition was well enough receiv'd, and the consideration of it refer'd to some leading men on both sides to advise upon the expedient; who without much difficulty put an end to the controversy, upon this condition, that the Greeks and Syrians should join in a league offensive and defensive against the Jews. In pursuance of this agreement, they fell upon the Jews by surprise, and kill'd upwards of fifty thousand of them, not a soul escaping; but those that were sav'd and protected by some neighbour or friend. The miserable remainder withdrew to Ctesiphon, a Greek city near Seleucia, where the king of Parthia commonly keeps his residence in the winter, and the greater part of his rich furniture. In this place they took up their abode, not doubting of their security within the verge of the king's court and palace; but the Jews were under such a terror from both Babylonians and Seleucians, over and above the conspiracy of the Syrians against them, that the greater part of them betook themselves to Neerda and Nisibis, depending upon the strength of the places, and the bravery of the men that were to defend them. This was the state of the affairs of the Jews at that time in Babylon.

The barbarous outrages of Caius upon the Jews.

THE barbarous and inhuman outrages of the emperor Caius upon the Jews, were not confin'd to Jeruſalem alone, and the neighbouring provinces, but moſt induſtriouſly propagated over ſea and land, from one end of the Roman empire to the other; and with ſuch deliberate cruelties as were never heard of in ſtory before. Neither did any place ſuffer more under his ſavage brutalities than Rome itſelf; the ſenators and patricians, eſpecially; and the reſt of the nobility: Thoſe alſo that they call'd the equites or knights, a degree of men for wealth and dignity next under the ſenators; the ſenators themſelves being likewiſe choſen out of that order. What delight did he take to torment thoſe people with all manner of indignities, contumelies, baniſhments, murders, confiſcations! making it death to have any thing to loſe. He took upon himſelf the majeſty and appellation of a God; and nothing leſs would ſerve him from his ſubjects than divine adoration. He had the confidence, in the capitol itſelf, which is the moſt celebrated of all the temples in Rome, in reſpect of the dedication of it, to ſalute Jupiter by the name of brother, and he was as vain and mad to a thouſand other purpoſes. He had a deſign once to paſs from Puteoli, a city of Campania to Miſenum, a ſea town on the other ſide of the water, and looking upon it as a derogation to his dignity to croſs it in a galley, he laid a bridge over from one Promontory to the other, and ſo paſs'd and repaſs'd in his chariot, triumphing that he had ſubjected the ſea as well as the land, in a way becoming the greatneſs of his divinity.

His extravagant pride and vanity challenging adoration and the majeſty of a God.

He calls himſelf Jupiter's brother.

He lays a bridge from Puteoli to Miſenum.

THERE was not ſo much as one temple in Greece, that he did not rifle of all the curious paintings, ſculptures and other precious donatives and dedications; with orders for the tranſporting of the ſpoil to his palaces, gardens, and houſes of pleaſure: "For where "ſhould the choiceſt rarities in the world be "depoſited, but in the moſt glorious city or "cabinet in the univerſe." Nay he had the confidence to ſend to Memmius Regulus for the ſtatue of the Olympian Jupiter, to have it brought to Rome: That admirable piece of Phidias, the famous Athenian ſtatuary, and ſo called from the place in Greece, where it is ſo so much adored. But this was not yet done; for the great masters told Memmius Regulus, to whom the care of doing it was committed, that it was impossible to move the image out of the place without spoiling it, and there goes a tradition too, that while Memmius had it under consideration, he was frighted from the doing of it by an incredible prodigy or vision; and this made him delay it, as he gave Caius to understand in a letter by way of excuse: But that excuse would have cost him his head, if the death of the emperor himself had not prevented it.

His girl is set upon Jupiter's knee in the capitol.

He was puff'd up, in fine, to that degree of a besotted madness, that upon the birth of a daughter, he had the child carry'd into the capitol, and placed upon the knee of Jupiter, as if Jupiter and Caius had been partners in the girl; and exposing himself to the company to judge, which was the more honourable father of the two.

His uncle Claudius accused for his boon-companion Caius upon the bench to encourage it.

These insolent and extravagant vanities were so rank and gross, that all people saw through them, and yet how tamely they submitted to them! He did not only give slaves leave, but encouragement, to accuse their masters of what crimes they thought fit; and which is worse, they had both his authority and his thanks for so doing. As Claudius was charged with a capital crime by his bondman Pollux, and Caius upon the bench to countenance the accusation, against the life of his own uncle: Nay, and with a resolution to have taken it away too, if he could have carry'd it.

By this licence that he gave to calumniators, sycophants and informers, in the advancing of slaves above their patrons, he did but provoke the same practices against himself which he countenanc'd against others. For people fell to plotting against him on all hands; some to be reveng'd for injuries receiv'd, others by way of precaution to prevent mischiefs to come. Nothing being more certain than that publick justice would be banish'd out of the world, unless he was taken off. Corruption and power carry'd all before it; and it was come to that critical point, in fine, that either Caius must sink or the commonwealth: the Jews especially; who, by the seasonable death of this man, were most miraculously rescu'd from the very jaws of utter ruin. It will be matter of use now and edification as well as of curiosity, to be very particular in this part of my story; for over and above the concurrence of so many wonderful providences in the disposition of things, it will serve for an instructive consolation to good men, never to despair in what extremity soever, of God's infinite power and mercy: And so likewise for a lesson of caution to the great ones of this world, not to build their hopes upon false foundations, or set their hearts upon transitory enjoyments, that lead only to misery, and disappointment in the end; but on the contrary, to contain themselves within the bounds of modesty and virtue.

Three conspiracies against the life of Caius.

There were three famous conspiracies contriv'd against the life of this beastly man, and every one of them had a person of eminent note at the head of it. Emilius Regulus, a Spaniard of Corduba, commanded one party, and he had a troop of resolute fellows about him to assist in the enterprize. Cassius Chereas, the tribune had another detachment; and so * Annius Minucianus had another party; and they were all resolutely bent upon the destruction of this tyrant; for they all look'd upon Caius, as a most abominable monster. Regulus hated him, purely out of a natural aversion to all manner of iniquity; being a person of a generous disposition, and one that had the soul of a man of honour. Minucianus was his enemy, partly in revenge for the death of Lepidus his singular friend, and a citizen of a most unspotted reputation, whom Caius most barbarously put to death: and he was partly instigated to this practice, for fear Caius should begin with him first; for he knew this tyrant's hatred to be mortal, wherever it fell. Chereas cou'd not digest the affront of being twitted by Caius for his effeminacy, and unmanliness, upon several occasions: beside the perpetual danger his life was in, by the relation he had to the service of a violent, furious master so near his person: so that laying things together, he was in a manner forc'd to do what he did in his own defense. But after all these particular grudges, they agreed all three in this one common end of delivering their country and the world, from the outrages of so bloody a tyrant; for they reckon'd upon it, that the success of this design would be the saving of the publick: and that it was but the duty of a loyal patriot to lay down his life for his country.

Emilius Regulus, Cassius Chereas, and Annius Minucianus.

But none so hot upon the exploit as Chereas, partly out of an ambition of acquiring to himself a great name, and partly out of an advantage he had above others (being tribune) of executing his purpose by a freedom of access to the emperor's person. They were now in the solemnity of their Circus games and exercises; an entertainment that the people of Rome are wonderfully delighted with. Now it having been formerly the custom, for the multitude to come thronging into the place, and to petition their emperors, at liberty, for what they thought fit, and hardly ever receiving a denial, they came now in crowds, earnestly praying to be eas'd of their tributes and taxes. Caius was so enraged, both at the request and at the clamour, that he commanded his guards immediately to seize the people that made the outcry, and put them to death; and this order cost many a man his life. The people patiently suffer'd all this, and made no more noise; taking it for a warning not to venture their lives to save their money, seeing how many had suffer'd for it already. These horrible barbarities animated Chereas more and more, to hasten the attempt, and so put an end to the bloody rage of this brute of a man. Chereas had it many times in his thought to dispatch him at the table; but still put it off from time to time, not upon any change of mind, but only to wait for an opportunity of more surely executing his purpose, without any danger of a miscarriage. He had been captain of the guards a long time already, and being now in commission for the collecting and receiving of monies about the revenue, he fell under Cesar's displeasure for not being so quick upon those that were in

arrear, (how poor and insolent soever) as Caius would have had him; who cast it in his teeth, that he was a slothful indolent fellow, and had not the courage to enforce the payment of it. And this was not all neither, for when he came at any time to him for the word, he would still be giving him some word or other that reflected effeminacy upon him. Tho' Caius at the same time made no difficulty himself to dress, curl, powder, and in one word, to play a woman's part in all the formalities of a disguise.

Caius reproaches Chereas with cowardice;

THIS enraged Chereas the more, to see himself made ridiculous to the rest of the officers; for he never brought them the word from Cesar, but it set them a laughing; and they expected some such thing they said before-hand. This was so unpardonable a provocation, and so just an incitement to a revenge, that Chereas could not any longer forbear the taking of some friends and confidents into the secret; and Popedius for one, a member of the bench of senators; one that had gradually gone through all his degrees of honour: and as to the rest, a disciple of Epicurus, and a lover of his ease. This Popedius had been accused of scandalous and dangerous words against Caius: his accuser was his profess'd enemy, Timidius; and the accusation founded upon the pretended testimony of Quintilia, a very beautiful person of a woman, and an actress. This Quintilia being generally belov'd, had the fortune to be highly in the good graces also of Popedius, among the rest. The charge being a contrivance, and Quintilia refusing to take away the life of her lover by a false evidence, Timidius, call'd out to have her put to the torture, and Caius at next word commanded Chereas to see it done immediately; making choice of him the rather for those inhuman services, in hope that it might instigate him to a more unmerciful cruelty, to shew that he was not so dastardly a wretch as he was taken to be. As they were carrying out Quintilia to the torment, she set her foot upon the toe of one of the conspirators in her passage, giving him to understand by that hint, that he was safe, and that she would confess nothing. It was much against the inclination of Chereas to execute that office, but lying under such a necessity, he was forc'd to torment her with great severity. And finding that she stood it out, he conducted her to the presence of Cesar, miserably torn and disfigur'd: even to such a degree, that the emperor himself had a compassion for her, and discharg'd Popedius upon it; presenting the woman also with a considerable sum of money to comfort her in some measure for the calamity she had so resolutely and so happily undergone.

who meditates a revenge, and tells Popedius of it.

Popedius accused by Timidius, upon the evidence of Quintilia.

Quintilia put to the torture, and Chereas to execute it.

She stands it out, and Popedius is acquitted.

THIS tenderness of Caius was yet a farther aggravation to the affliction of Chereas, to think of the scandal it had brought upon him, in being the instrument of so merciless a cruelty as the emperor himself relented at. When things were come to this point, Chereas could hold no longer, but broke his mind to Clemens and Papinius; the latter of them a tribune, as well as himself, and the other a captain of the city troops. "Clemens (says he) "it is well known that you and I were never "wanting in our duty to the emperor; and "that it has been our care and business to discover and to defeat several conspirators "against him. Some we have put to death; "others to tortures, till he himself had pity'd them: but are these commissions for "soldiers and men of honour, or for butchers?" Clemens reply'd not one word, but betray'd in his countenance the confusion of his soul, for ministring in so infamous a drudgery, yet durst not so much as utter one word of reflection on Cesar's merciless and extravagant behaviour. Chereas however took heart, and express'd his sentiments more fully, continuing his discourse in the following manner: "I shall not need, (says he) to run through "the history of the miseries, either of the "city, or of the empire. They are too notorious to be concealed, and common fame "makes Caius to be the author of them; but "if a body may speak the truth of the matter, I myself am effectually the cause of "all this mischief; and Papinius here, and "you, Clement, more than us both. We are "the men that have brought this ruin upon "Rome, and upon mankind, in the execution "of other people's orders. And now when "we might put an end to these outrages, "both upon the citizens and upon the rest of "the subjects, if we had but a hearty mind "to it, we prostitute ourselves to the meanest of servile offices, fitter for hang-men "than soldiers. And we do not stand up either for the Roman empire or liberty; but "in the defense of those that bring us both "bodies and souls into slavery. And what's "our business, but to do the journey-work "of a tyrant, in committing bloody murders, and inflicting execrable torments upon "others, till some body else shall take the "office out of our hands, and do as much for "us! for this abject resignation of ourselves, "is look'd upon as an act, not of kindness, "but of fear and force; and consequently "renders us rather suspected than beloved. "He is so wonted to human blood, that he "never consults the reason of things, but acts "according to the extravagance of his present humour, and the crime is the least part "of the question. We are all to be destroy'd "one after another, and our own turn will "probably be next, if we do not provide in "time for the securing both of our lives, and "the common liberty."

Chereas breaks his mind to Clemens and Papinius.

A generous and a bold discourse of Chereas.

CLEMENS, tho' he could not but approve of the opinion and resolution of Chereas, caution'd him to secrecy; knowing that the least word of the plot, if divulg'd before it came to execution, would be the death of every man concern'd in it. "But, says he, time "and patience bring forth opportunities. As "for my own part, my sighing days are over, "and the safest counsels are best; but honester "I am sure you can never take." Clemens with these words went his way home, turning every thing over in his own thoughts that he had both heard and said.

THIS coldness of Clemens made Chereas begin to suspect that he was not in safe hands, and so he posted away presently to Cornelius Sabinus, his brother-tribune, whom he knew to be a man of value; an asserter of his country's liberty, and as much unsatisfy'd as any man with the present state of things. He made no doubt, either of his integrity, or of his judgment in the case, and so resolv'd to consult sult him upon the whole affair. He had some jealousy, as I told you, of Clemens, and therefore press'd the business to a dispatch, without any farther delay. When he found that Sabinus and himself were both of a mind, as to the main, saving only that he kept the secret to himself, there was no need, he said, of deliberating what to do with a man that was come to a resolution upon the matter before-hand: insomuch that Sabinus promis'd him, not only good faith and privacy, but his helping hand too, which more and more confirmed Chereas in his purpose.

Sabinus promises to stand by him.

Chereas and Sabinus confer with Minucianus.

THEY were both of opinion for pushing it immediately to an issue, and so went to Minucianus together, a man of their own genius and temper, both for greatness of mind, and a severe love and reverence for virtue. Caius had also a jealousy of him upon the account of the death of Lepidus, his most intimate friend: beside the hatred he bore him, as a person of honour and quality, which was a quarrel he had in common to all men of that character. They did effectually know one another's minds beforehand, by several words they let fall that reflected upon the government, tho' they did not think fit then to make proclamation of their disgust of Caius: but so it was, in fine, that they understood, and lov'd one another, by a kind of instinct, for the sake of the same inclination and cause. Now such was the respect that Chereas and Sabinus had for the eminent dignity, virtue and merit of Minucianus, that as they formerly paid him all deference upon other occasions, so they desir'd him upon this meeting also, to direct them how to set about their enterprize. "Well then, (says Minucianus to "Chereas) what was the word the emperor "gave you to day? (for it was in every bo- "dy's mouth, how Caius us'd to insult and "ridicule Chereas upon that occasion.) Che- "reas laid hold of the hint: and speaking "with all liberty, having the honour of Mi- "nucianus for his security: whatever the em- "peror's word was, (says he) let yours be "LIBERTY; and I give you a thousand thanks "for putting it into my head to attempt to "do the thing I had so great a mind to do. "It is encouragement sufficient to me, to find "that you and I agree in the same thought, "and that we did so even before we met. "This single sword of mine, (says he) will "serve us both; wherefore let us about our "business, and be you pleased only with your "prudence and courage to lead the way; "with this assurance, that whatever you com- "mand me shall be most heartily and readily "obey'd. A brave soul never wants arms, "but itself rather supplies them; for 'tis not "the weapon, but the hand, and the will, "that does the execution. All time is lost "methinks till we are in action; and for the "event, whether I stand or fall in the at- "tempt, the care is taken. For I have some- "what else to think of, and to do, than to "stand calculating and computing upon my "particular safety or fortune, when the laws "of my country, and the lives and liberties "of so many worthy men are in danger to "be swallow'd up by this merciless tyrant. "And I hope you will not envy Chereas the "honour of a part at least, if not that of "striking the blow itself, in an exploit that "has the warrant of your approbation." Upon this frank and generous declaration, Minucianus took him into his arms; bidding him go on and prosper, and so with an interchange of mutual assurances, they embrac'd and parted.

The word Liberty.

A resolution taken.

They agree; embrace, and part.

WE have a story of a wonderful passage in confirmation of the conspirators in their design. There was a voice heard among the people, they say, as Chereas was entring into the palace, calling out to him to go on in God's name with what he had undertaken. It gave Chereas a jealousy at first, that he was betray'd; but he found it afterward to be either an animating hint from some of the complices, or else a providential declaration from heaven in favour of his purpose.

A voice heard bidding them go on in God's name.

THERE was at this time gather'd together some of all sorts that were well-wishers to the design; as senators, knights, soldiers, and in truth who not; for all mortals were agreed in this, that either Caius must perish, or the commonwealth: so that every man wrought for himself in a kind of competition who should do most, either by word or by deed, toward the saving of his country; or, which was all one, toward the destruction of Caius: nay Callistus himself, Caius's freeman and favourite, made one of the party. This man had a mighty power with the emperor, which he abused to such a degree, that all people equally hated and dreaded him; for he behaved himself more like a partner of the government, than a subject. He was grown vastly rich, upon corruption and bribes; but with all this, he could not think himself safe under that prince, for he knew him to be fickle and implacable; and when he had any mischief in his head, never to be mov'd. He was in danger upon many accounts, but most of all for his wealth, which in those days was a temptation hardly to be resisted. This Callistus finding Caius so slippery and uncertain, thought he could not do better than make a friend in time of the next successor, and in that prospect to ingratiate himself with Claudius: so that over he went privately into that interest; telling him in confidence, how Caius had been several times putting him upon it to poison him; but that he still found out some device or other to shift it off. Now for my own part, I should rather take this for an invention of Callistus's to curry favour with his new patron, than any real matter of truth and fact: for if Caius had had a mind to murder his uncle, Callistus's excuse would never have brought him off, and Callistus himself should never have escap'd neither for being so remiss and dilatory in the discharge of his duty; but Claudius look'd upon him however as the instrument of providence for his deliverance, and very thankful to him he was for just nothing at all.

THE confederates, all this while were so slow and tardy, that the main execution was still put off from day to day, tho' much against the will of Chereas; for he was of opinion that no opportunity was to be lost for the doing of a thing so necessary to be done. "He "would not have wish'd a better time or "place, (he said) than the capitol itself, when "he was sacrificing for his daughter: or to "have pitch'd him headlong from the battle- "ments of his palace at any time, when he "was scattering his donatives among the peo- "ple:

The execution put off from day to day.

" ple: or he might as well have been taken " off he thought, upon any ſolemnity, at his " own private ceremonies. For Caius was ſe- " cure and careleſs to admiration, when at " the ſame time his domeſticks and the peo- " ple about him were almoſt all traitors in " their hearts." Chereas was ſo impatient of theſe delays for fear of ſlipping his time, and miſcarrying at laſt, that he upbraided the confederates by way of reproach; telling them that if they made any difficulty of going through with the work, upon a ſuperſtitious opinion that there was any thing ſacred in the perſon of Caius, he would take the diſpatch of it upon himſelf in his own ſingle perſon, and be anſwerable for the doing of it even without a weapon. His aſſociates could not but highly approve of his zeal for the common cauſe, but they were yet for putting it off a little longer, till the celebration of the games that were inſtituted in honour of Auguſtus, he that firſt took the ſovereign power from the people into his own hands. There was a theatre erected before the palace, for the Roman nobility, with their wives and children, in the preſence of the emperor himſelf. Upon this occaſion, there would be ſo many thouſands of people crouded into ſo narrow a compaſs, that the thing might be done, they thought, with all the eaſe in the world, and the guards not get in time enough to the reſcue, tho' they had never ſo much a mind to't; whereas upon an attempt at a venture, there would be the riſque of a miſcarriage; the city in an uproar about it, and betwixt ſearchers and ſoldiers, the whole party ſeiz'd and cut off, and the contrivance finally diſappointed. Chereas agreed to the matter; ſo that a reſolution was taken to do the deed on the firſt day of the publick ſhews: but fortune over-rul'd in the caſe, and put it off to the third, which was the laſt day of the ſpectacles. And they would have had much ado to get over it then too, if Chereas had not call'd his companions together, and put new mettle into them, with an inflaming ſpeech to this purpoſe. " We are here met together " (ſays he) in a righteous cauſe, and upon a " very honeſt and honourable occaſion; but " betwixt cowardice and lazineſs, to our ſhame " be it ſpoken, without advancing one ſtep in " our buſineſs. Here's a great deal of time " loſt, and that's not all neither, but our coun- " try, our lives, liberties and fortunes are all " in danger to be betray'd and ruin'd, beyond " all recovery by this delay, and all to ſet " up Caius more triumphant than ever: and " what's the fruit now of this faint-hearted- " neſs, but loſs of liberty, and increaſe of " tyranny? whereas we ſhould attain our own " ſecurity in the firſt place, the welfare of the " publick in the next, and an immortal glory " to ourſelves in the concluſion." After this diſcourſe, he gave them ſome time to conſider upon it; but there did they ſtand as if they were mop'd, without one word ſpeaking, either of contradiction or reply. So that to rowze them up once again, " Hark ye gen- " tlemen, (ſays he) what do you mean by " theſe continual heſitations and demurs, one " after another thus? do you know that this " meeting is upon the very point of breaking " up, and that Caius is going for Alexandria " to take the tour of Egypt, ſo ſoon as it is " over? would it not be to our eternal diſho- " nour, do you think, to part with the ſcan- " dal of mankind out of our hands, as if we " had ſent him all over the world to make " publication what ſlaves the Romans are, " and to have ſome free-ſpirited Egyptian do " that right to mankind upon this bloody op- " preſſor, that we were afraid to do ourſelves? " Come, come, my friends, 'tis paſt deliberation time of day, and I'll expect no longer, " but do the part of a man, and put it to an " immediate iſſue; for I will not allow any " fleſh living to diſpute with me the glory of " ſubduing this monſter."

Chereas impatient of the delay;

and offers to take it ſingly upon himſelf.

The day for the execution off and on.

Chereas animates his companions.

THESE words ſet them all on fire to have the deed done immediately, and Chereas himſelf in the ſame heat, put on his ſword and went to court, as the tribunes uſually do in the like caſes; it being his turn that day in courſe, as captain of the guard, to go to the emperor for the word. The people were now preſſing in mighty multitudes toward the palace, crouding, thruſting, and juſtling one another to get places; and Caius himſelf not a little pleas'd with the ſight of this ſcuffle and confuſion; for here were no ſeats nor benches kept apart for ſenators, knights, or other degrees of people, according to their qualities; but men and women, maſters and ſlaves ſat all promiſcuouſly together, and firſt come firſt ſerved. This ſolemnity being dedicated to the honour of Auguſtus, Caius went now, and offer'd up a ſacrifice to the imperial patron: and it ſo happen'd, that upon the fall of the victim, ſome of the blood ſpringing out, dropt upon the robe of Aſprenas, one of the ſenators. Caius made himſelf merry with the omen, but others were troubled at it; and it was his lot, purſuant to that foreboding, to be ſlain in the following tumult. It was much taken notice of, and wonder'd at, that Caius was in better humour this day than ordinary. So ſoon as the ſacrifice was over, he took his friends about him, and went to the theatre, which was only a frame of wood-work to be taken to pieces and put together again, as it was every year upon this occaſion. It had two gates to it; one toward the open court, and the other over againſt the paſſage, for the actors to go in and out by, without troubling the ſpectators: and near at hand there was a kind of box or partition, for the players and the muſick. When the multitude had now taken their places, and Chereas with the reſt of the tribunes, not far from Ceſar, who ſat upon the right wing of the theatre, Bathabius, a ſenator and a military man, asked Cluvitus ſoftly in his ear, a man of conſular dignity who ſat next him, if he had heard any news or not; he told him, none at all. Why then, ſays the other, I am to tell you that the tragedy of the tyrant is to be plaid to day. Cluvitus bad him in a verſe out of Homer, have a care that none of the Grecians over-heard him. They came then to the frolick of throwing apples, birds, and other vulgar curioſities down to the people for them to ſcratch and ſcramble; which Ceſar was much delighted with. And after this there follow'd two circumſtances that had the countenance of an unlucky preſage; the one was the repreſentation of a lewd, and a corrupt judge brought to publick juſtice; and the other was the tragedy of Cinyra, wherein ſhe herſelf and her daughter * Myrrha were both kill'd, and a great deal of blood ſpilt for the decorum of the action, both about the gibbet and about Cinyra: and this, they ſay, was upon the anniverſary to the day whereupon Philip the ſon of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, was kill'd by his friend Pauſanias upon entering the theatre.

Now this being the laſt day of the ſpectacle, Caius was in ſome doubt with himſelf whether he ſhould ſtay it out while he was there, or go off for a while to waſh and eat, and ſo come back again. Minucianus taking his place near Caius, and ſeeing Chereas go forth, roſe from his ſeat to encourage him in his reſolution for fear of loſing the preſent opportunity; but Caius taking him gently by the skirt, asked him in a friendly way, whither is this good man a going? ſo Minucianus ſat him down again, but a while after roſe once more under the former apprehenſion, and Caius let him go, not knowing what neceſſary buſineſs it might be that call'd him aſide. Aſprenas, upon this, being all along privy and aſſiſting to the plot, propoſed it to Ceſar to go out, and waſh, and eat, and refreſh himſelf, as he was uſed to do, and afterward to return.

The conſpirators poſted.

CHEREAS, having by this time poſted the conſpirators in their proper ſtations, and given them their neceſſary inſtructions, was ſo impatient of any longer delay, being already paſt three in the afternoon, that he was for going back to the theatre again, and aſſaulting Ceſar as he ſat, tho' he knew very well that it muſt of neceſſity coſt the lives of a great many knights and ſenators to go through with it: but he reckon'd upon the deliverance of the publick to be a benefit infinitely more valuable than the loſs of ſo many particular men's lives. As Chereas was marching toward the theatre, the word was given in the croud that Ceſar was up, and returning to his palace. The conſpirators call'd out to make the emperor way, as if it had been by order and direction; but in truth to get themſelves more elbow-room for the execution of the enterprize. Claudius, the uncle went firſt, and then Marcus Minucianus, the husband of his ſiſter, and Valerius Aſiaticus; Perſons, whoſe quality gave them a privilege of precedency without any interruption: Caius himſelf with Paulus Aruntius following them. When he came at laſt to enter the palace, he left the ordinary way, which Claudius and the reſt had taken before him, and where his officers and ſervants attended to receive him; and ſo turn'd off into a by-way leading to the baths to ſee ſome boys there that were ſent him out of Aſia for their skill in the ſinging and compoſing of holy hymns, and in the Pyrrhick † way of dancing. In this narrow paſſage, Chereas came up to Caius for the word; which (according to cuſtom) was ſo foul and ignominious, that the tribune return'd the indignity with language in his own way; and upon that, gave him a terrible cut with his ſword, but the wound yet not mortal: ſome will have it to be done on purpoſe to make his death the more miſerable and tormenting, by the repetition of the blows; but this ſeems to me very unlikely, for this was not an action to be drawn out at length: or if Chereas had any ſuch thing in his thought, or intention, he muſt have been the greateſt fool certainly in nature, to prefer the gratifying of a wild and an intemperate paſſion, by ſo dangerous a delay, when he might have ſecur'd both himſelf, and his complices, by the diſpatch; for ſo long as Caius had life in him, ſo long had his guards and his friends time to conſider of ſuccouring him: ſo that he endanger'd himſelf

The manner of the execution.

† The Pyrrhick was a military dance; according to Ariſtotle and Pliny, firſt invented by Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles; according to others, by one Pyrrhus of Crete, or by Pyrrhicus a Lacedemonian. Some have fix'd its original much higher, and refer'd it to Minerva, who led up a dance in her armour after the conqueſt of the Titans: others to the Curetes or Corybantes, Jupiter's guard in his cradle, who leap'd up and down claſhing their weapons to keep old Saturn from hearing the cries of his infant ſon. Tho' the reader may perhaps look upon theſe laſt accounts as fabulous, yet they prove, however, its antiquity to be of very early date, which is farther confirm'd to us by plain evidence from Homer, who, as he hints at it in ſeveral deſcriptions, ſo particularly makes the exact form and manner of it to be engraved on the ſhield of Achilles given him by Vulcan. It was generally practic'd by youths (who begun to learn it at five years old) in order to inſtruct and render them expert in the uſe and exerciſe of arms; certain numbers of them being rang'd in two bodies like two armies drawn up in battle array, who, ſometimes at the ſound of muſick, and ſometimes at a certain ſignal given them by the maſter, begun a mock fight, and ſeem'd to attack one another as if in a real engagement. The manner of the performance ſeems to have been both offenſive and defenſive. The offenſive part conſiſted chiefly in the artful throwing of javelins aud darts, and the dextrous uſe of the ſword: The defenſive, in the nimble turning of the body, and ſhifting every part, as it were done to avoid the ſtroke of an enemy. We meet with a very full, elegant and lively deſcription of this dance in Claudian's ſixth conſulſhip of Honorius.

The Romans, who were a warlike people, were great admirers of this diverſion; for which reaſon it was frequently exhibited by their emperors, amongſt other ſhows, in the Circus at Rome. Whoever has a mind to have any farther information about it may conſult Eraſmus's Chiliad's, pag. 1133. the folio Edit. upon the words, Pyrrhicen oculis præ ſe ferens, and the authors there by him cited.

Some, not without probability, have been inclin'd to think the Scotch Hayes (a dance perform'd with ſword and target) to be either the remains, or at leaſt an imitation of the Pyrrhick dance.

Julius Scaliger (Poet. lib. I. cap. XVIII.) tells us of himſelf, that while a youth, he had often danc'd the Pyrrhick before the emperor Maximilian, to the amazement of all Germany: and that the emperor was once ſo ſurpriz'd at his warlike activity, as to cry out, "This boy either was born in a coat of mail inſtead of a skin, or "elſe has been rock'd in one inſtead of a cradle."

and his companions more than Caius, by neglecting the means of withdrawing both himself and them out of the reach of revenge. So that the loſs of time would in all probability be the loſs of himſelf. But this is the caſe wherein all people are at liberty to think at their pleaſure. The wound, in ſhort, was betwixt the neck and the ſhoulder, where it chopt upon a bone that ſtopt it from going further. He made no outcry upon the receiving of it, nor call'd to any of his friends for help; either out of pride of ſtomach, or that he knew not whom to truſt. He gave a groan however, and made an attempt to get away, but Cornelius Sabinus prevented it by a blow that brought him to his knees: and that being follow'd by an unanimous outcry of "Down with him, diſpatch him," they cut him to pieces. It was Aquila, they ſay, that gave him his death's wound; but all people aſcrib'd the glory of the action to Chereas. He had his aſſociates, 'tis true; but the propoſal of it was originally his; and ſo was the contrivance, and the manner of bringing it about. He was the firſt that had the heart to adviſe and communicate upon it, and that by his great wiſdom and reſolution, when he found how it took, formed and united the confederacy; animated and ſupported the courage of his friends; and when it came at laſt to the pinch, he was the firſt that ſtruck the blow; and by his own bravery, laid the pride of this tyrant in the duſt. So that whatſoever was done by others to the promoting of this exploit, muſt be attributed to the prudence, induſtry, and virtue of Chereas. This was the end of Caius, who dy'd by many hands, and by many wounds.

The glory of the action aſcrib'd to Chereas.

BUT the great difficulty was yet behind; that is to ſay, how Chereas and his companions ſhould get off again, after the finiſhing of this mighty work; beſide the aſtoniſhment they were in upon ſuch an atchievement. They had the outrage of a wild and a ſeditious multitude to encounter, for the death of a popular prince; the fury and revenge of the ſoldiery: the way was narrow where the fact was committed, and cover'd with officers and guards that were there upon duty. So that finding there was no getting back again by the way they came; they ſtruck off to the houſe of Germanicus, the father of Caius, whom they had newly butcher'd. This quarter borders upon the palace-royal, and the whole pile is ſo far all of a piece, as the beautifying of it with additional buildings by ſeveral emperors from time to time, could make it; and all thoſe pieces bear the names of their reſpective founders to this very day. Being now clear of the rabble, they were ſafe enough at preſent, ſo long as the death of Ceſar could be conceal'd.

The conſpirators ſlip away to the quarters of Germanicus.

THE German guards of the body, known by the name of the Celtick legion, were the firſt that got intelligence of it; men naturally fierce and cholerick, and like other Barbarians, that for the moſt part underſtand little of what they do. They are ſtrong-body'd men, that will ſtand any ſhock; bold, and forward to attack; and taking number for number, hardly to be beaten. Theſe bluſtering fellows were raging mad upon the news of the emperor's death, not for the loſs of ſo much of the man, as of their profit; for they had a bountiful maſter of him, and he kept himſelf in credit with them by the force of frequent donatives and rewards. Theſe people, under the command of Sabinus, originally a gladiator, and preferr'd to be a tribune purely for a brutal ſturdineſs of body, without the leaſt pretence of title to it, by the virtue, either of himſelf or of his anceſtors: Theſe people, I ſay, under this commander, ran up and down with drawn ſwords from houſe to houſe hunting after the murderers of Ceſar. The firſt man they met with was Aſprenas, that had his robe ſtain'd with the blood of the ſacrifice, as I told you before; a moſt unlucky token, and him they tore to pieces. The next they ſeized was Norbanus, of the firſt quality of the city, and one that had the blood of ſeveral eminent generals in his veins. But finding that the dignity of his extraction wrought nothing upon the barbarous fury of thoſe brutal ruffians, he diſarmed the firſt man that aſſaulted him; and being a perſon of wonderful ſtrength and courage, would never have dy'd unreveng'd, if he had not been oppreſs'd by numbers. The third that had the ſame hard fortune with the former, to fall into the hands of the Germans, was Anteius, with ſome few others; who was drawn out with a curioſity to ſee the dead body of Caius, a perſon whom he mortally hated; for Caius had not only baniſhed his father, who was of the ſame name with himſelf, but had afterwards caus'd him to be put to death alſo by his order. This Anteius came out upon this occaſion, to entertain himſelf with this grateful ſpectacle; and hearing a great noiſe and tumult, he endeavour'd to ſave his life by hiding himſelf, but could not however eſcape the diligent ſearch of the German guards, who without any diſtinction of guilty or innocent, cut all to pieces that they encounter'd in their way. And this was the unhappy end of theſe miſerable men.

Aſprenas, Norbanus, and Anteius cut to pieces.

The German guards raging mad upon it.

WHEN the news of Ceſar's death was brought to the theatre, the wonder and aſtoniſhment it met with was more than the credit; for though people would be well enough content to hear of what they had ſo long and ſo often wiſh'd for, many were afraid yet of believing it, for fear it ſhould prove falſe, and others as loth to believe it, becauſe they were afraid of finding it true. But ſome again ſtumbled at it as a thing equally ridiculous to attempt, and impoſſible to compaſs. Now theſe for the moſt part were women and children, ſlaves, and a certain ſort of ſoldiers too, that making a double advantage of their ſervices, both by pay, and what they got by oppreſſion, as the miniſters of pride and tyranny, aſſiſted in the perſecution of good men, and became ſharers in the booty. As for the women, the children, and the common people, they were cajol'd with fine ſights, ſpectacles, prizes, doles, and largeſſes, and other amuſements of that kind, under a pretext of making the people eaſy; but in truth, to gratify the blood-thirſty vanity of the oppreſſor. The bond-men, they were indulged in the licenſe allow'd them of controuling and affronting their patrons, and Caius their friend to ſtand by them in all theſe controverſies. Neither was there any difficulty at all of making good any accuſation whatſoever, where the ſervant had no more to do toward the gaining of his liberty, and the making of his fortune, but to diſcover where his maſter's money was, the law itſelf entitling the informer to an eighth part of the value of the confiſcation.

As for thoſe perſons of condition, to whom the report might appear credible, either as privy to the plot perhaps, or as well-wiſhers to it, or as having ſome reaſon more than ordinary perchance to gueſs at it, they were ſo far from rejoicing at the rumour, that they made as if they knew nothing at all of the matter. For they were afraid of betraying their good-will by their very looks, if they ſhould but enter upon the diſcourſe. The deeper, in fine, that they were in the conſpiracy, the more ignorant they appear'd to be; for it was death without mercy to be ſo much as ſuſpected.

The ſtory of Caius reported ſeveral ways.

THE ſtory in the mean time was diverſly related. Some had it that Caius was wounded indeed, and under the care of the ſurgeons, but not kill'd. Now it was not proper for people under theſe circumſtances to declare themſelves one way or other; for either the reporters were of Caius's faction, and conſequently under a ſuſpicion of partiality on that hand; or if they were enemies, it was not ſafe on the other ſide to be too forward in the believing and publiſhing of ill news to be true, as if they wiſh'd it ſo: But there was ſtarted at the ſame time another invention that damp'd the hearts of the nobility more than all the reſt: Which was that Ceſar, upon the receiving of his wounds, ran preſently into the market-place; and without ſtaying to be dreſs'd, all bloody as he was, made his appeal there in a declamatory way to the people. This variety and uncertainty of reports put all men to their wits end what to think, do, or ſay. But ſtir they durſt not, for fear of calumny and miſconſtruction; for the queſtion was not ſo much what they intended, as how the judges and informers would underſtand it.

The German ſoldiers beſet the theatre.

IN this diſtraction, the Germans with ſword in hand beſet the theatre; every man there giving himſelf for loſt upon the firſt ſight of them, and expecting to have his throat cut immediately upon the place. While they ſtood trembling in this anxiety of mind, and in ſuſpenſe, whether to go or ſtay, (for there was danger both ways) the ſoldiers breaking in upon them, put the whole theatre into a frightful ejulation, with a thouſand ſupplications, ſubmiſſions, deprecations, proteſtations, and excuſes, accompany'd with tears, groans and invocations upon all the Gods to atteſt their innocence. A conſpiracy or no conſpiracy, they could ſay nothing to it, they ſaid, neither did they omit any thing in their preſent extremity, that the ſenſe of their danger might put into their mouths to ſave their lives. This diſmal ſpectacle drew compaſſion from the hard hearts, even of the Germans themſelves, and put a ſtop to the farther progreſs of their fury, having done already what they were in ſome meaſure aſham'd of, as inhuman as they were, in their butchery upon Aſprenas and his companions, and then carrying their heads up and down in oſtentation, for a ſhew, till in the end they were depoſited upon the altar. What could be more afflicting to their friends, conſidering the dignity of the men, and the inſolent barbarity of the triumph, than this horrid action? and they were not a little ſolicitous for themſelves too, for their own danger was not yet over. Nay, the greateſt enemies that Caius left behind him, could not rejoice heartily at his death, for the danger they themſelves were in, not long to ſurvive him.

BUT while things were in this confuſion, there was one Aruncius, a publick crier; a man who had by his buſineſs amaſs'd a great eſtate, and obtain'd ſo great power and credit with the people, that he did what he would with them. This Aruncius came into the theatre in a deep mourning-dreſs, like a noble-man of Rome, and with all the formalities of ſorrow and lamentation that are cuſtomary upon the loſs of our neareſt relations; where he made proclamation with a loud voice, that the emperor was dead; upon this the Germans relented, and the officers commanded the ſoldiers to put up their ſwords; whereupon the whole uproar was quieted. This was moſt certainly the ſaving of the people's lives that were coop'd up in the theatre, and of all others whatſoever that might have fallen into the power of the Germans; for ſo long as they could have flatter'd themſelves with any hope of the emperor's being alive, they would never have ſtuck at any manner of miſchief. They had ſo great an affection for Caius, that they would have redeemed his life, even with the loſs of their own, and without any regard to the miſerable ſtate of the commonwealth. But now upon the certainty of the thing, that impetuous deſire of revenge fell of itſelf; when there could be no longer any occaſion for the confering of obligations on the one ſide, or for returning acknowledgments on the other: beſide the apprehenſion they had of the power of the ſenate upon continuing their violence, in caſe the government ſhould fall into their hands. Thus was the rage of the Celtick legion appeaſed.

The death of Ceſar publiſh'd by proclamation.

CHEREAS all this while, being exceedingly in pain for fear Minucianus ſhould fall into the hands of the Germans, took as many of the ſoldiers one by one as he could truſt, to try if they could tell any news of him; and with earneſt entreaties recommending him to their care, if it might fall in their way to ſerve him. By this means Chereas and Clemens were brought to him; and Minucianus applying himſelf to Chereas, told him that he could not but infinitely honour him for ſo generous a reſolution and undertaking; and that he would take upon himſelf to give him thanks, in the name of the commonwealth, for ſo publick a ſervice, and as well for his conduct in the management of his undertaking, as for his courage in the execution of it. "This, (ſays he) may ſerve to ſhew us the "condition of the fate of tyranny, that ne"ver fails, after the ſhort pleaſure of a law"leſs domination, to terminate in an unhappy "and a ſhameful concluſion, that renders the "oppreſſor hateful to all good men:" As this was Ceſar's caſe, who made way for this conſpiracy by a violation of the laws, and an outrageous courſe of intolerable inſolence and injuſtice, upon his beſt friends: who upon theſe provocations became his enemies, and ſo the inſtruments of his deſtruction; but he himſelf all this while, was the author, and the firſt moving cauſe of his own ruin. The guards being now withdrawn, the people in the theatre were all riſing in a hurry to ſhift for themſelves. The occaſion of it was this: Arcyon a phyſician was call'd away to look after ſome wounded men, and ſent away ſeveral about him, under a pretence of going to provide remedies; but, in truth, to put them out of harm's way.

THE ſenate, in the mean time, met in the palace, where the multitude preſs'd in upon them in throngs, to demand juſtice upon the murderers of the emperor. The people were in earneſt, but the ſenate only held fair with them for a countenance. While the rabble was in this fit of ſtorming and hunting up and down after the Aſſaſſins, Valerius Aſiaticus, a conſular man, being often ask'd by them in the heat of their outcries and clamours, what was become of the murderers of Caius, and who was the villain that kill'd him?" "Would "I had been the man myſelf," ſays Valerius, and ſo he went his way.

The ſenate meets, and orders the ſoldiers and people to depart.

THE ſenate proceeded then to a decree, in condemnation of Caius, and paſs'd an order for both people and ſoldiers to depart quietly to their own homes and quarters, with promiſes of certain exemptions and privileges to the one, and of rewards and gratuities to the other, if they demean'd themſelves peaceably as they ought to do. By this means there was a ſeaſonable ſtop put to the uproar, which otherwiſe might have broken out into freſh tumults, ſacrilegious violences, rapine, and all manner of confuſion. The whole bench of ſenators being now met, and thoſe eſpecially that were of the plot, they began to have ſome thoughts of taking the power into their own hands, and ſetting up for themſelves again.

The ſenate inclining to ſet up for itſelf.

The ſenators and ſoldiers divided about the form of government.

WHILE the ſenators were debating on the one hand, the ſoldiers were at work in a council of war on the other, upon the queſtion, whether a popular, or an imperial government; and came to this reſolution, that the former was neither good for the whole body, nor for themſelves; for the people they ſaid, could never anſwer ſo many preſſing neceſſities of the ſtate: Neither was it for their own intereſt, either to be put quite out of play by a wrong choice, or to have ſo many maſters, having been rather the companions than the ſervants of the former adminiſtrator: So that they were of opinion in this unſettled ſtate of affairs, to chuſe Claudius emperor, being the uncle of the deceas'd, and much ſuperior, both for his birth, princely qualities, and education, to any of the ſenators then aſſembled; not making any doubt but he would remember thoſe that rais'd him, and oblige all people according to their deſerts. This was the ſenſe of the whole council: So that Claudius was immediately fetch'd away from his houſe by the ſoldiers, and declar'd emperor. This was carry'd preſently to the ſenate-houſe to Cneus Sentius Saturninus, who finding matters upon ſuch a pinch that now or never the buſineſs was to be done, he ſtood up and made a ſpeech; partly being put upon it, and partly by inclination, and deliver'd his thoughts upon this occaſion, in terms worthy of ſo generous a patriot, and ſpeaker, and of ſo publick-ſpirited an auditory. The tenor of it was to this effect:

The ſoldiers for an imperial government, and Claudius the man.

They ſet him up, and declare him emperor.

The news carry'd to Saturninus in the ſenate-houſe.

Saturninus in favour with the popular ſtate.

"WHO would have thought, (ſays he) my "noble countrymen and fellow-citizens, af-"ter ſo long an interruption of our natural "freedom, that we ſhould ever have liv'd to "draw one breath of liberty after it! and "yet thro' the goodneſs of the divine Provi-"dence, in whoſe power it is to give or take, "we are at this very day and hour, freemen "in ſome degree yet once again. How long "it will laſt we know not! but let the event "be what it will, and the comfort of it ne-"ver ſo ſhort, a ſhort comfort is yet a com-"fort ſtill. Shall we account it as nothing "now, for a freeman to live free, in a free "country, and to have yet ſome reliſh of the "ſweets of our ancient liberties in the flou-"riſhing condition of our once free common-"wealth; even tho' we were to enjoy the ſa-"tisfaction of it but for one ſingle hour. I "can ſay little, 'tis true, to the liberty of "former times, that was extinct long before "ever I came into the world; but I have a "great kindneſs, I muſt confeſs, for the pre-"ſerving and improving of that liberty, ſuch "as it is, which we enjoy at preſent: and I "cannot but eſteem thoſe men to have been "exceedingly happy, whoſe lot it was to fall "into an age that aſſerted the common liber-"ty of mankind, and the ſtudy of virtue. "But the perſons of all others that in my "opinion deſerve the moſt to be honour'd, "next to the immortal Gods themſelves, are "thoſe heroical ſpirits that have had the cou-"rage to give us yet ſome taſte of it, how late "ſoever, even in this abandon'd ſtate of the "world: a bleſſing, which I wiſh with all "my ſoul, may be perpetuated to our poſte-"rity. For as to what concerns ourſelves, "one day's experience is abundantly ſuffici-"ent for our comfort and inſtruction, both "young and old. Thoſe that are in years "will leave the world with leſs regret, when "they ſhall better underſtand the advantages "that attend liberty; and for thoſe that are "growing up, the very example will inflame "them with a virtuous emulation of treading "in the ſteps of their famous anceſtors. Vir-"tue, in ſhort, is the main buſineſs of human "life; and ſo it ought to be, for in truth, "virtue is liberty itſelf: that is to ſay, the "liberty of the mind, whatever becomes of "the body. Now I do not take upon me all "this while to ſpeak of things before my time, "any further than upon the grounds of hear-"ſay and tradition. But when I come to the "ſubject of tyranny, and the calamitous con-"ſequences that attend it, I ſhall ſay no more "upon that topick than what I can make good "in what I have ſeen and felt, and upon the "infallible certainty of woeful and miſerable "experience. It confounds the order of go-"vernment, and of all civil communities.

Great

" Great minds, generous diſpoſitions and glo" rious actions, are diſcountenanc'd and ſup-
" preſs'd. It makes mens ſouls as ſervile as " their carcaſſes; quenches all honourable e-
" mulations, and accommodates all rules of " law and equity, by fear and flattery, to the " arbitrary caprice of ambitious and phanta-
" ſtical princes. If we look back to the uſur-
" pation of Julius Ceſar, upon the power of " the people, and the * trampling of their " laws, liberties and government under foot,
" in the erecting of a tyrannical monarchy
" upon the ruins of that commonwealth; and
" all this only to gratify the heat of his am" bitious luſts; what a train of miſeries has
" that impotent and inſatiable affectation of " dominion drawn after it, both upon the go" vernment, and the nation! what has the " ſucceſſion been but a kind of a violent com" petition betwixt the predeceſſor and the " next comer, who ſhould do moſt miſchief,
" either in the ſubverting of the laws, or in
" the depopulating of the city at leaſt, by the " ſuppreſſing of all men of honour and vir-
" tue in it, and by all ſorts of perſecution,
" even to the degree of death itſelf? for they
" could not be ſafe but in the hands of wick-
" ed inſtruments, that had abandon'd them-
" ſelves to all ſorts of iniquity, without ei" ther ſhame or conſcience. And not one ſin-
" gle creature in the number of theſe impe-
" rious maſters, that had not done the part " of a moſt barbarous oppreſſor. But the ty-
" rant Caius, who hath this day received his " fate, he perhaps has outdone all the reſt in
" the licentious rage of a brutal and an un-
" governable fury; ſparing neither citizens,
" friends, nor relations, in a defiance at the
" ſame time, both of humanity and juſtice,
" and of all the laws both of God and man.
" For it is not enough for tyrants to give " themſelves up to their vanity, and their
" pleaſures, rapines, adulteries and extrava" gant appetites, for theſe are only human " frailties; but their ſatisfaction lies in the " diabolical practices of rooting out whole
" families, entitling children and infants to " their father's quarrel, and not one jot qui" eter after their revenge than they were be" fore: For being conſcious to themſelves of
" the indignities they multiply upon their ſub-
" jects, and that let them bear them never ſo
" patiently, the ſpite of a ſhrewd turn is not
" ſo ſoon forgotten, they find no ſecurity at
" laſt but in the death of thoſe they have
" wrong'd, and in the ſeaſonable removal of " them out of the way. But ſince ſo it is,
" that we have now ſhak'd off the yoke, and
" recover'd the poſſeſſion of our primitive
" freedom: all that we have to do for the " preſerving of unity among ourſelves, and
" providing for our future ſafety, is to join in " repairing the ruins of our ancient glory, and
" reſtoring the commonwealth unto its ori" ginal ſtate of union and integrity. We are " now at liberty to propoſe and to debate,
" and to like or diſlike at pleaſure, without " any ſuperior power over our heads to con-
" troul, and call us to an account. For what " was it that gave birth and growth to the " unbounded progreſs of the late tyranny, but
" the dull drowſy patience of a beſotted peo" ple, that had not the hearts to make head
" againſt it? men, ſlaves to their pleaſures;
" and men that otherwiſe acted and liv'd like
" ſlaves: theſe were the people that chuſing
" rather to lead a mean inglorious life, than
" venture an honourable death, caſt the city
" into thoſe inſupportable miſeries, of which
" we ourſelves have been both eye and ear-
" witneſſes. But let me recommend it to you
" in the firſt place now, to do right to the " aſſaſſins of the tyrant, eſpecially to Che-
" reas, in confering upon him the honours
" he deſerves for ridding the world, and the " commonwealth of this abominable monſter.
" For it was his counſel and his hand, by the " impulſe of a divine aſſiſtance, that wrought
" our liberty; and it is but reaſon that he
" that procur'd us our freedom with the ha" zard of his life, ſhould receive acknowledg-
" ments and rewards from the perſons he re-
" deem'd, anſwerable to the quality of the " obligation. It is the part and the duty of " an honeſt man to be thankful to his bene-
" factor; eſpecially to ſuch a benefactor as
" this, who has involv'd us all in one com" mon debt. The action of Brutus and Caſ-
" ſius upon Julius Ceſar, was great and glo-
" rious; but Chereas over and above the emu-
" lation of their bravery, hath in this reſpect
" gone much beyond it. Their exploit was " follow'd with a civil war, that ran through " and ravaged the whole Roman empire, but
" Chereas cut off the tyranny itſelf, together
" with the tyrant, and deliver'd the whole
" world at one blow."

THIS diſcourſe of Saturninus was mightily to the ſatisfaction of the whole body of the ſenate; but he was ſo intent upon Caius one way, that he forgot him another; for he had at that time a ſtone in a ring upon his finger, with a Caius's head in it, which he never thought of: but Trebellius Maximus obſerving it, ſtarted up and got it off from his finger, and it was order'd to be broken.

A Caius head in a ring upon his finger all this while.

IT was now toward night, and Chereas went to the Conſuls for the watch-word, who gave him for the word, LIBERTY. The face of things was ſo ſtrangely alter'd now on a ſudden, that people could hardly believe what they ſaw: this being the firſt act of authority that the ſenate had ever appeared in, ſince the time they were depoſed: for the ſoldiers had their orders from the Conſuls ſtill, in former times, till the Ceſars took that power out of their hands. Chereas, upon the receiving of the word, deliver'd it again in courſe to the troops that ſided with the ſenate. That is to ſay, to four companies of them that ſtood well affected to the lawful government, and declared themſelves againſt the uſurpation. Theſe men went away preſently with their officers, and ſoon after them, went the people overjoy'd with the thought of the preſent change, and in hopes that the ancient glory of the commonwealth was now going to be reſtored again; and all agreeing in the ſame note, that Chereas was their deliverer. Now Chereas thinking it might be dangerous after the death of Caius, to leave his wife and daughter to ſurvive him, he ſent Julius Lupus, one of the tribunes, with a command to kill them both; ſingling out him the rather for that commiſſion, both as Clemens's kinſman, and as a reaſonable thing for a man that was ſo deep in the conſpiracy, to have his part in the execution.

that

BUT there were ſeveral yet of the confederates that look'd upon it as an unmanly cruelty, to commit ſo barbarous an outrage upon the perſon of a woman; for ſhe had no hand, they ſaid, in Caius's enſlaving the city, or in the execrable barbarities he committed on the flower of the nobility; but it was all intirely his own act and deed, and nothing elſe but the pure malice of his own ill nature. Others again charg'd all his extravagancies to the woman's account, for a love potion ſhe gave him, which turn'd his brain, and made him ſtark mad: and ſo interpreted this poiſonous potion as the act of this lewd woman, to be the ruin of the commonwealth. The latter opinion carry'd it, and ſo Julius Lupus poſted away immediately about his buſineſs, out of a zeal to the publick in the diſpatch of his duty. Upon his coming into the palace, he found Ceſonia laid at her length upon the ground with her daughter, by the body of her husband, all beſmear'd with the blood of his wounds, and in want of all thoſe neceſſary decencies that naturally belong to the dead; and in this affliction, nothing to be gotten from her but exclamations againſt Caius for not hearkening to the advice of ſo affectionate a wife, that had told him over and over beforehand, what this would come to in the end. Theſe words lay ſo open to a double meaning, that from that day to this, people have been divided how to underſtand them. They that took them in the more favourable ſenſe, would have it that ſhe ſpake of the counſels ſhe had given him from time to time, not to behave himſelf ſo like a mad-man; but to contain himſelf within the bounds of ſobriety and moderation; for if he went on in that provoking way of cruelty and oppreſſion, he would incur the hatred of his people, and draw the blood of his ſubjects upon his own head. But thoſe that made another conſtruction of it, would have it to be as who ſhould ſay, "If this man "would have been rul'd by me, and conſulted his own ſecurity in time, as I would "have had him, this ſhould never have been. "How often did I preſs him to rid his hands "of all ſuſpected perſons, every man of them, "the firſt thing he did? proof, or no proof, "it matter'd not; for where the life of a "prince was at ſtake, a juſt ground of ſuſpicion would have been ſufficient to proceed "upon." In this latitude, the interpretation lay fair enough both ways. Lupus being now come within ſight of Ceſonia, as ſhe was tormenting herſelf in the bitterneſs of her anguiſh and diſtreſs; the princeſs begg'd of him with tears and paſſionate lamentations, only to draw near, and take a view of that miſerable ſpectacle of her mangled husband. But quickly gathering from his countenance what his fatal buſineſs was, and from his words afward, over and above, ſhe was no farther concern'd at what he ſaid, than after a ſhort ejaculation upon the miſery of her condition, immediately to preſent her bare throat to the execution; preſſing him to diſpatch what he had undertaken, and to finiſh the tragedy that his companions had begun. She encounter'd the ſtroke with a wonderful conſtancy of mind, and her daughter, an infant, dy'd by the ſame hand with her; the tidings of it Lupus carry'd away to Chereas ſo ſoon as the work was done. Ceſonia dies with great conſtancy.

THIS was the end of Caius, in the fourth year of his reign; a man brutal and malicious to the higheſt degree, even in his private condition; ſenſual in his appetites; a patron of calumniators and informers; a coward in all caſes of danger, and conſequently bloody. He valu'd dominion for nothing more than that it put it into his power to oppreſs the innocent, and to make way to confiſcations, and forfeitures by murders and rapines. He valu'd himſelf upon the ſlaviſh flatteries and adorations of the common people; and nothing leſs than temples and altars to his honour, would ſatisfy his frantick and extravagant ambition. He hated all reſtraints of law as well as of virtue, and would not ſpare the beſt friend he had in the world upon the leaſt provocation. He was an enemy to all good men, and impatient of contradiction in whatſoever he had a mind to; even to the degree of debauching his own ſiſter, which made the people abhor him. For inceſt was a brutality ſo abominable in thoſe days, that it was almoſt incredible; and a ſcandal that had not been ſo much as heard of among them for many ages. I do not know where he ever did, or ſo much as attempted any thing truly magnificent and royal, and for the honour of the empire, or the common good of mankind; ſaving only the harbours, and the ſtore-houſes, that he built about Rhegium, and near Sicily, for the convenience of the corn-ſhips out of Egypt. And that, without all diſpute, was a noble work, and of publick uſe and advantage. Tho' he did not go through with it neither at laſt, but left it unfiniſh'd, partly by the lazineſs and neglect of his agents and overſeers, and partly by the unſteddineſs of his own humour; for his head ran altogether upon unprofitable whimſies, and he thought his money better employ'd upon his own private pleaſures, than either upon the ornament, or the improvement of the publick. The death and character of Caius.

BUT all this while Caius was an excellent orator, and a great maſter both of Latin and Greek. He had a wonderful preſence of mind, and an admirable faculty in ſpeaking extempore upon any ſubject: beſide that he had a talent peculiar to himſelf of gaining upon the judgments, as well as the affections of men, in affairs even of the greateſt moment; a felicity which accrued to him partly by nature, and partly by practice. For being train'd up in the emulation, both of his father Germanicus, and of his uncle Tiberius, his predeceſſor, two perſons ſo illuſtrious for this ſort of excellency, he made it ſome point of honour not to degenerate from the dignity, either of his birth or of his inſtitution. But what ſignifies an ingenuous and a virtuous education, to thoſe that ſo ſoon as they get at liberty, pervert the advantages of it to their ruin? ſo hard a thing it is for men that may do what they pleaſe without danger, to do what they ought to do, for the pure ſake of honeſty and virtue. At his firſt entrance upon the government, he made an excellent choice of men of honour and underſtanding for his friends and miniſters; by which he gain'd himſelf a mighty reputation with the people. But as he came by little and little to take another biaſs, he turn'd them off with inſolence and ſcorn, and by inſupportable provocations, forced his ſubjects upon thoſe outrageous extremities of deſpair and revenge, that afterwards coſt him his life.

Claudius hides himſelf.

BUT Claudius, as we ſaid before, hearing of the death of Caius, and the uproar the whole court was in upon that diſaſter, crept into a private hole to ſave himſelf, tho' in no danger at all, unleſs perhaps for the ſake of his blood and quality. For his fancy lay ever to a retir'd life; his behaviour temperate and modeſt: a lover of letters, Greek eſpecially, and a man utterly averſe to the noiſe and hurry of buſineſs.

The character of Claudius.

THE multitude being now at their wits end, the palace throng'd with ſoldiers, running up and down like mad, in a furious conſternation, and the common people hurrying from place to place, without any regard to the order or authority of government; the guards, in this tumultuary confuſion, being men of the beſt credit among the ſoldiers, found it high time now to bethink themſelves what was to be done: and their trouble was not ſo much for the death of the prince, who, they thought, deſerved his fate, as how to provide for the ſettling of their own affairs.

The heads of Aſprenas and his companions ſhew'd for a ſpectacle.

And then the rage of the Germans againſt the murderers had more in it of a private intereſt, than of any reſpect or good-will for the publick. Theſe things, all together, did but farther increaſe the apprehenſion of Claudius, eſpecially upon the ſight of the heads of Aſprenas and his companions, that were carry'd up and down in triumph. Claudius was gotten into a place where there was no coming to him but by certain blind ſteps; and there he ſtood to conceal himſelf in the dark. Gratus, one of the emperor's guards, got the glimpſe of a man there in a corner, that had a mind to lie cloſe; but not being able to diſcern what he was, he went up to him, tho' the other deſir'd him to forbear; and upon drawing him out, found that he knew him, calling aloud to the people that follow'd him, this is Germanicus, than whom no man is fitter to fill the vacancy of the empire. Upon theſe words, the ſoldiers were ready to lay hold of him; and Claudius, for fear they ſhould put him to death for Caius's ſake, earneſtly beſought them to ſpare him, making proteſtation of his innocence upon the whole matter. Gratus, upon this, took him by the right hand with a countenance well-pleas'd, and deſir'd him not to trouble himſelf with any ſort of apprehenſion for his ſafety, but rather to diſpoſe his thoughts towards the receiving of the empire; which the Gods, ſays he, have taken from Caius, and do now offer to Claudius by the hands of Gratus, for the relief and preſervation of mankind, that have been groaning thus long under the burden of ſo many oppreſſions: wherefore in heaven's name, "Get up Sir, (ſays he) and "take poſſeſſion of the throne of your ance-"ſtors." So they mounted Claudius upon their ſhoulders; who in truth, betwixt the ſurprizes of joy and fear, was not able to ſtand upon his legs. While this was a doing, the guards gather'd together about Gratus in greater numbers, and fell to muttering among themſelves what pity it was for the poor innocent Claudius, a perſon who had liv'd ſo private and ſo quiet, and had ran ſo many hazards for Caius himſelf, to be hurry'd away thus out of his life? for they took all this buſtle to be for the carrying of Claudius to his execution, while others were for appealing to the Conſuls. But as the ſoldiers crouded in more and more, the people that had no arms, ſhifted ſeveral ways for themſelves. This put a ſtop to Claudius's progreſs; for he was too weak to march on foot, and his bearers had ſhifted for themſelves, for fear of running the ſame fate with their maſter, whoſe ſafety they deſpair'd of. So that the military men being now poſſeſs'd of the palace, (that part of the city which they ſay was firſt inhabited) their numbers increaſing, and having a clear ſtage to themſelves, they took it into conſideration upon this juncture, how they might ſettle the commonwealth. The ſoldiers were glad at heart to ſee Claudius there; and one and all for the advancing of him to the empire; partly in honour to his brother Germanicus, for whoſe memory all the world had an infinite veneration, and partly to keep off other ambitious and troubleſome pretenders among the ſenators; who having formerly embroil'd the ſtate, would, in all likelihood, do as much miſchief again if it lay in their power. They look'd upon the republican form of government to be gone paſt recovery; and therefore ſince an emperor was of neceſſity to be choſen, it would concern them to take care, they thought, that no perſon whatever ſhould be advanced to that dignity without being beholden to them for his preferment. Upon which conſideration, they could not do better than to pitch upon Claudius for the man, and by that means to engroſs the merit of the obligation entirely to themſelves. The whole body of the ſoldiery was ſo abſolutely ſatisfy'd with this way of reaſoning and diſcourſe, that upon confering one with another, they all immediately join'd in the ſame reſolution; and taking up Claudius upon their ſhoulders, carry'd him away to the camp, there to finiſh what they had begun, and the whole army, along with him for his guard.

The ſoldiers unanimouſly for Claudius.

Claudius diſcover'd by Gratus in a corner.

They carry him to the camp, and ſo finiſh the work.

Gratus puts him into poſſeſſion of the empire.

WHILE this was a foot there happen'd a miſunderſtanding betwixt the ſenate and the common people. The former were for the reeſtabliſhing the commonwealth in its ancient glory, and for the vindicating of their authority from tyrannical uſurpations: the other, out of an envy to the power the ſenate aim'd at, deſiring nothing more than an imperial check upon the proud and covetous ſenators, and a ſecure appeal for themſelves to a higher court from republican oppreſſions: ſo that the people were overjoy'd at the elevation of Claudius, in hope, that under his protection they might be preſerv'd from civil wars, and from ſuch diſmal confuſions as they had ſuffered in the war betwixt Pompey and Ceſar.

The ſenate and the common people divided about a monarchy and a commonwealth.

THE ſenate were no ſooner inform'd of the ſoldiers tranſporting Claudius to the army, but they diſpatch'd away a certain number of choice men of their own order, with inſtructions to admoniſh Claudius, "Not to attempt "the aſſuming of the government to himſelf "by violence, but rather to content himſelf "in the ſtation of one of the ſenators, and to "leave

" leave the care of the publick to that body,
" who were qualify'd by the laws to manage
" by themſelves, and by their direction, all
" the offices of adminiſtration. They were
" alſo to mind him how tyrannically the peo" ple had been treated by former maſters, and
" even by Caius himſelf, and of the part like-
" wiſe that he himſelf had in the common
" danger from that tyrant: and how ill it
" would become any man that condemn'd ty" ranny in another, to ſet up the practice of
" it himſelf. But if he would ſubmit to the " ſenate, and return to his former courſe of " life and principles, he ſhould be crown'd
" with honours by a free and powerful peo" ple, and gain the reputation of a wiſe, and
" a good man, by contenting himſelf to take " his lot in the courſe of things in this world,
" whether it be higher or lower, as the law
" and providence ſhall appoint: but if he
" ſhould go on in his purpoſe after this judi" cial example upon Caius, they muſt certain" ly oppoſe him in his deſign; for they want" ed neither ſoldiers, nor arms, (they ſaid)
" nor numbers, nor any other neceſſaries, for
" ſuch an undertaking: but after all, that
" their main dependance was upon the power
" and juſtice of the Gods in favour of ſo ho-
" neſt and righteous a cauſe, as the defenſe
" of the liberty of their country."

The ſenate ſends Veranius and Brouchus, with a menacing meſſage to Claudius.

WHEN Veranius and Brouchus had acquitted themſelves of their commiſſion to Claudius in words to this effect, " They caſt them-
" ſelves at his feet with moſt earneſt ſupplica-
" tions, not to do any thing that might ha" zard the embroiling of the people in a ci" vil war." But finding Claudius ſo beſet with military men; and that the power of the Conſuls was nothing in compariſon to that of the ſoldiers, theſe envoys made him only this ſhort requeſt, that " If he were reſolv'd
" upon the ſovereignty, he ſhould rather ac" cept it from the ſenate, and take it upon
" him without violence; which would be " much fairer and more auſpicious, to receive
" it with the good-will of the people, than
" to raviſh it from them by force."

Claudius ſticks to his pretenſions.

CLAUDIUS was no ſtranger to the haughtineſs of the ſenate, and ſo gave their deputies as fair an anſwer for the preſent as he could diſcreetly do, without laying himſelf at mercy. But what with the temptation itſelf, the advice and importunity of the ſoldiers, the inſtigation of Agrippa, and their promiſes to ſtand by him in the aſſerting of his pretenſions, Claudius was over-rul'd into a reſolution not to quit his hold in the right he had to the ſovereignty, which they had voluntarily confer'd upon him. When Agrippa had decently diſpos'd of the dead body of his friend Caius that ſet the crown upon his head, and put every thing in as good order as the caſe would then bear, he went preſently to his guards, and gave it out that Caius, in truth, was not dead, but miſerably ill of his wounds; and that he was going to get ſome phyſicians to him. But being told ſoon after, that Claudius was taken up, and carry'd away by the ſoldiers, Agrippa preſs'd after him immediately thro' the croud, and with much ado found him out at laſt; but in ſo frightful a conſion of thoughts, that he was juſt upon the point of delivering up all to the ſenate: only in the very critical minute, Agrippa gave him a word of comfort that fix'd him in a reſolution to keep what he had got, and ſo he went his way. Soon after this Agrippa was invited to take his place in the ſenate, whether he went, (pretending ignorance to all purpoſes) with his head perfum'd with ointments, and as gayly dreſs'd as if he was but juſt come from an entertainment. Being now in the court, he put the queſtion to the ſenators, what was become of Claudius: ſo they told him the very truth of the ſtory, and then ask'd his opinion and ſentiments of the preſent ſtate of things. Agrippa made anſwer, " That there " was nothing ſo dear to him in this world,
" that he was not ready to ſacrifice to the ho-
" nour of the ſenate; and yet I could wiſh,
" (ſaid he) that people would rather attend
" the ſubſtantial good and ſervice of the com" monwealth, than the ſpeaking of pleaſing
" things to tickle the itching ears of the vul-
" gar: for moſt certain it is, that without a
" competent proviſion of arms, men, and mo" nies, for a foundation to proceed upon,
" there is no good to be done in competitions
" for dominion and power." Their anſwer was, that for thoſe neceſſary preliminaries, they had of them abundantly, and to ſpare: and for the matter of numbers, they had ſlaves enough to do their work, that would be glad of their freedom for their wages. " This " is very well, (ſays Agrippa) and with ſub-
" miſſion to your grave wiſdoms, I wiſh eve" ry thing may ſucceed to your liking. But " with your leave for one word more: You
" know very well that the ſoldiers Claudius
" has about him, are all veterans, and men of " diſcipline, and experience: whereas on the " other hand, we have only a raw and an un-
" tractable rabble of ſervile wretches, that " hardly ever ſaw a naked ſword in their " lives; to encounter ſo many expert men of " war withal; and therefore with reſpect to " your prudence, I ſhould rather propoſe the " ſending of ſome body to Claudius to try if
" he might not be wrought upon to let fall
" his claim; and rather than fail, I would
" make one myſelf to go upon the errand."
The ſenate found the propoſal reaſonable, and diſpatch'd away Agrippa, with ſome others, upon the commiſſion. But Agrippa ſo order'd it, that upon a private meeting with Claudius beforehand, he told him what fearful apprehenſions the ſenate was under, and then put words in his mouth for an anſwer to the deputies, every way becoming the majeſty of an imperial prince. " I do not wonder, (ſays
" Claudius)

" Claudius) to find the ſenate ſo averſe to " the government of a ſingle perſon, conſi- " dering what they themſelves have ſuffer'd " under the tyranny of ſome late princes; " but for my own part, (ſays he) I propoſe " nothing more to myſelf than to make the " ſubjects eaſy and happy in their perſons, li- " berties and fortunes; and in the impartial " adminiſtration of juſtice; for my buſineſs is " only under the name of a prince, to rule with " the common advice and conſent of the peo- " ple. And for the good faith of my inten- " tions, I ſhall refer myſelf to the proof I " have given the ſenate of my moderation and " integrity, even in the worſt of times." He ſaid no more upon this occaſion, but diſcharging the deputies with this ſpeech, he entertained his military men with another harangue; gave them an oath of fidelity, and five hundred * drachma's a man for gratuity; and after the ſame proportion, to his officers; with promiſes of the like to the ſoldiers that were abſent.

He gives the ſoldiers an oath of fidelity.

The ſenate meets before day in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

Upon this, the ſenators ſummon'd a court, who met the next morning before day, in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. Some that diſcern'd what miſchief was a brewing, and had no mind to be there, kept out of the way in the city, while others ſlipt out of town to their country ſeats, chuſing rather to be ſlaves in a whole ſkin, than to run the riſque of all they had left, by an unſeaſonable conteſt for the recovery of what they had already loſt. There were not above a hundred of them at moſt that aſſembled.

The ſoldiers cry out to the ſenate for an emperor.

While they were in the middle of a debate, upon the matter in hand, there was an outcry of ſoldiers at the door all on a ſudden, to the ſenators to appoint them ſome one man to govern them, for many heads they ſaw did but breed confuſion; and for the fitneſs of the perſon, they left that to the ſenate. This overture was ſuch a ſnare, that they knew not which way to turn themſelves; for inſtead of the liberty they promis'd themſelves from Claudius, they found him now to be the perſon they had the moſt reaſon to fear: Not that they wanted men among themſelves, who for the honour of their extraction, and their relation to Ceſar, might well enough pretend to ſet up for the dignity: as there was Marcus Minucianus, a man of the firſt quality, and marry'd into the family of the Ceſars, to Julia, Caius's Siſter. This perſon offer'd himſelf for one; but the Conſuls were willing to wave it, and ſo put it off with one excuſe after another. Valerius Aſiaticus would have put in for a pretender too, if another Minucianus, one of the conſpirators againſt Caius, had not interpoſed and hinder'd it; for if any man had ſtood up for a competitor with Claudius, it would have been the bloodieſt diſpute that ever was heard of; for they had there at hand, whole troops of gladiators; military men of all ſorts, and a great number of watermen, and other mob, that were there gather'd together, to be at hand, in caſe of a pinch. This deſperate confuſion diverted ſeveral from appearing, that intended otherwiſe to have ſtood; foreſeeing the miſchief that would certainly enſue upon it, both to the publick and themſelves.

In caſe of a pinch, they had their gladiators and ruffians at hand.

It was now toward break of day, when Chereas came up with his people about him, and gave the ſoldiers to underſtand by a ſign he made for ſilence, that he had ſomewhat to ſay, and deſir'd a hearing. But their buſineſs was (they cry'd) to demand the choice of an emperor without any more ado; and ſo they ſtopt his mouth with noiſe and clamour. The ſenate found that this was not a time to think of ſettling the government, when their authority was run down at this rate by ſwordmen, and the dignity of that noble order ſubjected to the inſolence, ſcorn, and mockery of the ſoldiers. This put the conſpirators out of all patience; inſomuch that Chereas told them in the concluſion, " If nothing but an emperor " would ſerve their turn, he'd give them one, " if they would but fetch him an order from " Eutychus to juſtify him in what he did." Now this Eutychus was a favourite-charioteer of Caius's, and an infamous wretch, that ſerv'd his maſter in all manner of baſe offices. Chereas follow'd this ſcandal with a thouſand other reproaches, declaring that he would rather bring them the head of Claudius, than ever own him for an emperor. " What! (ſays " he) have we not had enough already of a " madman, but we muſt now make choice of " a fool?" But this was only ſo much breath loſt; for the ſoldiers, without minding what he ſaid, immediately drew their ſwords, and marched with their colours to find out Claudius, and to join in the ſame oath that the other had taken before.

The ſoldiers preſs ſtill for an emperor.

Chereas a profeſs'd enemy to Claudius.

The ſoldiers march away to fetch Claudius.

Thus was the ſenate abandon'd by thoſe that ſhould have defended it, and the conſuls reduced to the condition of little more than private men, while all people were at their wits end, in grief and aſtoniſhment, to think what would become of them after the putting of theſe indignities upon Claudius; every man excuſing himſelf upon theſe diſappointments, and laying the blame upon his fellow. In the heat of this ſquabble, out ſtepp'd Sabinus, one of the confederates, in a fury, with a proteſtation, that he would ſtab every man before him rather than ever ſubmit to the acknowledging of Claudius for his maſter; or ſo much as to ſee him poſſeſs'd of the empire, and ſo to become a ſlave by his own conſent. " And " now Chereas, what have you to ſay for your- " ſelf too? You that were the firſt aſſerter of " the common liberty againſt Caius, and now " to ſhrink and flinch from that generous re- " ſolution, for the baſe fear of death: As if " any brave man could be happy that is not " maſter of himſelf. No, no, ſays Chereas, " I am unchangeably reſolv'd not to outlive " my liberty; but I ſhould be glad however " in the mean time to find how Claudius " ſtands affected."

Sabinus proteſts againſt Claudius.

While things were in this diſorderly way of agitation, people came thronging into the camp from all quarters, to make their court to Claudius, and among the reſt, one of the conſuls, Quintus Pompeius, whom the ſoldiers hated ſo much the more, for encouraging the ſenate to ſtand up in the defenſe of their liberties. Upon his advancing, they aſſaulted him with their drawn ſwords; and had undoubteely kill'd him, if Claudius had not taken him into his protection, and plac'd him by his own side. But the rest of the senators that came along with him, did not come off so well; for divers of them were kept back with blows, as they press'd forward to salute him. Aponius went away wounded, and not a man of them but was in great danger. At the instance however of king Agrippa, Claudius was prevail'd upon to treat the senators and men of quality, with gentleness and respect; "For, (says he) when these are gone "you will have no subjects left you, but what "you will be asham'd to own. Claudius took his advice, and order'd them to meet him at the palace, whither he himself was carry'd in his litter, cross the town, with a guard of soldiers to clear the way for the populace, who throng'd in such multitudes, that they render'd his passage thither very troublesome and difficult.

Agrippa gives Claudius good counsel.

At the same time, Chereas and Sabinus, two of the most eminent of the confederates, shew'd themselves in publick, expressly against the order of Pollio, whom Claudius had made captain of the guards but a little before. Claudius being now brought into the palace, and his friends about him, pronounc'd a sentence of death upon Chereas. Not but they themselves look'd upon the exploit as a glorious action; yet for the treachery sake, and for an example that might lead to the security of princes in time to come, he was led to the place of execution, with Lupus, and several others of the conspirators. He dy'd, they say, in a wonderful constancy of mind; no change of countenance at all, nor any gesture or action below the glory of an heroic soul. Lupus indeed behav'd himself wretchedly, and Chereas took notice of it with contempt. Upon the stripping of him, he complain'd of cold; and Chereas had this witty reflection upon it, that "wolves felt no cold," playing upon the word Lupus, which signifies a wolf, as well as the proper name of a man. When the executioner, who was a soldier, was to do his office, he asked him, "if he was an expert mas-"ter at the trade of cutting throats, and if his "sword had a good edge;" and to conclude, desir'd him to make use of the same weapon that he kill'd Caius with. The executioner did his duty, in fine, and at one blow dispatch'd his business: But Lupus, who lay wriggling and shrinking for fear of the stroke, was hack'd and mangled at several repeated blows before the officer could do his work. Some few days after, upon the festival of the people's expiatory oblations to the ghosts of their dead friends, they paid the same honour to Chereas as to the rest, by casting their offerings into the fire according to the usual ceremony, and begging his forgiveness for the past ingratitude. This was the end of Chereas.

Chereas, Lupus, &c. put to death.

Chereas dies like a brave man.

Lupus dies as wretchedly.

As for Sabinus, Claudius did not only pardon him, but continu'd him in the same command he had before, upon a generous consideration, that even in his treachery he was yet true to his trust. But Sabinus, after all, made no farther use of his clemency than to deliver himself from a life he was weary of, upon the point of his own sword, and with his own hand.

Claudius pardons Sabinus.

Sabinus kills himself.

CHAP. IV.

Claudius kind to Agrippa. A sedition betwixt the Jews and the Greeks. Claudius's edict in favour of the Alexandrian Jews. An edict in favour of all the Jews.

THE first thing that Claudius did after his establishment, was to clear his army of all suspected persons; and that being done he confirmed Agrippa by an edict, in the possession of the kingdom formerly confer'd upon him by Caius, ascribing very much to Agrippa's address and industry in his service. He added over and above Judea and Samaria, as formerly belonging to the kingdom of his grandfather Herod. And this he look'd upon as only an act of restitution, and a kind of due to his family. But for Abela, and the bordering lands upon mount Libanus, which formerly belong'd to Lysanias, these he gave as an additional bounty out of his own. The articles of alliance betwixt this king, and the people of Rome, were graven in a copper-plate, and set up in the middle of the great market-place of the city, for a memorial to posterity.

Claudius kind to Agrippa.

HE discharg'd his old friend Alexander Lysimachus, the great custom-officer, whom Caius had clapt up in a rage, and one that formerly manag'd for his mother Antonia. He likewise gave Berenice, the daughter of Agrippa, in contract to his son Marcus; but he dying before the consummation of the marriage, Agrippa marry'd the virgin to his brother Herod, and Claudius bestow'd the kingdom of Chalcis upon him at Agrippa's request.

THE Jews, who had been terribly persecuted and oppress'd by the Alexandrians in the reign of Caius, began now to get heart again, and in a short time betook themselves to arms, which was the beginning of a sedition betwixt them and the Greeks. Claudius upon the first tidings of this commotion, dispatch'd letters to the governor of Egypt, commanding him to take all possible care to quiet it: And at the instance of the two kings, Agrippa and Herod, sent an edict to Alexandria, and into Syria, in substance as follows.

A sedition betwixt the Jews and the Greeks.

An edict of Claudius in favour of the Jews of Alexandria.

"WHEREAS we are given to understand "that the Jews of Alexandria have "ever, from time to time, enjoy'd the same "freedoms and privileges from former kings "of Egypt in common with the rest of the "inhabitants, as appears by several royal de-"crees and instruments of record at this day "extant in confirmation thereof: And like-"wise that those rights and benefits have been "continu'd to them ever since the annexing "of that city by Augustus to our empire; and "so transmitted, uncontroverted thorough "Aquila's days, and all the governors of "Alexandria, successively, that have been "sent thither; having liberty granted them "also by the same Augustus upon the death "of their * Ethnarch, to substitute another "in his stead; enjoying the free exer" cise of their religion and discipline without " any molestation or controul.

" Now forasmuch as Caius Cesar, in a blas-
" phemous excess of madness, hath rigorously
" prested upon the Jews to worship him as a
" God, contrary to the good faith and ho" nour of the imperial grant, and in a manifest
" violence upon their consciences; and break" ing into outrages against the refusers, irri-
" tated a party of his own faction in Alex-
" andria against the Jews, their fellow citizens:
" This is now to declare all those proceedings
" of Caius null and void, and the said privi-

" force and virtue; requiring and command" ing, both the one and the other, by this our " sovereign authority, to live, as far as possible,
" in a right understanding together, without
" troubling the publick peace." These are the contents of the edict; and after this, in particular for Alexandria, there was another sent abroad by the same prince, in favour of the Jews all over the empire, in the following terms.

Tiberius Claudius Cesar Augustus Germanicus, high-priest, tribune of the people, and the second time consul elect, giveth to understand, that,

An edict in favour of all the Jews.

" Upon the request of the kings, Agrippa
" and Herod, our singular good friends, for
" the same liberty to the Jews all over the " empire, in their ways and worship, that we " have already granted them in Alexandria,
" we do heartily comply with them in their " desire, not only for the sake of the advo-
" cates, but out of a respect also to the me" rits of the people, in acknowledgment of the " friendship and good offices they have ever
" render'd to the state of Rome. Wherefore
" we judge it reasonable to have them ad" mitted to a share of the common rights and
" benefits of all our cities, as well Greek,
" as other, and to enjoy them in as ample a
" manner as they did in the reign of Augustus
" of blessed memory: And we do likewise
" ordain for the future, that wherever they " shall happen to be dispers'd within the do" minion of our empire, they shall be allow'd
" to govern themselves by their own laws,
" without any lett or interruption, provided
" that they make a modest use of this our grace
" and favour, and do not use any opprobrious
" language, nor offer any indignities to the " professors of other religions, so long as they " themselves are allow'd to enjoy the liberty
" of their own.
" This is what we have thought fit to de" clare: And it is our will and command that
" this our proclamation may be duly notified in
" all our cities, plantations, towns corporate,
" and all other parts respectively of our do-
" minions, as well within Italy as without,
" and copies thereof transmitted to all kings,
" princes, and governors under our jurisdic-
" tion, and to stand posted up and expos'd
" for the space of thirty days to the view of
" all people."

CHAP. V.

Agrippa sent away to his government. He dedicates his golden chain to god. Theophilus deposed from the high-priesthood, and Simon preferr'd. Silas general of the army. A statue dedicated to Cesar in the Jews Synagogue. Agrippa complains of it to Petronius.

CLAUDIUS Cesar gave to understand by these two edicts, how affectionate an esteem he had for the Jews: And the next thing he did, was to order king Agrippa away to his government; crowning him still with more and more honours, over and above several letters of special recommendation to all the governors and intendants of the provinces where he was to pass. He made a quick and a happy dispatch of his business; and so soon as ever that was over, hasten'd away to Jerusalem, where he acquitted himself of all his holy vows, and offer'd sacrifices according to the punctual formalities of the law; causing great numbers of the Nazarenes to cut their hair. Tiberius having formerly manacled Agrippa with iron chains, Caius gave him a golden chain in exchange, just of the same weight with the iron one. This chain Agrippa dedicated to God, and caused it to be hung up in the vestry over the box of the holy treasure, as a monumental memorial of the power and goodness of providence, in relieving men when they are at the lowest; and for an instruction to mankind, that the same God that casts us down, is able to raise us again. This consecrated chain represented at the same view, a prince made the sport of fortune, and a prisoner in irons: And then in the turn of a hand again, his fetters knock'd off, and a greater prince than ever he was. Now this is but according to the nature, and to shew the vicissitude of human affairs, for things to fall when they are at the highest, and to rise again when they are at the bottom.

Agrippa sent away to his government.

He dedicates his golden chain to God.

So soon as Agrippa had paid his duty to God, he deposed Theophilus the Son of Ananus from the Pontificate, and substituted Simon the son of Boethus, whose firname was Canthara in his stead. This Simon had two brothers that had been high-priests too, and Boethus the father, whose daughter king Herod marry'd, as we have said already. This happened to be the case of the three sons of Simon the high-priest, the son of onias in the time of the Macedonian government, of which we have spoken formerly.

Theophilus depos'd from the pontificate, and Simon preferr'd.

THE office of the Pontificate being settled, the king made it his first business to pay his respects and acknowledgments to the people of Jerusalem for the honour and good-will that they had shew'd him, by remitting the tax upon houses that they had formerly paid: A point of generous emulation not to be out-done in courtesy. He made Silas general of his army, in remembrance of the many difficulties and hazards they had run together.

Silas general of the army.

A while after this, there was a gang of rash heady young fellows of Doris got together, who under a colour of religion, dedicated a statue to Cesar in the Jews Synagogue, which transported Agrippa to the highest degree, as the ready way to make their religion despicable, and to bring all to ruin. Wherefore Agrippa, without any delay, went and complain'd to Petronius the governor of Syria, of this horrible outrage; who declar'd himself with as much indignation as the other, and wrote a sharp letter to the innovators, as follows:

A statue dedicated to Cesar in the Jews Synagogue, by some hot-headed fellows of Doris.

Agrippa complains of it to Petronius.

Petronius rebukes the offenders. Simon removed, with an intent to reſtore Jonathan; who declines it, and recommends his brother Matthias. Petronius diſmiſſed, and Marcus ſucceeds him.

Publius Petronius, governor of Syria, by the Appointment of Tiberius Claudius Ceſar Auguſtus Germanicus, to the magiſtrates of Doris, greeting.

Petronius gives the offenders a ſharp rebuke.

"WHEREAS I have received certain information, that notwithſtanding a full liberty granted to the Jews by an edict of Claudius Ceſar Auguſtus Germanicus, to live according to the rules and preſcriptions of their own laws, ſome of your people have been ſo audacious, as in contempt of the ſaid imperial edict, to prophane their Synagogue, by ſetting up Ceſar's ſtatue there, to the ſcandal and affront of their religion, being not only an uſurpation upon the freedom Ceſar hath permitted them, and a violence upon their conſciences, but an indignity alſo to the divinity of Ceſar himſelf; for his image ſhould have been rather ſet up in his own temple, than in another; eſpecially in the Synagogue, ſince the emperor himſelf hath found it meet and juſt to leave every man maſter within himſelf. I ſhall ſay nothing of my own orders in this affair, after ſuch an affront put upon the authority of my maſter, who has not only indulged the Jews in the matter of their religion, but granted them all the privileges of freemen likewiſe, in the cities where they inhabit, in common with the Greeks. Now ſince ſo it is, that this outrage hath moſt certainly been committed, and the majeſty of Ceſar inſolently deſpis'd; and that you yourſelves diſown any hand in the thing, and ſo turn it off to the licence of a riotous rabble; this is to will and require you, that you ſend by my officer Vitellius Proculus, ſome of the guilty perſons, to anſwer before me for what they have done; or at leaſt to tell him who they are; for you yourſelves will be otherwiſe ſuſpected for parties to the fact. In the mean time, have a care of the publick peace, and of thoſe ſeditious ſpirits that would put all into a flame. But as for my dear maſter and myſelf, there is nothing we lay ſo much to heart, as to keep clear of giving the Jews any occaſion or pretext of being troubleſome in their own defence. And now for your better ſatisfaction what opinion the emperor himſelf hath of this matter, I ſend you hereunto annexed a copy of his edict to the Alexandrians, which my deareſt prince Agrippa ſhew'd me (altho' every body knew it already) as I was ſitting upon the tribunal, poſitively requiring that all Ceſar's conceſſions to the Jews ſhould be made good. Wherefore I do now charge and require it of you, for the future, to forbear all manner of ſeditious controverſies, and leave them to worſhip their God quietly in their own way." Petronius, in fine, ſo order'd this affair, that he ſet all right again that had been done amiſs, and made them cautious not to do the ſame thing again in time to come.

Simon removed, with an intent to reſtore Jonathan.

KING Agrippa, after this, removed Simon Canthara from the high-prieſthood, with an intent to reſtore it to Jonathan the ſon of Ananus, as a perſon better deſerving ſuch a dignity: But he declined the acceptance of it, with an acknowledgment of the honour the king deſign'd him: And withal told him, that "ſince God had not found him worthy of "holding it, he ſhould content himſelf "with the bleſſing of having once worn "that ſacred habit; for he could better "juſtify his entrance into that holy order at "firſt, than he could now the taking of it up "again: But, Sir, (ſays he) if you inſiſt ſo "much upon the worthineſs of the perſon, "pray give me leave to recommend a brother "of mine to your majeſty; a man untainted "with the vanities of the world; innocent "and inoffenſive before God and man, and "conſequently better qualified for the function." The king was ſo delighted with the man's candor and modeſty, that he laid the thought of Jonathan aſide, and according to his advice, transferr'd the pontificate to his brother Matthias. It was not long after this, that Petronius was diſmiſs'd from his government of Syria; and Marcus ſucceeded him.

Jonathan declines it;

and recommends his brother Matthias.

Petronius diſmiſs'd, and Marcus ſucceeds him.

SILAS, Agrippa's general, valuing himſelf upon his fidelity to the king, the perſonal hazards he had run with him, and the labours and difficulties he had undergone for his ſervice, reckoned upon it, that as they had been familiar friends, and partners in the dangers of the war, ſo it was but reaſonable that they ſhould go ſhares in the dignity and prerogatives of government: And theſe things conſider'd, he accounted himſelf to ſtand upon the ſame level with the king himſelf; and took liberties with him to the degree of ſawcineſs. He was extremely bold and troubleſome in his common diſcourſes; one while boaſting of his own merits; other whiles minding the king of the deſpicable condition of his former fortunes; and at every turn making oſtentation of the good offices he had done him; the deſperate adventures he had engag'd in, and what pains he had taken for his ſervice. Theſe nauſeous and continued repetitions were ſo reproachful and weariſome, that the king began to be offended at this intemperate freedom; for a man that has formerly been under misfortunes, does not love to hear of them when he is in a better condition; and it is a fooliſh as well as a mean humour, to be perpetually hitting a man in the teeth with an obligation. Silas went on ſo far, that the king would bear it no longer; but

His vanity and ſawcineſs.

Agrippa takes away his commiſſion, and claps him up; but ſends for him to court a while after but in the heat of a paſſion, he not only ſtript him of his commiſſion, but ſent him away bound into his own country. When he came afterwards to his right wits again, and to bethink himſelf how ſevere he had been upon a perſon that had done and ſuffer'd ſo much for him, the anniverſary of his birth-day now coming on, and all people diſpoſing themſelves for mirth and jollity, his heart began to ſoften, and he ſent for Silas to make one at the royal feſtival. Now he being a man of ingenuity, and one that could not well diſſemble his indignation, where he thought he had reaſon on his ſide, bluntly anſwer'd the people that brought him the invitation. "What is it, (ſays he) the

He has already taken away "as much as in him lies, my reputation, as "as well as my office; and does he think af"ter all this, that my tongue is to be tied up "from ſpeaking honourable and neceſſary "truths? Or that any thing ſhall ever ſtop "my mouth, ſo long as I have the conſcience "of an honeſt man for my ſupport? No, no. Agrippa by this time found his temper incurable, and ſo remanded him to priſon.

Agrippa is remanded to Priſon.

The king turn'd his thoughts now to the care of the city, and fortified the walls of the new town, as they call it, at a publick charge; making them much ſtronger, thicker, and higher, than they were before; and would in the end have made Jeruſalem abſolutely impregnable, if Marſus the governor of Syria had not given Claudius Ceſar a cautionary notice of it, for fear there might be ſome farther deſign. Whereupon Claudius wrote immediately to Agrippa, to go no farther in it, and this put a ſtop to the work.

Agrippa fortifies Jeruſalem.

Claudius puts a ſtop to the work.

This king was naturally ſo generous and obliging, that he made himſelf famous by his magnificent bounties, taking no greater delight in any thing than in honourable occaſions to ſhew the munificence of a large ſoul. There was a great difference betwixt him and Herod, his predeceſſor; the latter being falſe, harſh natur'd, and implacably cruel, over and above that he was notoriouſly partial to the Greeks, in preference to the Jews: Witneſs his vaſt profuſion of treaſure upon foreign works, both in ſtructure and ornament; as bathing-houſes, theatres, temples, galleries, places of parade, and the like; whereas he was never known to put himſelf to any memorable expence in any publick works whatſoever, to the honour of the Jews. But Agrippa, on the other ſide, was a perſon, human and gentle to the higheſt degree; a common friend and patron to all ſtrangers, and in truth to all mankind; but bountiful, good-natur'd, and compaſſionate, to thoſe of his own country and profeſſion in the firſt place, eſpecially when in diſtreſs. Wherefore he made choice of Jeruſalem for his conſtant reſidence; no man ſtricter in the rules and formalities of his religion, without the corruption of any prophane or ſuperſtitious mixture; and not a day paſs'd over his head without a ſacrifice. There was among others, one very particular inſtance of a generous goodneſs in him.

Agrippa happened to be once at Ceſarea; and in his abſence, one Simon, a lawyer, reflected upon him in a publick aſſembly, for a man of a looſe life, and one that in juſtice deſerv'd to be puniſh'd for it, according to the practice of the church in that caſe. The governor ſent the king word of this accuſation, who immediately diſpatch'd an order for Simon to come to him, who went accordingly, and the king at that time happened to be in the theatre. So Agrippa call'd him to him, and after a little pauſe, in a gentle tone and language, he put this queſtion to him. "Friend, (ſays he) "if you know any thing by me that you "do not like, I would have you declare it "here." The man had nothing to ſay for himſelf, but in a confuſion begg'd his pardon, and the king granted it immediately, beyond all people's expectation, and not without ſome inſtance of his bounty too, over and above a reconciliation; valuing himſelf more upon the exerciſe of clemency, than upon the power of taking his revenge, and accounting it a more kingly quality to be merciful than imperious.

An inſtance of Agrippa's generoſity.

All places wherever he came, or had to do, had ſome taſte more or leſs of his magnificence and bounty; but Berytus above the reſt. For there, at a moſt prodigious expence, he erected a ſtately theatre, and likewiſe an amphitheatre, not inferior to it; ſeveral bagnio's and arched walks; ſparing no coſt for the beautifying of every thing to the higheſt point of perfection. The pomp of the dedication of theſe illuſtrious works, was very extraordinary upon many accounts; as the variety of ſhows exhibited in the theatre; all ſorts of muſick, and diverſities of other entertainments and pleaſures. In the amphitheatre were expos'd ſeveral combats of gladiators, man to man; and after that, whole troops of condemn'd malefactors, to the number of ſeven hundred of a ſide; being only an execution of juſtice in the form of a battle, and improving the puniſhment of the criminals to the pleaſure of the ſpectators; for they were all deſtroy'd to the laſt man.

The magnificence of his bounties at Berytus.

Agrippa, after this, paſs'd from Berytus to Tyberias, a city of Galilee, where he was complimented by ſeveral kings. There was Antiochus, the king of Comagena; Sampſigeran, the king of the Emeſenes; Cotys, king of the leſſer Armenia; Polemon, a little prince of Pontus: And beſides all theſe, Herod the brother of Agrippa, and the king of Chalcis; who were all receiv'd with ſo royal a freedom of hoſpitality, that it was every way anſwerable to the dignity both of the theatre and of the gueſts; and much to the honour of Agrippa, to be found worthy of ſo many royal viſits. While they were yet together, Marſus the governor of Syria, came to viſit him; and Aprippa, out of a reverence to the ſovereignty of the empire, went out of town ſeven miles to receive him, which proved the occaſion (as it fell out) of a miſunderſtanding betwixt them; for Marſus finding ſo many kings together, and ſuch an agreement betwixt twixt them, he did not know how it might ſtand with the publick ſafety to countenance ſo powerful and ſo dangerous a correſpondence, and therefore ſent meſſages to them one by one, to depart immediately; which gave Agrippa ſuch a diſguſt, that he hated him for ever after.

Agrippa takes the pontificate from Matthias, and gives it to Elioneus.

THIS prince then took away the pontificate from Matthias, and gave it to Elioneus the ſon of Citheus. He was now in the third year of his reign over all Judea, when he came to Ceſarea, formerly call'd the tower of Straton; where he celebrated a ſolemnity of games and ſhows to the honour of Ceſar; which drew together great numbers of the nobility and men of quality from all parts of the province. Upon the ſecond day of this feſtival, Agrippa went early in the morning to the theatre in a robe wrought with ſilver, ſo wonderfully rich and curious, that the beams of the riſing ſun ſtriking upon it, people's eyes were dazzled with the reflection from his habit. The ſparkling of the light ſeem'd to have ſomething divine in it, that mov'd the ſpectators at the ſame time with veneration and awe. Inſomuch that a proſtitute crew of fawning paraſites, cry'd him up as a God: "Beſeeching him, in form, to forgive them the ſins of "their ignorance, when they took him only "for fleſh and blood like another man; but "they were now convinc'd (they ſaid) of an "excellency in his nature, that was more than "human." This impious nauſeous flattery paſs'd upon him without either check or repulſe; but a while after as he was lifting up his eyes, he ſaw an owl in the air over his head ſitting upon a rope, which he found ſoon after to be the preſage of miſchief to him, as it had been before of good luck. For he fell immediately into a violent paſſion of the heart, with terrible gripes and torments of the guts: In which agony, directing his ſpeech to ſome friends about him, "Look ye, (ſays he) your "God is now condemned to die; and by this "fatal neceſſity, I am about to prove all my "flatterers a company of profligate liars, and "to convince the world by dying that I am "not immortal. But God's will be done. "In the life that I have led, I have had no "reaſon to complain of worldly misfortunes "and adverſities; for I have enjoy'd as "great a ſhare of temporal happineſs as any "prince under the heavens." At theſe words his pains increaſing upon him, he was preſently remov'd into the palace; and it was all over the town in a moment that the king was dangerouſly ſick, and at the very point of death. Upon this rumour, all the people, men, women, and children cover'd themſelves with ſackcloth according to cuſtom, joining in prayers and outcries to God for Agrippa's recovery. The king in the mean time, looking down from his apartment near the top of the palace, could not forbear weeping at the ſight of the mourners that lay proſtrate upon the pavement. This extremity of pain held him from that time forward without any manner of abatement, and at the end of five days it carried him off, in the 54th year of his age, and the 7th of his reign. He govern'd for the firſt four years of his reign under the emperor Caius: The three former of them under the tetrarchy of Philip; the fourth in that of Herod too; and the other three under Claudius, who over and beſide that of Judea, gave him the command alſo of Samaria and Ceſarea. His yearly revenue was computed at twelve hundred * Myriads. And this did not ſerve his turn neither, without borrowing, for he was ſo profuſely liberal, that his income did not anſwer his expence. Chelcias the general of his troops, and Herod the prince of Chalcis, ſent Ariſton to kill Silas their common enemy, in priſon, as by the king's order, before the certainty of his death could be generally known.

Fulſome blaſphemous flatteries.

In the height of his vanity an owl perches over his head.

He falls immediately into gripes and torments; reproves his flatterers, and confeſſes his own frailty.

At the end of five days he dies.

His Revenue

THIS was the end of king Agrippa, who left behind him a ſon of his own name of ſeventeen years of age, and three daughters. Berenice the eldeſt, being married at about ſixteen to Herod her father's brother; the other two virgins, Mariamne and Druſilla, the former being ten years old, and the other ſix, Mariamne the elder was contracted to Julius Archelaus the ſon of Chelcias; the younger to Epiphanes the ſon of Antiochus, king of Comagena.

Agrippa's Children.

Ceſarea and Sebaſte ungrateful to the memory of Agrippa.

SO ſoon as the news of Aprippa's death came to be publickly known, the people of Ceſarea and Sebaſte were ſo far from doing right to the obligations he had laid upon them, that on the contrary, they beſpatter'd his name and memory with the lewdeſt calumnies that could be invented. And, to augment the ſcandal, there happened to be a rabble of ſoldiers there at that time, who lugg'd away the ſtatues of his three daughters out of the palace, and carried them in triumph into publick bawdy houſes, reviling them after their brutal barbarous way, in terms not be repeated, feaſting and revelling in the ſtreets, adorn'd with flowers and garlands and their heads perfum'd with ointments, offering libations to Charon, and drinking thankſgiving cups for the death of their king. This was their entertainment, without ever ſo much as thinking of the good offices they had ſo lately receiv'd from Agrippa, or of thoſe of former days from his grandfather Herod, the founder of thoſe magnificent cities, and of the ports and temples belonging to them.

Scandalous and brutal affronts.

AGRIPPA, the ſon of the deceaſed, was at this time at Rome, and train'd up in the court of Claudius; who had no ſooner heard of the death of the father, and the inhuman indignities that thoſe ungrateful wretches of Ceſarea and Sebaſte had put upon his memory, but expreſſing as great a ſorrow for the loſs of Agrippa, as an indignation for the ingratitude of the other, he took up a reſolution within himſelf, immediately to ſend away the ſon to take poſſeſſion of the kingdom of his father; which was but purſuant to an oath he had taken, as well as agreeable to the very equity and reaſon of the thing. But upon the diſſuaſion of the favourite people he had about him, he was eaſily diverted from his purpoſe. They told him it was not ſafe to venture ſo great a truſt in the hands of a raw young man; for it was ſo nice a commiſſion, that the beſt head he had in the empire would find enough to do to manage it.

Claudius propoſes the ſon to ſucceed his father; but he is diverted from it by favouries.

* A Myriad conſiſting of ten thouſand, twelve hundred Myriads muſt amount to twelve millions.

He gives the command to Cuſpius Fadus.

UPON this plauſible inſinuation, Claudius chang'd his mind, and gave the whole command to Cuſpius Fadus, but with this proviſional deference to the memory of the deceas'd king, that he ſhould not upon any terms take Marſus into his government, in regard that he had been a profeſs'd enemy to Agrippa. And he charged him yet more expreſly, to puniſh the people of Ceſarea and Sebaſte very ſeverly, for the barbarous affronts they had put upon the honour of Agrippa and his daughters: commanding him alſo to ſend away the five cohorts, and the reſt of the troops that were in thoſe two towns, to Pontus; and to detach a body of choice men out of the Roman legions in Syria, to ſupply their places. But this laſt order was not obſerv'd; for Claudius was prevail'd with, upon an humble application, to continue thoſe troops ſtill in Judea. This gave the riſe to the miſerable calamities that the Jews ſuffer'd afterward, and prov'd the very ſeminary of the following wars under the government of Florus: Inſomuch that Veſpaſian, tho' conqueror, was fain to tranſport them out of that country.

Claudius gives Marsus's commission to Cassius Longinus. A quarrel betwixt the Jews and the Philadelphians. Three of the ring-leaders punished. Tholomeus put to death. Cesar orders the holy robes to be deposited in Antonia, as formerly, upon certain conditions. Agrippa moves in their favour, and the request is granted. Claudius to the senate. Canthara remov'd from the high-priesthood, and Joseph put in his place.

Claudius takes away Marsus's commission, and gives it to Cassius Longinus.

AFTER the death of Agrippa, (as in the former book) the emperor took away Marsus's commission for Syria, and gave it to Cassius Longinus, out of respect to the memory of his friend the late king, who in his life-time had written several letters to Claudius, to remove this Marsus from his government.

The Jews and Philadelphians quarrel.

CASPIUS FADUS, coming at the same time to enter upon his command in Judea, found the Jews beyond Jordan, and the Philadelphians sharply contending about the bounds of a small village called Mias, whose people were bold and warlike. The men beyond Jordan had taken up arms, it seems, upon their own heads, without any colour of authority from their superiors, and kill'd several of the Philadelphians. Fadus took this seditious insolence so heinously, that he caused three of the chief ring-leaders, Annibas, Amaram, and Eleazra, to be laid in chains; the first to be put to death, and the other two banish'd. "If they thought "(says he) that the Philadelphians had wrong'd "them, Why had not I the hearing the cause? "But for them to presume to make war upon "it, and to be their own judges and carvers, "was an affront (he said) utterly intolera-"ble."

The three ringleaders punished; Annibas put to death, Amaram and Eleazar banish'd.

Tholomeus the chief robber put to death.

SOON after this the famous captain of the robbers, Tholomeus, that had made such havock in Idumea and Arabia, was brought to him bound, and he sentenced him to death, doing all that was to be done also to clear the country of that sort of vermin. He sent after this to the priests and rulers of Jerusalem, and shew'd them Cesar's mandate, requiring the sacred robe, and the sacerdotal stole, (vestments peculiarly belonging to the high-priest) to be deposited in the castle of Antonia, and there to remain in the custody of the Romans as they had been in former times. They durst not dispute the order, and so chose rather to make a respectful application to Fadus and Longinus, (who also was come to Jerusalem with troops, fearing lest Fadus's demands should excite the Jews to an insurrection) only for leave to move Claudius upon that point, and so to respite the proceeding till they might receive the emperor's answer. This request was granted them, upon condition of delivering up their children for hostages, in the mean time; which they readily agreed to, and so their deputies set forward for Rome. Agrippa being at that time at Rome, and in Cesar's Court, (as we said before) having seasonable notice both of their arrival, and their business, petitioned Cesar on the behalf

MUCH about this time, Helen the queen of Adiabene, and † Izates her ſon, came over to the religion of the Jews, by this occaſion. Monobazus, otherwiſe called Bazeus, the king of Adiabene, fell in love with his ſiſter Helen, marry'd her, and got her with child. It happen'd one night, as he was in bed with his wife, and half aſleep, his hand reſting upon her belly, he fancy'd he heard a voice that bad him "Take away "his hand for fear of hurting the child; for "providence had begun a work with a great "bleſſing that would be crown'd with great-"er yet in the end." He has two ſons by Helen, Monobazus and Izates.

Izates the favourite,

THE king's partiality in this preference was ſo notorious, that it put the reſt of the brothers into an outrageous jealouſy and envy, to ſee themſelves appear ſo mean and deſpicable. The king took notice of their ill humour, but was yet willing to perſuade himſelf, that the diſguſt might be only an innocent emulation at the bottom, which of the brothers ſhould be the favourite, without any deliberate malice in the caſe: but finding however that things grew every day worſe than other, he thought it his beſt courſe for ſureneſs ſake, to provide for Izates ſafety: and ſo he diſpatch'd him out of hand, with a moſt particular recommendation, and magnificent preſents, to king Abennerigus, at the fort of Spaſinus; where he was received with ſo much tenderneſs and eſteem, that he gave him his own daughter Samachas in marriage, with a portion of land by way of dower, that brought him an income of a very conſiderable value.

MONOBAZUS, being now far gone in years, and drawing near his end, had a great mind to ſee his ſon yet once again before he dy'd. So he had him ſent for, and then embracing him with infinite affection, he gave him the province of ‡ Ceron; a country famous for aromatick plants, and particularly for the relicks of Noah's Ark that eſcap'd the deluge, and are there expos'd to view. Izates took up his habitation in this place, during the life of his father. Queen Helen, upon the very day of the king's deceaſe, call'd her miniſters, great officers, and commanders all about her, and ſpoke to them after this manner. "I "need not tell you, (ſays ſhe) that the late "king my husband deſigned Izates for his "ſucceſſor, as the perſon of all his children "that he judg'd beſt qualify'd for the ho-"nour. But however, (ſays ſhe) I ſhall be "glad to have your advice along with me; "for one body's opinion is not ſufficient to "make a prince happy, without the joint con-"ſent and good will of the people." She ſpoke this by way of compliment, and only to try how the council ſtood affected. The queen making a pauſe after theſe words, the miniſters, with a profound reverence, according to the cuſtom of the country, declar'd themſelves unanimouſly for the promoting of Izates to the crown; being fully ſatisfy'd that it was his father's will it ſhould be ſo, as the perſon of his family whom he look'd upon to be beſt fitted for that dignity. The queen gave them thanks for this expreſſion of their zeal; but could not agree, ſhe ſaid, to have any blood ſpilt, till Izates ſhould come himſelf to order the matter as he thought fit. When the council found that the queen would not be prevail'd upon to take away their lives, they preſs'd it, however, that in the mean time, for the better ſecurity of the new king, they might be kept in ſafe cuſtody, and ſome other perſon, that the queen ſhould beſt approve of, entruſted with the adminiſtration in his abſence. The queen found the propoſal reaſonable, and pitch'd upon Monobazus, the elder brother, for the viceroy, ſet the crown upon his head, gave him his father's ſignet-ring, with the royal robe, together with the ſword of ſtate, * and committed the adminiſtration of affairs into his hands, till his brother ſhould come to take it himſelf. Izates was not long a coming, after he heard of his father's death; and immediately upon his arrival, Monobazus voluntarily deliver'd up his truſt.

WHILE Izates was at the fort of Spaſinus; a certain Jewiſh merchant, by name Ananias, having cultivated an acquaintance with ſome of the court ladies, inſtructed them in the knowledge of the true God, according to the rites and cuſtoms of the Jews. Theſe women brought the merchant to the knowledge of Izates; who converted him likewiſe to the ſame perſuaſion, and upon great importunities, kept him company in his journey to Adiabene, whither his father ſent to ſee him before he dy'd. It came to paſs alſo at the ſame time, that queen Helen herſelf was converted to our profeſſion by another Jew. Izates, at his return to Adiabene, was not a little troubled to ſee his brothers, and others of his kindred, in priſon there. He could not in conſcience either put them to death or keep them in chains; and then he thought it might be dangerous on the other hand, to ſet them at liberty, under ſuch a provocation to a revenge: ſo that he ſteer'd a middle courſe, and ſent them away for hoſtages; part with their children to Rome, to Claudius Ceſar, and the others to Artabanus, the king of Parthia.

Izates converted by Ananias a Jewiſh merchant.

Queen Helen converted by another Jew.

Izates troubled to ſee his relations priſoners.

He ſends them away for hoſtages: ſome to Ceſar, others to Artabanus.

WHEN Izates began to find how much his mother was delighted with the Jewiſh way of worſhip and government, he reckon'd it now high time for himſelf to make profeſſion of what he was; and accounting upon the whole matter, that he could not be a thorough Jew without being circumcis'd, he reſolv'd to perfect the work by initiating himſelf with that ceremony. His mother taking notice of it, did what ſhe could to divert him from it, for fear of the dangerous conſequences that would follow upon it; " For, (ſays ſhe) your ſub- " jects will all fall off from their allegiance, " ſo ſoon as they hear their king is gone over " to another religion, for they will never en- " dure a Jew upon the throne." This diſſuaſion of his mother put ſome reſpite to the execution of his purpoſe: and in the mean time, the king adviſed upon the point with Ananias, who told him that he was abſolutely of his mother's opinion, and threaten'd to leave him, if he went on with that deſign: " For, (ſays he) ſo ſoon as ever this ſhall " come to be known abroad, I myſelf ſhall " be the firſt, and the greateſt ſufferer, as the " author of this change, and fall under the " notion of a publick enemy and a ſeducer. " Beſides that, religion being an act of the " heart, God may be worſhipp'd as he ought " to be, without the external ceremony of " circumciſion, upon condition of an abſolute " reſignation to the precepts of Moſes, for " that is the acceptable worſhip; the other " being but a formal reſpect of the body, and " God will diſpenſe with that punctillio in a " caſe of ſo abſolute a neceſſity, when the " peace and ſafety of your dominions will be " endanger'd by the obſervance of it." This way of reaſoning wrought upon the king as the other wiſh'd it might.

Ananias deſcants upon the ſcruple of the caſe.

BUT it fell out that a while after, there came another Jew out of Galilee, Eleazar by name. He was a learned man, and well read in the Moſaical laws, and a perſon deſign'd, it ſeems, for the final determination of this queſtion: for the king's ſcruples were not quite out of his head yet. This Eleazar was introduced to Izates, whom he found poring upon the books of Moſes. " Sir, (ſays he) " you do not know all this while how great " an injury you do to the law, and conſe- " quently to God; for it is not enough to " know his holy will, without obeying his " commandments. How long do you intend " to continue in a ſtate of uncircumciſion? if " you have not as yet met with the law that " requires it, pray read it now, to the end " that you may know how great a ſin you " have to anſwer for in the omitting of it." The king was ſo thoroughly poſſeſs'd with what he ſaid, that without any more delay, he retir'd into a withdrawing-room, and ſent for a ſurgeon, who did the office immediately. The mother, and Ananias the director, were call'd to take notice of what was done, at the ſight of which they were ſtruck with the utmoſt confuſion and aſtoniſhment; " For, (they " ſaid) the king's government and perſon; " the publick peace, and their own heads (as " the adviſers) were all at ſtake, if the peo- " ple ſhould but get the leaſt intimation of " it; for they would never endure a prince " of another religion." But God in his mercy provided better for them, by delivering not only Izates himſelf out of great perplexities, and in truth deſperate extremities; to ſhew that piety and virtue ſhall never paſs unrewarded, and that God will never forſake thoſe that caſt themſelves wholly upon his providence and goodneſs. But we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more of this hereafter.

of his government, and to have the reputation both at home and abroad, of a prince highly in favour both with God and man, ſhe had a mighty mind to make a viſit to Jeruſalem, for the ſake of the famous temple there that ſhe had heard ſo much talk of, and to worſhip God, and offer up ſacrifices in it, according to the rules and uſage of the place. Her ſon was ſo far from being againſt it, that he furniſh'd her with a vaſt proviſion of money, and all other neceſſaries, and conducted her ſome days journey upon her way. The queen's coming to Jeruſalem was in a happy hour for the citizens; for there was ſo ſevere a famine in the town, that the people periſh'd for want of bread. Their diſtreſs was no ſooner made known to this charitable queen, but ſhe preſently ſent away ſeveral of her train; ſome to one place, ſome to another, to look about for relief: ſo that in a ſhort time there were brought in great quantities of wheat from Alexandria; dry'd figs from Cyprus, and the like; which ſhe cauſed immediately to be diſtributed to the poor, and got herſelf immortal honour by ſo doing. Her ſon Izates alſo, upon intelligence of this terrible dearth, ſent prodigious charities in money, to the governors of Jeruſalem for their poor. But the hiſtory of the royal bounties to this city will be more proper for another place.

Artabanus, the king of Parthia, had to do with a powerful and a factious nobility; and finding the conſpirators ſo ſtrong, and the plot ſo far advanc'd againſt him, that he durſt not truſt himſelf any longer in his own kingdom, he reſolv'd to apply himſelf to Izates, for advice and aſſiſtance, to protect him in his extremity, and if poſſible to reſtore him to his crown again. So he drew together, of his acquaintance and relations, a matter of a thouſand perſons, and met Izates upon the way: that is to ſay, he judg'd it to be Izates, by the magnificence of his train and equipage; for he did not know him perſonally. Upon advancing near him, he firſt ſaluted him after the manner of the country, with a reverence which they call adoration; and then made himſelf, and his condition known to him in words to this effect. "Behold, (ſays he) "great prince, your humble ſupplicant, and "do not deſpiſe an object of your generous "compaſſion. It hath been my fortune to "be caſt down from a throne of majeſty, in"to a private and an obſcure ſtate, which hath "forced me to have recourſe now to your "goodneſs for ſuccour; which I cannot de"ſpair of from a prince that ſo well under"ſtands the viciſſitudes of human affairs, and "how ſoon my preſent caſe may come to be "your own, as your preſent degree of eleva"tion was formerly mine: Beſide the com"mon intereſt of all princes in helping one "another; for the ſucceſs of one rebellion "paſſes for a precedent, and an encourage"ment to more, when the people are embol"den'd by ſucceſs." Theſe words were accompany'd with dejected looks and tears. Izates underſtanding that his petitioner was no leſs than Artabanus, immediately diſmounted from his horſe, and bad him recollect his ſpirits, and comfort himſelf with this aſſurance, that the wound was not incurable; and that providence would put a ſpeedy end to his preſent diſtreſs. "Prince, (ſays he) you "may depend upon it, that you ſhall find a "more conſiderable friend and ally than per"haps you are aware of; for I will either "ſee you reſtor'd to your crown, or I will give "you my own." Upon theſe words, Izates mounted Artabanus upon his own horſe, and walk'd a-foot by his ſide, in acknowledgment of a duty he owed to a king greater than himſelf. But Artabanus was ſo aſham'd of the compliment, that he ſwore by all the hopes he had of recovering his fortune and dignity, that he would diſmount, unleſs the other would get up again, and go before him. Izates then, in compliance with his reſolution, took horſe again, and conducted him into his palace, with all the honour and deference that it was poſſible for one prince to pay to another. He gave him the precedence in all caſes, private and publick, and at all collations and meetings; with a regard ſtill to his former greatneſs and glory, and without any abatement for his change of fortune: Conſidering that only as the common lot of mortals, and that what was one man's hap to day might be another man's to morrow.

A conſpiracy againſt Artabanus.
He applies himſelf to Izates for protection and ſuccour.
Izates gives him good hopes:
And treats him with all poſſible honour and reſpect.

His thoughts being now wholly taken up how to ſerve Artabanus, he wrote a preſſing and an effectual letter to the Parthians, to call their king home again: Offering to engage himſelf upon his honour for their indemnity, and that all paſt injuries ſhould be forgiven and forgotten. Their anſwer was rather an excuſe than a refuſal, for they had given the crown to another, one Cinnamus, they ſaid; ſo that it was out of their power to receive him: Beſide that the very attempt of ſuch a revocation would put all in a flame. Now this ſame Cinnamus, being a perſon of a very generous, juſt, and honourable diſpoſition; and having received his education under the care and direction of Artabanus, felt the pulſes of the nobility, and gave this anſwer, that let Artabanus come back when he would, he himſelf would be anſwerable for his ſecurity and reception. Artabanus made no difficulty at all of venturing himſelf upon this aſſurance, and ſo return'd. Cinnamus met him upon the way; did his reverence in form; and ſaluting him in the ſtile of KING, took the crown off from his own head, and placed it upon the head of Artabanus. This was the manner of his being reſtor'd to his kingdom, by the means of Izates, after he had been forc'd out of it by a faction of his nobles. Artabanus expreſs'd his gratitude to his benefactor, by a return of all honourable duties and reſpects. He gave him the privilege of wearing ſuch a Tiara, and ſuch a ſort of bed, as only the kings of Parthia had a peculiar right to uſe. He beſtow'd upon him the country of Niſibis, formerly belonging to the kings of Armenia; a large and a fruitful territory, and famous, for the antient city of Antioch, afterwards called Mygdonia, that the Macedonians erected there. Theſe were the acknowledgments that Izates received from Artabanus, in conſideration of the good offices he had render'd him.

thoſe people, to be drawn into a league againſt ſo powerful an enemy: Beſide that having five ſons train'd up among them, to learn their language, and diſcipline, and his mother a conſtant woman at her devotions in the holy temple, he had ſome ſort of tie upon him, even of honour as well as diſcretion, not to meddle. Now as he was utterly againſt it himſelf, he did what he could alſo to take off Vardanes, by continually urging to him the prodigious ſtrength, courage, and exploits of the Romans, in hope to deter him from his purpoſe by ſuch ſtories: But ſo far was the Parthian from being diſcourag'd by big words, that on the contrary, he made war immediately upon Izates. But as providence was pleas'd to order the matter, for the humbling of his vanity, it had been much better for him to have let that enterprize alone. For when the Parthians came to find Vardanes ſo reſolute upon a war with the Romans, they took their opportunity to cut him off, and committed the government to his brother Gotarza, who a little while after was taken off by treachery himſelf too, and his brother Vologeſus ſucceeded him, who divided the government betwixt his two brothers by the father's ſide: Pacorus the elder had Media, and Tiridates the younger had Armenia. Monobazus, the brother of the king, together with the reſt of the kindred, taking notice of the exemplary piety of Izates, with a reſpect to God and his worſhip, and the bleſſings that attended it; and of the reputation he had gain'd in the world upon the account both of a virtuous life, and of being a man happy to all other purpoſes, they began to bethink themſelves of quitting the religion of their country too, after his example, and of betaking themſelves to the obſervance of the Jewiſh manners and cuſtoms. The great men of the kingdom ſuſpecting his deſign, reſented it highly, but however ſmother'd their reſentment to wait for an opportunity of taking their revenge. So they wrote to Abias, the king of Arabia, and tempted him with large promiſes of money to make war upon their prince, with an aſſurance, that upon the firſt encounter they would leave the king in the plain field. "He had abandon'd the religion "of his country, (they ſaid) and he ſhould "not carry it off unpuniſh'd." Upon this, they ſtruck a league with the Arabian, and preſs'd him to ſet about it immediately, without delay. Abias did as they deſir'd, and forthwith march'd away with a conſiderable army againſt Izates. The main bodies were no ſooner come within ſight of one another, but Izates's men, according to their agreement, betook themſelves to their heels, as in a kind of panick conſternation, and without ever ſtriking a ſtroke. By this time Izates found himſelf evidently betray'd; but made his retreat however without any confuſion or diſorder, into his camp; where, upon a ſtrict enquiry into the myſtery of this deſertion, he diſcover'd it manifeſtly to be a treaſon concerted betwixt his people and the enemy, detected ſome of the conſpirators, and puniſh'd them according to their deſerts. On the day following he ſought Abias, and routed him, made a great ſlaughter of one part of the army, and put the reſt to flight, cloſely purſuing the king himſelf up to the caſtle of Arſamus, which he took by ſtorm, rifled it, and carrying off a vaſt booty, return'd in triumph to Adiabene.

BUT the great men of Adiabene, notwithſtanding this diſappointment, and that providence had laid them at the king's mercy, would not yet deſiſt from their deſigns; but in a ſupplicatory letter to Vologeſus, the king of the Parthians, begg'd of him to find ſome way to rid them of Izates, by taking them into his own protection, and appointing whom he thought fit of his own nation to rule over them; for "the king (they ſaid) was an apoſtate "from the religion they were brought up in, "and all the people hated him for it." This put the Parthian upon picking a quarrel with Izates, though without any colourable pretence in the world. The firſt thing he did toward the execution of his purpoſe, was a revocation of all the honours and advantages which his own father had confer'd upon him, together with the menace of an immediate war, if he ſhould but dare in any ſort to diſpute his pleaſure. This meſſage gave Izates a great deal of uneaſineſs upon ſeveral accounts. It would have been a mean thing, he thought, to be frighted into a reſignation of the privileges he was ſo duly poſſeſs'd of, and had ſo well deſerv'd: And then he knew very well again on the other hand, that even in caſe of a compliance, that ſubmiſſion would not avail any thing. So that ſetting one thing againſt another, he came in the end to this poſitive reſolution, that he would commit all to providence; and in a full dependance upon God's aſſiſtance, he would caſt life, honour and fortune upon the iſſue of a battle. In this determination, he ſecur'd his wives and his children in a ſtrong caſtle; laid up great magazines and ſtores of corn, and other neceſſaries in the beſt forts he had; burnt and deſtroy'd all the forage and hay round about him, and ſo ſtood firm, and in a poſture to receive the enemy. The Parthian had drawn together a mighty army of horſe and foot ſooner than people could have imagined, and pitch'd his tents upon the bank of a river that parts Adiabene from Media: Izates encamping alſo not far from thence, with a body of about ſix thouſand horſe. Vologeſus gave him to underſtand by a meſſenger, that he was now advancing againſt him with the whole force of the empire from Bactria to Euphrates, to call him to an account for his ingratitude to his maſters, and that it was not in the power of the God he truſted in to ſave him. Izates gave the meſſenger this anſwer, That he did not pretend to vie numbers with him, but that he was under the protection of a God that was not to be controul'd by any human power. With this return he diſpatch'd away the herald, and proſtrating himſelf upon the ground, his head cover'd with aſhes, and himſelf, his wives, and his children, faſting and praying, he call'd upon God, as follows.

and humiliation of this good man were so remarkably heard and accepted, that upon intelligence, the very same night, of the Dahe, and the Sace (people of Scythia) falling into Parthia with a strong army, and ravaging the country now in the king's absence, Vologesus was fain to draw off his army, and leave his work undone, to encounter this diversion; which was a most evident indication of a providence in Izates's favour.

Izates dies, Monobazus succeeds him.

NOT long after, this religious prince died, having lived 55 years, and reign'd 24, leaving twenty-four sons behind him, but yet appointing his brother Monobazus for his successor, as a just acknowledgment of the honour and integrity of his behaviour, in delivering up the crown which upon the death of their father he was possessed of in trust, during his absence. The mother Helen could not but be infinitely afflicted for the loss of so dear and dutiful a son; but it was a great ease to her heart yet, to find that the elder brother succeeded to the government. So that the next thing she did, was to find him out and go to him. She return'd upon this to Adiabene, and did not long survive her son Izates after it. Monobazus sent the bones of his brother and his mother away to Jerusalem, to be deposited in the pyramids that he had built there, being three in number, and a matter of three † furlongs from the place. This impostor had a world of followers, but their folly and madness cost them dear, for Fadus turning loose some troops of horse among them before they were aware, many of them were kill'd, divers taken alive, and among the rest, Theudas, whose head they cut off, and carried for a spectacle in triumph to Jerusalem. This happened when Cuspius Fadus had the administration of Judea.

The offender's head is struck off, to prevent more mischief.*

THE Paschal feast, or the Jews feast of unleaven bread, being now at hand, brought up vast multitudes of people to the solemnity. Cumanus thought it good discretion, for fear of any disturbance, to set a company of soldiers for a guard upon the temple, sufficient to quiet a tumult if any disorder should happen: Which was no more than what had been done by his predecessors on the like occasion. Upon the 4th day of the festival, a soldier exposed himself to the people quite naked, which put them into an outrageous exclamation against the beastly insolence of the affront; not so much upon them, as upon God himself, to whose honour this feast was dedicated. And some among them that were bolder than the rest, rail'd at Cumanus, as if the soldier durst not have ventured to have done it of himself without his encouragement. Cumanus was highly provok'd to have so scandalous a reproach cast upon him; but however giving them gentle language, he desir'd them not to do any thing at such a time and place that might look like sedition. But he quickly found that gentleness would do no good, for instead of being quieter, they gave him more abusive language than before. Whereupon he commanded the whole army into the castle of Antonia, which we have as he said before, overlooks the temple. The common people were so terribly frighted upon the advance of these soldiers, that they shifted away as fast as they could; and pressing upon one another thorough several strait and narrow passages, so many of them were thrown down, and trod under foot by their own people, taking it to be the purſuit of the enemy, that there were twenty thouſand perſons ſmother'd and trampled to death in the crowd; which turn'd the feſtival into a day of mourning, and quitting their prayers and their ſacrifices, they gave themſelves up wholly to out-cries and lamentations. And all this miſchief from the impudence of one beſtial ſoldier.

This calamity was hardly over, but it was immediately follow'd by another; for ſome of thoſe that had eſcaped being ſqueezed to death in the preſs, and got a matter of a hundred † furlongs from the town, finding a certain domeſtick of the emperor's travelling upon the high-way, whoſe name was Stephen, they aſſaulted him, ſtript him, and took away all he had. The report of this robbery coming to Cumanus, he preſently ſent away ſoldiers to the place where it was committed, with orders to rifle all the villages thereabouts, and to bring away ſome of the principal inhabitants priſoners. In the heat of the pillage and havock the was a ſoldier there had thta fortune to light upon the books of Moſes among other plunder. He brought them out, and when he had ſtorm'd and raged like a madman, againſt both the laws themſelves, and the whole nation of the Jews, he tore them all to pieces in the face of the people. The ſtory of this inſolence and contempt was no ſooner brought to the Jews, but they immediately gather'd together in multitudes, and went with their complaint to Cumanus, who was then at Ceſarea, deſiring him to do them right upon the rioter, not as in a private injury, but in the cauſe of God himſelf. The governor durſt not deny them juſtice, for fear of a popular revolt; but upon advice with his friends, had the criminal's head ſtruck off for the violation of the law, and ſo put a ſtop to the progreſs of another tumult.

A quarrel betwixt the Jews and Samaritans of Nais.

AFTER this was over there aroſe a diſſention betwixt the Samaritans and the Jews; and upon this occaſion. It being uſual for the Galileans to travel by the way of Samaria to Jeruſalem, upon the celebration of their feſtivals, they happened to paſs one time by a village called Nais, under the juriſdiction of Samaria, and ſituated in the great plain, where there fell out a quarrel betwixt the paſſengers and the villagers, and ſeveral of the Galileans were ſlain. Some of the chief among them took this affront in ſuch indignation, that they animated the Jews to take up arms, and with ſword in hand to aſſert their liberties. Slavery, they told them, was at beſt ſcandalous and troubleſome; but when that ſervitude is accompanied with arbitrary injuſtice, it becomes altogether intolerable. The magiſtrates did what they could to make things eaſy, and undertook ſo far for Cumanus, that he ſhould give them ſatisfaction upon the authors of this tumult. But the people were deaf to all terms of pacification. Nothing but arms would ſerve their turn, and they made choice of Eleazar, the ſon of Dineus, to head them. This Eleazar had been for ſeveral years a mountaineer, and one that made it his profeſſion to live upon ſpoil, particularly ravaging up and down in Samaria with fire and ſword. Cumanus, being given to underſtand the preſent poſture of affairs, drew out ſome ſquadrons of horſe from Sebaſte, and four companies of foot, with a body of the Samaritans in arms, and ſo advanced upon the Jews, kill'd a great many of them, and took more priſoners.

Several Galileans ſlain.

The Jews animated to take up arms.

They chuſe Eleazar, for their leader.

Cumanus puts the mutineers to the rout.

THEIR condition was now ſo hopeleſs and forlorn that the beſt men among them, for ſobriety, ſenſe, and quality, betook themſelves to prayer and humiliation in ſack-cloth and aſhes, for the averting of thoſe dreadful judgments that hung over their heads; not omitting at the ſame time ſuch popular arts and arguments, as were moſt likely to bring the multitude to better reaſon. As for example: They ſet before them the deſolation of their country, the burning and demoliſhing of their temple, the carrying captive and enſlaving of their wives and chidren to profane nations; begging of them upon the whole matter, as ever they lov'd their country, their lives, liberties, families, laws, and religion, to betake themſelves to more moderate councils for the future, and peaceably to go back again to their own houſes, lay down their arms, and be quiet. This way of reaſoning brought them ſo far to their wits again, that the common people withdrew, and the tumult diſſolv'd; the rovers returning to their old quarters and trade again; from which time forward Judea became a neſt of thieves.

The multitude unruly and all arts us'd to pacify them.

THE heads of Samaria went now in a body to * Numidius Quadratus, the governor of Syria, (being then at Tyre) with a complaint againſt the Jews for firing and rifling their villages; which they were not ſo much troubled at, they ſaid, upon their own account, as for the encroachment upon the ſovereign authority of Rome, which had ſingly and ſolely the cogniſance of caſes of that quality: But theſe people, they ſaid, ran burning and rifling up and down, and took upon themſelves to be their own judges, as if the Roman magiſtracy had been no more than a mere cypher. This was their caſe, they ſaid, and they came to their governor only for juſtice. When the Samaritans had exhibited their caſe, and had ſet forth their grievance, the Jews, on the other ſide, turned the whole blame, both of the riot and of the combat, upon the plaintiffs; but laying the main ſtreſs of the charge upon Cumanus, who had been brib'd, they ſaid, into a connivance at a moſt notorious and bloody outrage. Quadratus, upon this accuſation and reply, adjourn'd the hearing, telling both parties, that he would go into Judea himſelf, and upon a perfect knowledge of the whole truth, paſs judgment accordingly; ſo that there was nothing more done at this time. Quadratus went a little after this into Samaria, and upon hearing the cauſe, found the Samaritans guilty of the riot. He was informed likewiſe of a practice among the Jews to raiſe a commotion, and cauſed ſeveral priſoners that Cumanus had taken into cuſtody to be crucify'd. He went from thence to Lydda, a borough that might paſs for a conſiderable city; where he heard the Samaritans caſe once over again; and underſtanding from a certain Samaritan that one Dortus, an eminent Jew, with four more of his own tribe, had encouraged the people to an inſurrection, he cauſed them all to be put to death: But as for Ananias the high-prieſt, and Ananus the captain, he ſent them bound to Rome, to anſwer for themſelves before Ceſar. He ſent alſo into Italy the chief of the Samaritans and the Jews, with Cumanus the governor, and Celer a tribune, in order to the deciſion of all their controverſies before the emperor. After this, he went to Jeruſalem, for fear of new broils there; but finding all things in peace and quiet, and the Jews ſo wholly intent upon celebrating their feaſt of the paſſover, and ſacrifices, that they minded nothing elſe, he let them alone in the free exerciſe of their profeſſion, and went back to Antioch.

The Jews blame Cumanus.

CUMANUS and the Samaritans, being now come to Rome, they were order'd to appear upon the day and place, ſet for their trial, having made ſo great an intereſt beforehand with the freemen and friends of Ceſar, that they would probably have carry'd the cauſe, if it had not been for Agrippa the younger, who was at that time at Rome. This Agrippa, finding the Jews in danger to be oppreſs'd by power, made application to Agrippina, the wife of Claudius, with earneſt importunities to preſs her husband for a fair and impartial hearing, and for juſtice upon the criminals, whoever they ſhould be found to be. Claudius was ſo far prevail'd upon by this interceſſion, that he heard both ſides in form; and finding upon the whole matter that the Samaritans began the tumult, judgment paſs'd againſt the plaintiffs; ſo that they were condemn'd to die, Cumanus to be baniſh'd, and Celer the tribune, to be carry'd to Jeruſalem, and dragg'd to death through the ſtreets, in the face of all the people. Claudius Felix, the brother of Pallas, was then then ſent governor into Judea.

Claudius Felix ſent into Judea.

THIS prince, in the twelfth year of his reign, beſtow'd upon Agrippa the tetrarchy of Philip and Batanea, with Trachonitis and * Abila, which had been formerly the tetrarchy of Lyſanias: But he took away Chalcis from him, when it had been four years under his government. This young man, after all theſe grants and bounties conferr'd upon him by Ceſar, marry'd his ſiſter Druſilla to Azizus, king of the Emeſenes, who was now become a proſelyted Jew. She had been promis'd before to Epiphanes, the ſon of Antiochus, upon his promiſe to embrace the Jewiſh religion: But upon his refuſal to come over, the match broke off. As for Mariamne, another of the ſiſters, he marry'd her to Archelaus the ſon of Chelcias, to whom ſhe had been contracted ſome time before, by her father Agrippa; and he had by this lady a daughter, call'd Berenice.

Druſilla, Agrippa's ſiſter, marries Azizus, a new converted Jew.

Mariamne marries Archelaus.

IT was not long after this that Druſilla and Azizus were parted, and it happen'd thus: Druſilla was look'd upon to be the greateſt beauty of her time. Felix the governor of Judea thought her ſo, and fell paſſionately in love with her: So he call'd Simon his particular friend to him (a Jew of Cyprus, and one that had the reputation of a famous magician) and gave him in confidence the ſtory of his amour, with inſtructions to try if he could get her off from her other husband to marry him, who would certainly make her the happieſt creature under the heavens. Druſilla, finding herſelf very uneaſy under the reſtleſs importunities of her ſiſter Berenice, unadviſedly entertained the propoſition, renouncing her religion as well as her husband, and married Felix, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Agrippa, who, in the days of Titus Ceſar, and in the prime of his youth, together with his wife, were both bury'd under a fiery eruption from the mountain Veſuvius, which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of hereafter.

Druſilla and Azizus part.

Felix in love with Druſilla.

He makes Simon the confident of his paſſion.

Druſilla quits both religion and husband, and marries Felix.

Agrippa and his wife bury'd under Veſuvius.

As for Berenice, ſhe liv'd a widow ſome conſiderable time after the death of Herod, who was both her husband and her uncle; but falling under a ſcandalous report of an inceſtuous familiarity with her brother, ſhe bethought herſelf of the moſt decent way how to wipe off that ſlander, which was by getting Polemon the king of Cilicia to turn Jew, and take her to his wife, which would paſs for a confutation of the rumour. Polemon conſented, and for the fortune's ſake, marry'd the woman. But Berenice being a lady that did not love to have her appetite reſtrain'd, quickly parted with her husband; and he at the ſame time, with his religion. Mariamne grew as weary of Archelaus too, and chang'd her bedfellow for Demetrius, the moſt eminent Jew of Alexandria, as well for extraction as eſtate; and at that time † Alabarches of this place. By this husband ſhe had Agrippinus; of whom we ſhall ſay more in due time and place.

good while, till Claudius marry'd her. She had a ſon by Domitius, that was called after his father's name, which was afterwards chang'd for Nero, upon Claudius adopting him into his family. This emperor had a former wife, whoſe name was Meſſalina, by whom he had children, * Britannicus and Octavia. This Meſſalina Claudius put to death out of jealouſy; but for his daughter Antonia, whom he had by Petronia, a former wife, and the eldeſt child he had, he married her to Nero, which was the name he gave to his adopted ſon.

She had a ſon by Domitius.

Meſſalina put to death for jealouſy.

His daughter Antonia marry'd to Nero.

AGRIPPINA's heart was ſet upon the advancing her own ſon to the empire; and therefore, it is ſaid, ſhe conſulted the death of Claudius, and the ſecuring of the ſucceſſion to Nero, both at the ſame time, for fear Germanicus ſhould interpoſe and ſupplant him. She had gotten currhus, Captain of the guards, the great officers, tribunes, friends and favourites, all in readineſs, as ſoon as ever the breath was out of Claudius's body, to carry Nero to the ſoldiers and proclaim him emperor. This they did, and this being done, his firſt exploit after his elevation, was the ſecret poiſoning of Britannicus, which was follow'd not long after, with the barefac'd murder of his own mother, in requital, both of the life ſhe had given him, and of the empire alſo that ſhe had procured him. He put his wife Octavia to death, and divers perſons of the firſt rank for integrity and honour, upon ſenſeleſs and fictitious pretences of plots againſt his perſon. But we have had the hiſtory of Nero over and over ſo often already from other hands, that there needs no more be ſaid upon the ſubject: Some indeed are as extravagant in the fulſome extreme of panegyrick and flattery, as others in the contrary exceſs of rage and prejudice, and the truth loſt betwixt them, which is an intemperance not to be endur'd in an hiſtorian: But I do not ſo much wonder at theſe falſities in the caſe of Nero, when I conſider that betwixt partiality and prepoſſeſſion, without any intereſt in the good or bad of the ſtory, hiſtorians have as little regarded the matter of fact in the lives of his predeceſſors. But for thoſe who care not what they write, let them write what they think fit, ſince that liberty pleaſes them. For my own part, my buſineſs is to relate nothing but what appears to be downright matter of fact, ſtrictly adhering to the naked truth, and aiming at as much brevity and conciſeneſs as the ſubject will allow, where any thing falls in by the by. But as to what concerns our own nation, I ſhall be very particular and plain, without either ſuppreſſing our misfortunes, or palliating our miſtakes.

To return now to my text, Azizus, the king of the Emiſenes, died in the firſt year of Nero, and his brother ſucceeded him; and Nero gave the Leſs Armenia to Ariſtobulus, the ſon of Herod king of Chalcis: He gave alſo to Agrippa a part of Galilee, ſubjecting likewiſe Tiberias and Taricheæ to his government, with an addition of Julias beyond Jordan, and of fourteen villages more under that juriſdiction.

Judea infeſted with robbers and impoſtors, &c. Dora of Jeruſalem in great credit with Jonathan. Felix agrees with Dora, to have him made away. Jonathan ſtabb'd by ruffians, &c. A falſe prophet draws the people after him, &c. A diſpute betwixt the Ceſarean and the Syrian Jews, &c. They fall to blows. Felix turns the ſoldiers upon them, Agrippa gives the high-prieſthood to Iſmael. The high-prieſts divide from the other prieſts. They walk with a guard; take away their tythes, and ſtarve the reſt.

THE ſtate of affairs in Judea grew every day worſe and worſe, and the land was quite over-run with robbers, impoſtors, and ſeducers, who drew the people after them in ſhoals, though there hardly paſs'd a day, but Felix put to death ſome or other of the gang; and Eleazar, the ſon of Dineus, captain of a conſiderable band among them, he got alive into his hands by downright breach of faith: For Felix gave him a ſolemn invitation to come over to him upon the parole of a man of honour, that he ſhould be ſafe and free to all manner of purpoſes; but as ſoon as he had got him in his power, he ſent him away preſently to Rome. Neither could Felix endure Jonathan the high-prieſt, for he would be ſtill minding him of his male-adminiſtration, and that the people, by whoſe intereſt chiefly and recommendation he came to the government, being diſobliged and offended with his miſconduct, would be ſure to charge all publick miſcarriages upon him. Felix took all good counſel of this kind for reproach, and therefore contriv'd with himſelf how he might get quit of theſe ungrateful importunities; for wicked men do not love to hear often of their faults. As he was thus bethinking himſelf, it came in his head that there was one Dora of Jeruſalem, a man that was look'd upon to be much in credit with Jonathan: So he tempted this Dora with the promiſe of a conſiderable ſum of money, if he could get Jonathan diſpatch'd out of the way; as there were bravo's enough to be had for ſuch an exploit. Dora undertook the commiſſion, and by this means the buſineſs was brought about. There was a certain crew of ruffians, with privy daggers under their coats, that went up to Jeruſalem under pretence of devotion. Theſe villains intermixing themſelves in company with Jonathan's train, took their opportunity, and ſtabb'd the high-prieſt in the crowd, and ſo came off without ever being call'd to an account for that ſacrilegious murder. This impunity prov'd ſuch an encouragement to other villanies of the like kind, that the ſame pretence and diſguiſe was made uſe of afterward, upon ſuch feſtival occaſions, for the cutting of throats, whether for money or for private revenge, or upon what other conſideration ſoever; and this not only up and down in ſeveral parts of the city, but in the very temple itſelf; as if the holineſs of the place were to be a protection to ſo execrable an impiety. And now what wonder is it, after the practice and ſufferance of ſuch abominable prophanations and pollutions, for God in this wrath to deliver up his city, and his own houſe into the hands of the Romans, to be purg'd with expiatory flames; the whole nation of the Jews, with their wives and children to be condemn'd to miſery and bondage, to bring them to a right application of the providence, and ſo to ſanctify the affliction to them.

Thieves and murderers at work in one place, magicians and impoſtors in another.

WHILE the thieves and murders were at work in one place, there were magicians and impoſtors as buſy in another, the multitude following them in droves into ſolitudes and deſarts to ſee the ſigns and miracles they promiſed them; but they paid dear for their curioſity, for they were preſently taken up by the order of Felix, and divers of them put to death.

A falſe prophet inveigles the people up to mount Olivet, &c. Pretends that they ſhould ſee the walls of Jeruſalem fall to the ground. Felix routs the rabble: But the prophet eſcapes.

There came at the ſame time a certain perſon out of Egypt to Jeruſalem, ſetting up for a prophet, and inviting the common people to follow him up to the top of mount Olivet, * five furlongs from the city; for when he came thither he would but ſay the word, he ſaid, and they ſhould ſee the walls of Jeruſalem fall flat to the ground, and make way for them to enter the city through the ruins. When Felix came to hear of this adventure, he made his ſoldiers ſtand to their arms; and breaking in upon them with horſe and foot, routed the rabble, kill'd four hundred upon the place, took two hundred of them alive; but the Egyptian that led them eſcaped.

THE thieves were now tampering the people yet once again into a rebellion againſt the Romans; notwithſtanding their late deſeat. "The yoke was intolerable, (they "ſaid) why did they not ſhake it off?" And at this rate they went railing up and down from place to place, burning and pillaging all that would not join with them.

A ſquabble betwixt the Ceſarean and the Syrian Jews, about privileges.

THERE fell out another unlucky diſſention at the ſame time too, betwixt the Ceſarean Jews and the Syrians, upon the queſtion of ſome certain privileges. The Jews claimed a precedency in the right of their king Herod as the firſt founder of that city, which the Syrians did not deny; but not of the tower of Stratton, they ſaid, which was originally the name of the place, before ever any Jew had ſet footing there. When the report of this controverſy came to the knowledge of the neighbouring governors, they cauſed the incendiaries on both ſides to be taken up, and whipt, which for a while put ſome ſtop to the tumult: But the town Jews, after all this, valuing themſelves upon their wealth, fell to vilifying and reproaching the Syrians with foul language, who returned it again upon the Jews, having ſeveral ſoldiers among them to ſupply with confidence what they wanted in matter of eſtate; ſo that giving the Jews as good as they brought, the brawl proceeded from words to ſtones, and from thence to blows, till in the end ſeveral were kill'd and wounded on both ſides, but the Jews had the better of it. When Felix found that this controverſy was already advanced to a little kind of war, he preſs'd it with great inſtance to the Jews that they would let fall the diſpute; but when he ſaw words would do no good, he ſent armed troops among them, who killed a great many of them, took more priſoners,

The incendiaries on both ſides taken up and whipt.

They fall to blows.

Felix turns the ſoldiers upon them, and gives them the booty.

and gave the ſoldiers the rifling of ſeveral rich houſes for their booty. The modeſter and the more honourable part of the Jews, for fear of worſe conſequences, went to Felix, and begg'd of him to call off his ſoldiers before it went too far, and while they had time to bethink themſelves and repent.

Agrippa gives the high-prieſthood to Iſmael the ſon of Phabeus. The high prieſts divide, walk with a guard, take away the tythes, and ſtarve the other prieſts.

KING Agrippa at the ſame time gave the high prieſthood to Iſmael, the ſon of Phabeus, and the high-prieſts themſelves began to divide from the other prieſts, and the governors of Jeruſalem; every man taking a guard along with him of the boldeſt, and the moſt ſeditious fellows they could pick up; railing and throwing ſtones at one another, and no more care taken to keep the peace than if the city had been entirely without magiſtracy. Nay, ſuch was the impudence of the high-prieſts, that they ſent their ſervants up and down into barns to take away the prieſts tythes; inſomuch that the poorer ſort of that holy order periſhed for want of bread. Thus it was, and thus it muſt be, where the violence of faction gets the upper hand of juſtice.

The Ceſarean Jews complain to Ceſar of Felix.

FELIX, being now remov'd from his government, and Porcius Feſtus ſubſtituted by Nero in his place, ſome of the principal Ceſarean Jews made a journey to Rome together, to accuſe Felix: And they would undoubtedly have cruſh'd him to death, for the violence and injuſtice of his behaviour toward the Jews, if his brother Pallas, who was at that time in great favour with Nero, had not obtained his pardon.

Pallas obtained his pardon.

Beryllus gets a mandate for diſfranchiſing the Jews.

THERE were two eminent Syrians of Ceſarea, who by a mighty ſum of money, made ſuch an intereſt with Beryllus, tutor to Nero, and his Greek ſecretary, that he got the emperor's letter mandatory to Ceſarea for the diſfranchiſing of the Jews, and abrogating all the privileges that they pretended to within that city; which privileges had been hitherto in common, both to Jews and Syrians. This was granted him without any difficulty; and that grant was the root of all the calamities that afterward befel us: For the Ceſarean Jews would never be quiet after this letter, till it came to a direct war.

Feſtus finds Judea over-run with vagabonds and Free-booters.

bond free-booters, that ravag'd up and down there in great numbers at pleaſure. Theſe robbers by the Romans were called * Sicarii from Sica, or the ſhort ſword they wore; a weapon bending toward the point, and betwixt a Perſian ſcymitar, and the Roman dagger. With theſe weapons they did terrible execution by thruſting themſelves into crouds upon great days when the city was throng'd under a colour of religion; and diſpatching whom they pleas'd in that confuſion, without any difficulty, or danger of diſcovery. But other whiles again they fell barefac'd with fire and ſword as into an enemy's quarter, and carry'd all before them.

A noted impoſtor inveigles the multitude into the wilderneſs.

THERE was in thoſe days a famous ſeducer who drew after him great numbers of people, whom he had deluded into an opinion, that if they did but follow him into ſuch a wilderneſs, no harm ſhould ever befal them; but Feſtus, with a detachment of horſe and foot, put a ſtop to the proceſſion, and deſtroy'd maſter and diſciples all together.

Feſtus deſtroys both leader and followers.

Agrippa builds a magnificent palace.

KING Agrippa cauſed to be erected near the porch of the royal palace at Jeruſalem, belonging formerly to the Aſſamonean family, a ſtately magnificent fabrick. It ſtood upon an eminence, with a noble proſpect into the city, and was ſo contrived that the king out of his bed-chamber could ſee every thing that paſs'd in the temple, which was a thing he took great delight in. But on the other ſide, the principal men among the Jews were as much offended at it. For according to our laws we do not allow of any ſpectators upon our holy rites and ceremonies, and more eſpecially our ſacrifices: ſo that, for prevention ſake, they ran up a high wall before the ſeats that incloſed the inward part of the temple toward the weſt; which did not only obſtruct the view from the king's bed-chamber, but the ſight alſo of the galleries to the weſtward on the other ſide of the temple, where the Roman guards us'd to ſtand upon high-days for the ſecurity of the place. The king took this very ill; and Feſtus, worſe: inſomuch that he order'd the wall to be taken down again. The citizens made anſwer, that their lives were not ſo dear to them as their temple; and therefore they humbly deſired time and leave to ſend their deputies to Ceſar about it, before any thing ſhould be put in execution. This liberty being granted them, they ſent to the emperor ten eminent citizens, with Iſmael the high-prieſt, and Chelcias the treaſurer of the temple, as their commiſſioners. Nero did not only paſs over what they had done, but effectually qualify'd it in permitting them to continue the wall as it was. This boon was granted them upon the intereceſſion of the empreſs Poppea, a pious woman, in favour of the Jews. The ten deputies were allow'd to come back again, but Poppea detained Chelcias and Iſmael as hoſtages. When Agrippa came to underſtand what paſs'd, he tranſfer'd the pontificate to Joſeph, otherwiſe call'd Cabis, the ſon of Simon, formerly high-prieſt.

Feſtus dies, and Albinus ſucceeds.

NERO receiving the news of Feſtus's death, gave his government to Albinus. Agrippa, at the ſame time, degraded Joſeph, and elevated Ananus, the ſon of Ananus, to the pontificate in his ſtead. This Ananus, the father, was look'd upon as one of the happieſt men living: for he had five ſons that came ſucceſſively to the pontificate after him, which no man alive could ſay but himſelf. The Ananus we are now ſpeaking of, was naturally of a fierce, and enterprizing diſpoſition, by ſect a Sadducee, the moſt cenſorious and uncharitable ſort of people upon the face of the earth, as we have ſaid elſewhere. This being his way and opinion, he took his opportunity in the interval betwixt the death of Feſtus and the arrival of his ſucceſſor Albinus (who was as yet but upon the way) to call a council together with the aſſiſtance of the judges; and to cite James, the brother of Jeſus which was called Chriſt, with ſome others, to appear before them, and anſwer to a charge of blaſphemy, and breach of the law; whereupon, they were condemn'd, and deliver'd up to be ſton'd. This was ſo offenſive and ſurprizing a way of proceeding to all the honeſt and conſcientious part of the city, that they preſently ſent the king private notice of it as a very ill thing done; with a requeſt that Ananus might have a check for it, and a caution never to do any ſuch thing again for the future. Others were ſent with an account of it to Albinus, who was then upon his journey to Alexandria, repreſenting it as an uſurpation and encroachment upon his authority; for without his conſent it ought not to have been done. Albinus took this ſo heinouſly, that he wrote an angry menacing letter to the high-prieſt upon it; and king Agrippa at the end of three months remov'd him from the high-prieſthood, and gave it to Jeſus the ſon of Damneus.

Ananus fierce bloody, and a ſadducee.

Ananus calls a council, and cites James the brother of Jeſus, &c. to appear before him.

The charge is blaſphemy, breach of the law, and they are ſentenc'd to be ſton'd.

Albinus writes a menacing letter to Ananus.

Agrippa puts him from the pontificate, and gives it to Jeſus.

ALBINUS was no ſooner come to Jeruſalem, but he apply'd himſelf with all poſſible care and diligence, to the quieting of the province, and began the work with ſuppreſſing and cutting off the robbers. Ananias the high-prieſt, at the ſame rate, made himſelf ſo popular by his affability and bounty, that he became every day more and more the darling of the people; ſtill plying Albinus the high-prieſt with respects and presents: but he had a company of lewd servants about him, who, joining with others as bad as themselves, went ranging about from one barn to another, and forced away the priests tithes from them; beating and wounding those that refused to deliver them. There were other high-priests also with their servants, who did the same thing too, for there was no body to controul them: the priests being ready to starve all this while, having nothing but their tenths to live upon.

ONE night upon an holiday-eve, the robbers stole privately into the city, and surprized the secretary of Eleazar, an army officer, and the son of Ananias the high-priest. They took him alive, bound him, and carry'd him away; and then sent Ananias word, that if he could get Albinus to discharge half a score of their companions that he had then custody, the secretary should be set at liberty. The necessity was so pressing that Albinus could not well refuse the gratifying of Ananias under the present circumstances; tho' the granting of this request proved of very ill consequence in the end. For when the highwaymen had found out the way of compounding their villanies, they were never without one invention or another to secure some of Ananias's relations for a pawn, which they never parted with but for some of their own comrades in exchange. By this way of proceeding they grew bold and strong, and laid the whole country desolate.

Agrippa enlarges Cesarea Philippi, and calls it Neronias. He builds a glorious theatre at Berytus.

KING Agrippa had now enlarged Cesarea Philippi, and given it the name of Neronias in honour of Nero. He built also at Berytus, a most magnificent and costly theatre, which he endow'd with a vast sum of money for the celebration of the yearly shows, and the distribution of doles of corn and oil among the people, in such a proportion by the head. He caused the city also to be beautify'd and adorn'd all over, with curiosities of statues and pictures, and such a collection of antique pieces and originals from the hands of the greatest masters in their several kinds, that this town was, in truth, the store-house of all that was rare and precious in the kingdom: but by this way of taking from his own people to gratify strangers, and of beggaring the one to the advantage of the other, he utterly lost himself in the hearts of his subjects.

He takes the high-priesthood from Jesus the son of Damneus, and gives it to Jesus the son of Gamaliel.

HE took away the pontificate from Jesus the son of Damneus, and gave it to Jesus the son of Gamaliel; which created such a feud between them, that they hardly walk'd the streets without a crew of ruffians at their heels, reproaching and railing still at one another as they met: sometimes with hard words, and sometimes it came again to stones; but Ananias, who had the most money, got consequently the strongest party.

Costobarus and Saul head the ruffians still at their heels.

COSTOBARUS and Saul, being both of the blood royal, and nearly related to Agrippa, had a very great interest too, and each of them a band of bravo's at his back to execute his commands, and to fight his quarrels. They were naturally insolent and rapacious, where they had to do with poor people that they might trample upon. From this juncture it is that we may date the mortal declension of our common-wealth, which from this time forward sunk still from bad to worse.

Gessius Florus succeeds Albinus.

WHEN Albinus heard that Gessius Florus was coming to succeed him, he had no better way, he thought, to ingratiate himself with the Jews, than to do justice upon the people, that he had in custody. So he caused all the prisoners to be brought before him, and upon examination of matters, proceeded against them according to their demerits: putting to death those that were manifestly guilty of capital crimes, and discharging the rest, who were in only for misdemeanors, upon fine and ransom. This was a way to clear the prisons, and likewise to stock the country with an encrease of thieves.

Privileges allow'd to the singing-men of the tribe of Levi.

THOSE of the tribe of Levi, who officiated in the temple as singing-men, besought the king, and prevail'd upon him to call a council, and to grant them the use of the linen-stole, a vestment peculiar to the priests; and suggesting that such a concession would stand upon record, as an act of grace, to the king's eternal honour. This request of theirs was heard and granted, in form and manner as they desir'd it, and the singing-men permitted to wear the stole. There were another sort of these Levites, who officiated in the services of the temple, and these were likewise allow'd, promiscuously, to serve in quality of singers. Now all this was directly against our national laws and customs, which were never abandon'd but with a judgment upon the violation.

Another sort of Levites admitted contrary to law.

The temple is now finish'd, and eighteen thousand men ready to starve.

THE building of the temple being now over, and a matter of eighteen thousand workmen, who had nothing to live upon but their labour, ready to starve for want of employment; the people not caring to have money lie by them for a prey to the Romans, and out of a desire to make some provision for them (for if they wrought but an hour they were sure of their wages) proposed the repairing of a building on the east-side of the temple, which overlooking a deep narrow valley, was supported by a wall of four hundred * cubits high, the stones smooth wrought, and white, and every piece † twenty cubits in length and six in depth, being the work of Solomon, the first founder of the temple. But Agrippa, who was entrusted by Claudius Cesar with the repairing of this glorious structure, computing with himself how much easier it was to destroy such a work than to rebuild it, especially a work that would take up so much time and money as that which was now propounded; he did not think fit to comply with this desire of the people; but if it might content them to beautify the city by paving the streets with white stone, he should not be against it.

The Jews petition for leave to repair the porch.

A description of the porch.

Agrippa refuses them.

THIS prince took away after this the high-priesthood from Jesus the son of Gamaliel, and gave it to Matthias the son of Theophilus; and in his days began the wars of the Romans against the Jews.

The original qualifications and number of the high priests.

IT will be proper for me in this place (with a respect to the work I have in hand) to give some account of the original of high-priests; the qualifications necessary for those that are to be admitted into this function, and the number of those that were advanced to this dignity as far as to the end of the war.

Aaron the first of the order.

The first of the order was Aaron, the brother of Moses; and after his death, his children succeded him; and so the honour descended in course to his family: And this custom of hereditary succession prevail'd so far with our forefathers, that none but those of the blood of Aaron were accounted capable of that holy office; not even kings themselves. From Aaron to Phanasus, who was declared high-priest by a faction in a time of war, there were eighty three in number: Thirteen of them officiating in that station from the time that Moses erected a tabernacle to God in the desart, to their entrance into Judea, where king Solomon built and dedicated the holy temple.

The succession hereditary.

From Aaron to Phanasus 83 in number

For at first there was no succeeding to the pontificate, but by a vacancy upon death, whereas it came to be a practice afterward to introduce another, while the former was yet living. These thirteen persons descending from the two sons of Aaron, succeeded to their honour in their turns. The form of government was at first aristrocatical; after that monarchical; ‡ and the next transition was to the title of kings. From the time of Moses's carrying us out of the land of Egypt to the building of Solomon's temple, we reckon upon six hundred and twelve years.

The government at first aristocratical; next monarchical, and then to the title of kings.

The history of the pontificate.

After the thirteen high-priests above-mentioned, there followed eighteen more, in four hundred sixty six years, six months and ten days, in succession one to another, under the government of kings. Computing from king Solomon, to the days of Nebuchadonosor king of Babylon; when he march'd up to Jerusalem and took it; burnt the temple, and carried away the whole nation, together with Josedec their high-priest, captives.

After a captivity of seventy years in Babylon, Cyrus the king of Persia, dismiss'd the Jews home again, with leave to rebuild their temple; Jesus, the son of Josedec, exercising at that time the function of high-priest. After him, came fifteen more of his posterity, who succeeded him in the same dignity, but in a popular way of government, till the time of king Antiochus Eupator, which was about four hundred and fourteen years; when this same Antiochus, with his general Lysias took away both the dignity and life of Onias, otherwise called Menelcus, at Berytus; but rejected his son from the succession, and set up Jacimus, high-priest in his place; one of the race of Aaron, 'tis true, but not of the pontifical family. Wherefore Onias, the son of Onias the deceased, went away into Egypt, and, insinuating himself into the good opinion of Ptolemy Philometor, and of Cleopatra, his wife, prevail'd upon them to build and dedicate a temple to God at Heliopolis, in imitation of that at Jerusalem, and to constitute him high-priest there; of which temple we have said enough elsewhere already. Jacimus died at the end of three years in the execution of the pontifical office, without a successor; so that there was a vacancy in the pontificate for seven years. But after the revolt of the Jews from the Macedonians, the dignity was transferr'd to the family of the Asiamoneans, and Jonathan preferr'd to the pontificate, which he enjoy'd for the space of seven years; and then being taken off by the treachery of Tryphon, his brother Simon was promoted to his place; and upon his being afterwards assassinated by his son-in-law, at a publick entertainment, his son Hyrcanus succeeded him, who held it for the space of one and thirty years; and then, upon his death, it went to his son Judas, otherwise called Aristobulus, who was the first that took upon him the name and quality of king; and after one year's reign, left his brother Alexander, heir and successor, both to the pontificate and to the kingdom: In both which capacities he administred for the space of seven and twenty years; and then departing this life, he transmitted the regency to his wife Alexandria, with authority to dispose of the pontificate, to which of the brothers she pleased; and she gave it to Hyrcanus, who enjoy'd it for the nine years that she reign'd: But upon her death, Aristobulus the younger brother made war upon him, overcame him, and reduced him to a condition of a private man; assuming both the kingdom and the pontificate to himself, which he held for three years, and just as many months: When Pompey, upon taking of Jerusalem, carried him and his children prisoners to Rome; and Hyrcanus, being restored to the pontificate, accepted also of the principality, but not under the title of king; enjoying the high priest-hood three and twenty years more, besides the other nine before spoken of. At the end of this term, Barzopharnes, and Pacorus, great men, and generals for the Parthians, pass'd the Euphrates, and made war upon Hyrcanus, took him alive, and carried him away prisoner; advancing Antigonus the son of Aristobulus to the crown, who in three months after, was taken in Jerusalem by Herod and Sosius: And then by the command of Anthy, put to death at Antioch.

Herod having now receiv'd the kingdom from the Romans, made no longer any scruple of chusing the high-priests out of the Assamonean race; but conferr'd the honour indifferently upon persons, tho' never so obscure, provided they were but in holy orders; saving only in the case of Aristobulus; for he made choice of him, being the grandchild of Hyrcanus, who was taken by the Parthians, and the brother of his wife Mariamne, to ingratiate himself with the people, who had the memory of Hyrcanus in great veneration. He was, in fine, so generally well belov'd, that Herod grew jealous of him, and drowned him at Jericho by a contrivance, swimming in a fish-pool; as we have said heretofore. After this time he would never confer the pontificate upon any of the Assamonean family. His son Archelaus took the same measures too, and so did all the Romans after him, that came to be governors of the province. From the days of Herod, in fine, to the burning of Jerusalem and the temple by Titus, there were in all eight and twenty high-priests that govern'd in the whole for the ſpace of a hundred and ſeven years; ſome of them under Herod and Archelaus, his ſon. But after their death, the government was Ariſtocratical, and the ſovereignty lodg'd in the pontificate; of which we have ſpoken ſufficiently already.

Geſſius Florus ſucceeds Albinus.

†GESSIUS FLORUS the ſucceſſor of Albinus to the government of Judea, by the appointment of Nero, was the man that made the Jews perfectly miſerable. He was by birth a Clazomenian, and the husband of Cleopatra, whom he brought along with him; a woman every jot as bad as himſelf. It was by her intereſt in the empreſs Poppea, that he obtain'd this dignity, which he abuſed afterwards to ſuch a degree, that the Jews would have accounted it a bleſſing if they could but have chang'd him for Albinus again; for tho' he had as much malice and miſchief in him as his heart and head would hold, he carried it cloſe and as private as he could yet: Whereas Florus on the contrary made an open profeſſion and oſtentation of his wickedneſs; as if it had been the buſineſs of his commiſſion to undo the nation. He was rapacious beyond meaſure, inexorably cruel, and ſo inſatiably covetous, that where there was any thing to be gotten, much, or little, nothing came amiſs to him. He went ſhares with the thieves, which gave a kind of authority to the trade, when they knew beforehand they could compound the robbery for ſuch a part of the booty. The oppreſſion, in fine, was ſo intolerable, that the miſerable Jews were forced to abandon their habitations, their country, and their altars, and to fly for ſanctuary to the moſt barbarous of ſtrangers. But without any more words, it was Florus alone that forced us upon a war with the Romans, in a reſolution rather to fall all together, than periſh one by one, with infamy and ſcorn. It was in the ſecond year now of Florus's government, and the twelfth of Nero's, when the war began; and whoever has a mind to be particularly inform'd in the hiſtory of what he did and ſuffer'd through the courſe of that war, ſhall but need to read over the books we have written upon that ſubject.

The husband of Cleopatra.

The character of Florus.

The beginning of the war.

I am now come to the end of my Antiquities, which I have brought down from the creation of the world to the twelfth year of the reign of Nero, in an hiſtorical deduction of what had befallen the Jews through ſo many ages; as in Egypt and Syria; what they ſuffered under the Aſſyrians and Babylonians; how they were treated by the Perſians and Macedonians; and how, laſt of all, by the Romans. I have alſo given an accurate and an orderly account of the conſtant and continued ſucceſſion of our high-prieſts for the ſpace of two thouſand years. And ſo likewiſe for the deſcent of our kings, and the courſe of other forms of government, as they ſucceeded one after another: their powers, adminiſtration, and affairs: All which I have faithfully extracted from the authority of holy writ, as I promiſed at the firſt entrance upon this work.

The hiſtory of the Jews from the creation of the world to the 12th of Nero.

AND I ſhall be bold to ſay this further, that no man living, my ſelf excepted, whether Jew or ſtranger, could have given the Greeks ſo juſt, and ſo punctual an account upon the whole matter, as I have done. For, without vanity, my own country-men will allow me to be as well read in the Moſaical law as any man. And then for my skill in the Greek tongue, I have ſtudied the Grammar, and the critical proprieties of it as much as another; but for the nicety of the accent in the perfection of pronouncing it, the ſpeaking of ſeveral languages, is a thing that our people neither practiſe nor value; but look upon it as a kind of a prophane ſtudy common to ſlaves as well as to gentlemen. The only wiſdom and learning, in fine, that we reckon upon, is a due application to the knowledge of our laws, and the holy ſcriptures, and a right underſtanding of them: An excellency that ſome two or three perhaps, of all that ever offer'd at it, have ſucceeded in to their honour and ſatisfaction.

IT will not be amiſs now at laſt, I hope, to ſay ſomewhat of myſelf: That is to ſay, of my family, and of the actions of my whole life; while there are people yet living, either to witneſs the truth of things, or to diſprove me. So that I ſhall now put an end to my Antiquities, as they are here compriſed in twenty books, and ſixty thouſand lines. And I do intend further, God willing, to draw up a ſhort relation of the whole war, from the beginning to this very day; being in the thirteenth year of the reign of Domitian, and of my age the ſix and fiftieth. * I have propounded alſo to write of the Jewiſh opinions, in four books concerning God himſelf, and his nature; and likewiſe of our laws, why ſome things are permitted by them, others forbidden.

† Voſſius, in his notes upon Catullus, reads Geſtius, or Ceſtius Florus.

* If we point theſe words in the original otherwiſe, they may be according to Epiphanius Scholaſticus, tranſlated thus: "I have propounded alſo to write of the Jewiſh ſects in four books; of God himſelf and his nature; "and of our laws; why ſome things are allow'd by them, and others forbidden.

EPAPHRODITUS:

IN ANSWER TO

APION, about the ANTIQUITY of the JEWS.

BOOK I.

I HAVE ſaid enough already in my JEWISH ANTIQUITIES, to ſatisfy my readers beyond all doubt, moſt excellent Epharoditus, that the Jews are a very antient people, and a nation indebted to themſelves for their orignal; beſide that they have kept up their claim from the beginning to this very day. This is no more than what I have made undeniably appear in a juſt hiſtory of five thouſand years, writ in Greek, drawn from the authority of holy writ itſelf: And all this is too little yet, either to ſecure me, the author of that piece, from calumny and reproach, or the whole ſtory at length from the vanity of a fable. For, ſay they, if the race of the Jews were ſo illuſtrious as Joſephus makes it, how comes it that none of the Greek hiſtorians of the beſt credit, ever took any notice of it? Now this being the caſe, I cannot do my ſelf a more neceſſary right, than in the firſt place, with all poſſible brevity, to confute and correct my malicious enemies, ſecondly, to inform and inſtruct the ignorant; and thirdly, to lay open indifferently to all lovers of truth, the naked ſtate of the matter. As for my authorities, I ſhall make uſe of none but of an undeniable reputation among the Greek writers: And for thoſe that have either ſpitefully, or ignorantly traduced me, or my writings, I ſhall overthrow their pretenſions out of their own mouths. I ſhall likewiſe ſhew how it comes to paſs, that the Greeks in general have made ſo little mention of us; and then for the reſt in particular, that they either knew nothing at all in reality, or at leaſt pretended to know nothing at all of the matter in queſtion.

The Jewiſh antiquities, a hiſtory of 5000 years.

What mov'd Joſephus to write this hiſtory.

THERE are a ſort of people ſo ſuperſtitiouſly addicted to the Greeks, that they make them the only oracles to be conſulted for the faith and credit of hiſtory, to the contempt and diſparagement of all other men and nations. Now I cannot but infinitely wonder at the confidence of theſe ſmatterers in antiquities, in theſe caſes where both reaſon and fact are directly againſt them. Wherefore we are not to govern our ſelves by this or that man's opinion, but by the weight and the intrinſick value of the thing itſelf. As for the Greeks, I ſee little or nothing among them that is not novel, and of yeſterday, as we ſay, either in their buildings, arts, or laws, and in fine, the very uſe of hiſtory is but of late date among them: Whereas by their own confeſſion the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Phenicians, (to ſay nothing of ourſelves) have from time to time recorded, and tranſmitted down to poſterity the memorials of paſt ages, in monumental pillars and inſcriptions, according to the advice and direction of the wiſeſt men they had, for the perpetual memory of all publick tranſactions of moment, and to the end that nothing might be loſt: Beſide that theſe people living in a clear air, the very climate contributed to the preſerving of theſe antiquities from corruption and decay; which was quite otherwiſe with the Greeks in both reſpects, either of duration, or of order and appointment.

The firſt inventors of letters.

It is natural enough for thoſe that ſet up new ſtates or ſocieties, to fancy themſelves the greateſt maſters of that oeconomy under the ſun. Now as to the Greeks skill in letters, they came not only late to the bare pretence, but they are not at this very hour come up to the perfect underſtanding of the matter. The antiquity they boaſt of looks no farther backward than to the Phenicians; and they value themſelves upon the reputation of having had Cadmus for their firſt maſter: But ſo far are they from being able to produce, either in their temples, or publick regiſtries, any one authentick memorial of theſe times, that when it came afterwards to be a queſtion, whether the uſe of theſe letters were ſo much as known at the time of the Trojan war, it was carried in the negative, that there was no ſuch characters then in being. It is moſt certain that there is no Greek manuſcript extant that dates before the poem of Homer: And it is likewiſe as certain, that the Trojan war was over before that poem was written. Nay, and it will not be allow'd neither that Homer ever committed this piece of his to writing at all; but it paſs'd by tradition from one generation to another, like a ballad ſong that the people had got by rote, till in the end copies were taken of it from dictates by word of mouth; which was the true reaſon of ſo many contradictions and miſtakes in the tranſcripts.

No Greek manuſcript before Homer.

As for Cadmus the Mileſian, Acuſilaus, and other Greeks, who afterwards attempted hiſtory; theſe were all but very little before the Perſians inroad into Greece. And ſo for Pherecydes of Syros, Pythagoras, and Thales, who were the firſt among them, that ever philoſophiz'd upon divine and celeſtial matters, they do all unanimouſly own the Egyptians and the Chaldeans for their maſters; and for the little that we find publiſh'd in writing upon that point, however it may have the reputation of ſome antiquity, yet whether theſe men were the authors of it or not, remains to this day a queſtion.

How unreaſonable a thing is it for the Greeks now to appropriate to themſelves, not only the ſole knowledge of antiquity, but a pretence likewiſe before all others for men of hiſtorical faith, candor, and credit! Nay, is it not evident on the contrary, from their own works, that the hiſtory they deliver is not ſo much matter of fact, as conjecture and opinion; and that every man writes according to his fancy? Their authors ſtill claſhing one with another, and impoſing upon the world inconſiſtent reports, at the ſame time, of one and the ſame thing.

It would be tedious, and time loſt, to run through all the diſagreements betwixt Helanicus and Acuſilaus, in the matter of their genealogies; the differences betwixt Heſiod and Acuſilaus; to ſhew how many times over and over Ephorus hath given the lye to Hellanicus, Timeus to Ephorus, thoſe that came after Timeus, to Timeus himſelf, and, in fine, all to Herodotus.

Thucydides himſelf cenſured.

Neither does Timeus agree any better with Philiſtus, or Callias, in their Sicilian hiſtories: Neither do the hiſtorians of Athens and Argos accord any better than the reſt, but fall foul one upon another. Now, in one word, what hiſtorical agreement are we to expect from the reporters of private actions and adventures, when even in the courſe and narration of the Perſian war, the moſt celebrated authors are at variance among themſelves! Nay, the truth and credit of Thucydides himſelf is called in queſtion upon ſeveral occaſions, tho' the moſt cautious, candid, and untainted hiſtorian of the age he wrote in.

The Greeks divided, and the reaſons of it.

There may be many reaſons given for this diſagreement among the Greek authors, if a man would but apply himſelf to the finding of them out. But the two points that I lay the principal ſtreſs upon, are theſe. Firſt, the failing of the Greeks in not laying a timely foundation of hiſtory in records and memorials, to conſerve the memory of all great actions: For without theſe monumental traditions, poſterity is left at liberty to write at random; and to write falſe too, without any danger of being contradicted in the hiſtory of former times. Now this way of keeping publick regiſters hath been neglected, not only in other parts of Greece, but it was never heard of, even in Athens itſelf, where the people paſs by the name of earth-born, with a reſpect to their original, and value themſelves above all others, both for antiquity and letters. Draco's penal laws are univerſally allow'd antecedent in time to all other of their writings, tho' bearing date but a little before the tyrant Piſiſtratus. And what ſhall we ſay now to the Arcadians, who boaſt pretenſions to a priority alſo, tho' they came later to the uſe of letters than any of the reſt?

Now there being no lights or authorities extant, for a guide to thoſe that were deſirous to learn, or to ſet others right, that went either innocently or maliciouſly out of their way, how was it poſſible but hiſtorians muſt be divided and confounded among themſelves, eſpecially when truth is made the leaſt part of their buſineſs, how fairly ſoever they may profeſs and pretend to the contrary? They write, in effect, for popular applauſe; and if they can but get the reputation of good orators, no matter for diſcharging the part of honeſt men. Some write merely for fancy or humour, without any regard of juſtice to the ſtory; others in a panegyrical ſtrain, to curry favour with kings and ſtates; and there are ſome again who ſpend their time in calumniating the writings and the perſons of thoſe that went before them, thinking thereby to acquire a reputation; which is all contrary to the rule and office of an hiſtorian.

The certain marks of a true hiſtory.

It is the infallible mark of a true and genuine hiſtory, when ſeveral writers agree in the ſame thing, time, and place; but the Greeks in contradicting one another, made that diverſity an argument of truth. If the queſtion betwixt them and us, were choice of words, or delicacy of ſtyle, we ſhould never diſpute the precedence with them; but for matter of fact and antiquity it is quite another caſe.

The Grecians better orators than hiſtorians.

The

The antiquity and uſe of records.

The regiſters under the care of the prieſts.

THE Egyptians and the Babylonians are known to have been very diligent and exact of old, in the marking of their accounts and annals. This way of regiſtring among the Egyptians, was the prieſts province, who took a great deal of care and pains, in the diſcharge of that duty. The Chaldeans did the ſame thing with the Babylonians; and the Phenicians, intermingling with the Greeks, inſtructed them alſo in the uſe of letters, for the government of life, and the upholding of publick traditions. But this being acknowledg'd on all hands, more diſcourſe upon it in this place would be needleſs. So that I ſhall only content myſelf to ſhew briefly, that our foreſathers provided at leaſt as well for the ſecuring of this order and regulation, if not better, than any that went before them, in charging the high-prieſts, and the prophets with this commiſſion; which practice has been continued with great integrity, to this very day: Nay, if I might ſpeak a bold word, I durſt almoſt pronounce that it ſhall never fail. For there was not only care taken from the beginning, to make choice of men of exemplary piety and virtue, for this function; (over and above that they were ſet apart alſo for the ſervice of the altar) but a proviſion was likewiſe made for preſerving the ſacerdotal race, untainted with any prophane or adulterate mixture; for no man is qualify'd for the office of a prieſt whoſe mother was not of a prieſtly extraction; and therefore, without any regard to wealth or honour, whoever pretends to the prieſthood muſt prove his deſcent in a right line, by a multitude of witneſſes.

Cuſtoms about marriages, and pedigrees.

AND this rule holds not only in Judea, but wherever our people are diſpers'd over the face of the whole earth; as in Egypt, and and Babylon; and all over the world; in fine, where our prieſts make it a point of conſcience only to intermarry with their own tribes. In this caſe they ſend, from the father to Jeruſalem, the name of the woman they have a mind to marry, with a draught of her pedigree, well and ſufficiently atteſted. But in a time of war, (which many times falls out) as for inſtance in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey the great, and Quintilius Varus, and particularly within our own memory; in this caſe, the ſurviving prieſts reform and ſupply the old regiſters, compoſe new ones, and put the women that are left to the ſcrutiny of a ſtrict examination. The prieſts marry no captives, for fear of contracting a foreign mixture: and there can be no clearer proof of their integrity, than that the names of all our prieſts, in an uninterrupted ſucceſſion from father to ſon, have now ſtood upon record throughout a great tract of two thouſand years. If any one man among them falſifies or prevaricates, he is preſently forbidden the holy altar, and depoſed from the exerciſe of his function. In this method, we are certainly, and neceſſarily in the right. All men are not allow'd to write; and we meet with no contradictions in thoſe that do. As for thoſe unaccountable antiquities among the prophets, we look upon them as divine revelation rather than hiſtory: but for others who write the ſtory of their own times, the number of them is not very great, neither are they very repugnant one to another. But to come to my buſineſs.

Twenty two books of holy writ.

I RECKON only upon two and twenty books that we are bound to believe; and thoſe two and twenty books comprize the hiſtory of the world from the beginning of it to this day; five books of theſe two and twenty, treat of the creation of the world and the generation of mankind, and ſo to the death of Moſes, in a ſeries of little leſs than three thouſand years.

The hiſtory of the Bible.

FROM the death of Moſes to the reign of Artaxerxes, the ſon of Xerxes, and the king of Perſia, every one of our prophets wrote the hiſtory of the age he liv'd in, comprehending the whole in thirteen books; the other four books containing holy hymns and moral precepts. There is alſo a courſe of hiſtory * from Artaxerxes to this inſtant, which we look upon with great veneration, but incomparably ſhort of what we aſcribe to the other, for want of the ſucceſſional line and deſcent of the prophets to make it ſtill more authentick and ſacred. As for the other works, we give as much credit to them, as we would do to our own eyes; having been thus long in the world without any attempt upon them, either to add or to diminiſh; nay, or but ſo much as to transform, or to diſguiſe them. But we ſet a value upon theſe writings, as divine; we call them ſo, and we are train'd up from the very cradle to meditate, to obſerve, and to maintain them as ſuch, and, finally, to ſuffer death chearfully in their defence rather than forſake them.

The bravery of the Jews above the Grecians.

HOW many are there of our captive countrymen, at this day, ſtruggling with all manner of deaths, and labouring under exquiſite torments, contending in the theatres with beaſts and more brutal men! And what's their crime, but that they will not renounce their country's laws, and blaſpheme the God of their fore-fathers? When did ever any of the Greeks ſtand ſuch a trial of their honour and courage? a people that would rather ſuffer all the writings they have in the world to be deſtroy'd, than expoſe their perſons to the leaſt danger for their preſervation. But alas! they look upon all that is ſacred of that kind, to be no more than words of courſe. And this is the caſe even of the beſt of their hiſtorians. For they take upon them to write hiſtory without any privity many times to the fact, or ſo much as either conſulting or believing thoſe that have been upon the place, and parties to the action. What extravagant uncouth hiſtories of our late wars have we ſeen publiſh'd, by perſons that never came within diſtance of underſtanding one ſyllable of the matter! But if they can patch up a medley of fancy and hear-ſay, they have the confidence to ſet up preſently for hiſtorians of the firſt rate.

Hiſtorians upon gueſs and hearſay.

BUT this is not yet the caſe of my hiſtory; for I have deliver'd nothing but upon ocular teſtimony and certain knowledge; and having the means of informing myſelf in every thing that paſs'd, I have been likewiſe as faithful in the report of things, as I was juſt and accurate in the ſcrutiny. I had a command in Galilee, ſo long as our people were able to defend themſelves againſt the Romans; but it was my fortune, in the end, to be made a priſoner, ſoner, and carry'd in cuſtody to Veſpaſian and Titus, who order'd me at firſt to be kept bound, with a commiſſion at the ſame time to obſerve and to inſpect what was done; but I was afterwards ſet at liberty, and went abroad with Titus from Alexandria, upon occaſion of the ſiege of Jeruſalem.

* Our author here means the books of the Apocrypha.

Joſephus's undeniable authority for what he ſays.

There was nothing at that time eſcap'd my knowledge. The motions of the army were all open to me, and no care wanting on my part, to repreſent every thing with the greateſt exactneſs: and ſo for the ſtate of the city, I had it from priſoners and deſerters, with the emperor's expreſs order to take them all into my particular care and aſſiſtance. I made the beſt, in fine, of my notes, and out of thoſe minutes, compil'd my hiſtory.

This hiſtory was compiled at Rome.

The foundation being now laid, and myſelf at Rome, and at leiſure, I took ſome friends to my aſſiſtance in the Greek tongue, and went on with my work; wherein I have diſcharg'd myſelf with that ſcrupulous nicety of candour and juſtice, that I dare ſay the generals themſelves, Veſpaſian and Titus, will vouch for me. Now theſe were the perſons to whom I made the firſt preſent of my book; and next after them, to certain noble Romans who commanded in the ſame war: others I ſold to ſuch of our own party as I found well skill'd in the Greek language; as Julius, Archelaus, the incomparable Herod, and the moſt excellent king Agrippa; who do all acquit me with one voice, that I have behav'd myſelf like a faithful hiſtorian, and would undoubtedly have expos'd the abuſe, if I had either left out or put in any thing through ignorance, or for favour. And now ſome people treat me as a cheat, as they would do a boy at ſchool, upon the declamatory, betwixt trifling and detraction: but they never conſider, that whoever takes upon him to tell the truth, he ſhould make ſure in the firſt place to know it himſelf, and that muſt be done either by himſelf or with the help of another; and I have already gone both theſe ways to work.

He appeals to the generals themſelves, and ſeveral great officers for the truth of it.

Joſephus treated as an impoſtor.

He refers the cafe and clears himſelf.

As for my antiquities, I have, in the quality of a prieſt, and in the way of my profeſſion, extracted them out of the holy ſcripture, and digeſted them into a methodical order. But in the hiſtory of the war I was an actor in ſome caſes, a ſpectator in others, and, upon the whole matter, a ſtranger to nothing that was either done or ſaid. How ſhameleſs an impudence is it now for theſe people to contend with me for the truth: nay, putting the caſe as they pretend, and that they have indeed had the ſight of Titus's and Veſpaſian's journals, what does this ſignify to the invalidating of my hiſtory, in a point where the Roman generals were abſolute ſtrangers to the matter?

This digreſſion was but neceſſary, to ſhew what a ſort of hiſtorians we are like to have, if this liberty goes forward. But there is enough ſaid, I think, to ſatisfy any man, that the very Barbarians themſelves ſtand fairer for the dignity and reputation of that pretence than the Greeks.

The Greeks will have the Jews to be upſtarts.

I come now to a ſort of people that will have the Jews to be novel, and no better than upſtarts; becauſe the Greeks, they ſay, make no mention of us. I ſhall then cite my authorities out of books writ by authors of other nations, whereby it will appear with what little reaſon our adverſaries advance ſo falſe and ſcandalous an aſſertion.

As to the place of our habitation or abode, we live in a midland-country; and for the matter of trade and travel, we never trouble our heads upon either of thoſe two accounts. Our cities lie remote from the ſea; the ſoil fruitful, and well dreſs'd and cultivated. Our greateſt care is for the maintenance and education of our children, and to have them train'd up to piety, and in obedience to the laws of our country: and this is it we reckon upon as the main buſineſs of our lives. After all this, we have a peculiar way of living to ourſelves, which gives us to underſtand that in times paſt we had no communication with the Greeks; as the Egyptians and Phenicians had: and ſo had others alſo, by a common tie of navigation, trade and commerce, for the advancing of their fortunes. Neither did our predeceſſors make inroads upon their neighbours, as other people have done, for the enlarging of their eſtates; tho' they wanted neither numbers nor courage, to be dangerous and troubleſome, if they would have ſhewn themſelves quarrelſome.

Thus it was that the Phenicians became known to the Greeks; and by them the Egyptians, and other traders into Greece. After theſe, the Medes and Perſians, who having gotten into the command of Aſia, the Perſians carry'd the war into Europe. The Thracians became known by neighbourhood; the Scythians, by holding a correſpondence with thoſe that uſe the Pontus; and ſo all along the eaſtern and the weſtern ſea, the people could not fail being taken notice of by hiſtorians. But for thoſe who lived remote from the ſea, far into the continent, they were unſeen and unheard of for many ages: And this is no more than what happened in Europe too; when after an eſtabliſhment of the Roman power and greatneſs, and ſo many wars waged, and conqueſts obtained by them, yet neither Herodotus nor Thucydides, or any other of their contemporaries, ever made ſo much as the leaſt mention of this mighty empire; till the diſcovery of it came at length to the Greeks, and with very much ado.

A notorious blunder of a famous hiſtorian.

But what will become of common writers, when Ephorus himſelf, the flower of the whole choice, ſhall be guilty of ſuch a blunder as this, for example, that I am about to tell you? He takes upon him to give an account of the Gauls and Iberians, and makes the kingdom of Spain itſelf, with the vaſt continent it ſtands upon, to be no more than one ſtate; and ſo impoſes upon us for the hiſtory of the place, things that were never done, ſaid, or heard of there. And whence comes this ignorance of the truth now, but from taking our aim at it out of diſtance? Or whence comes the other miſtake of the truth, but from an affectation of overdoing the truth itſelf?

And where's the wonder now for people that live ſtrangers to the world, and in a manner out of it, and under ſuch a reſerve as we do, not to furniſh matter for hiſtory?

Joſephus turns the Greeks reaſoning upon themſelves.

But what if I ſhould turn the Greeks way of reaſoning upon themſelves now, and conclude againſt the antiquity of their race, becauſe our books ſay nothing of it? would not ſuch an inference be exploded as ridiculous?

and

and would not the Greeks appeal to the writers of adjacent and neighbouring countries to vouch for them? Now if this be allow'd fair on the one ſide, why may it not with equal reaſon be ſo on the other? the Egyptians and the Phenicians, are the chief witneſſes that I ſhall make uſe of in this caſe; and there will be no ground neither of exception to the evidence: for the Egyptians are notoriouſly known to be our profeſſed enemies, and ſo are the Phenicians, particularly thoſe of Tyre. But the Chaldeans have a better opinion of us; as having been in time paſt, under their command; and likewiſe for blood, as well as for country-ſake, they make honourable mention of us in their chronicles.

Joſephus appeals to the Greek hiſtorians themſelves.

WHEN I ſhall have cleared my countrymen from this calumny of the Greeks, and diſcharg'd all the abominable ſlanders they have caſt upon us, it will be then time to ſee what the Greek hiſtorians ſay of us themſelves, without leaving room for any farther cavil. To begin now with the Egyptians, (who are not looked upon to be any great friends of ours) there is one Manetho, an Egyptian by birth, and well skill'd in the Greek, as appears by a Greek hiſtory he extracted out of the holy ſcriptures about the Jewiſh religion. This Manetho falls foul upon Herodotus, in many places, for belying the Egyptians thro' the ignorance of their ways and cuſtoms; and in the ſecond book of his hiſtory, he delivers himſelf as follows. I make uſe of his very words, as if his perſon were here preſent to make good his teſtimony.

The teſtimony of Manetho, an Egyptian writer.

" WE had a king whoſe name was Timeus;
" and in his reign we fell, beyond all im-
" agination, under God's heavy diſpleaſure.
" There came pouring in upon us a rugged " robuſt people out of the eaſt, that made an
" inroad into the province; and there en-
" camping, took it by force, and carry'd all
" before them without ſo much as a ſtroke,
" putting our princes in chains, cruelly laying
" our cities in aſhes, demoliſhing our temples,
" and miſerably oppreſſing our inhabitants;
" ſome cut to pieces, and others, with their " wives and children, ſent away into bondage.
" After all this, they ſet up a king from a" mong themſelves, whoſe name was Salatis.

Salatis breaks in upon, and over-rules the Egyptians.

" THIS new king advanc'd to Memphis,
" and having ſubjected both the upper and the " lower provinces, and put gariſons into all
" tenable places, he fortify'd to the eaſtward
" in a more eſpecial manner, for fear of an " invaſion from the Aſſyrians, whom he " look'd upon as the ſtronger of the two. He " found in the country of Saites, a city for" merly call'd Abaris, which was ſituated
" very conveniently for his purpoſe, to the " eaſt of the river Bubaſtis. This city he " improv'd and repair'd, and fortify'd it with " ſtrong works and walls, aud a body of two " hundred and forty thouſand men to cover it.
" He made choice of harveſt-time for the ex" ecution of his deſign, with a regard both to
" the plenty of the ſeaſon for proviſions, and
" to the means alſo of paying his ſoldiers, and
" to the ſecuring of himſelf likewiſe againſt
" all aſſaults, or invaſions, by his excellent
" diſcipline and conduct.

" SALATIS dy'd, having reigned nineteen " years, and was ſucceeded by one Benion, who " govern'd forty four years. After him came
" Apachnas, and reigned ſix and thirty years,
" and ſeven months. Apophis came next, and
" ruled ſixty years and one month; Janias,
" fifty years and one month; and laſt of all
" came Aſſis, who rul'd forty nine years and
" two months. Theſe ſix were the firſt kings,
" and perpetually in war to exterminate the " Egyptians, root and branch. The people
" were called HYCSOS; that is to ſay,
" king-ſhepherds; for HYC, in the holy
" tongue, is as much as king, and SOS, ac" cording to the vulgar, is a ſhepherd: So
" that HYCSOS is taken as a compound.
" Some will have it that theſe people were " Arabians. According to ſome other copies,
" HYC does not ſignify king-ſhepherd, but " ſhepherd-captive; for HYC and HAC, with " an aſpiration, ſounds in Egyptian, as much
" as captive; and it ſeems to me the more
" reaſonable interpretation of the two, as it
" ſuits better with the ancient hiſtory.

The ſucceſſors of Salatis.

A people called HYCSOS, or king-ſhepherds.

" WE have it upon the credit of the ſame
" author, that when theſe —— (call them
" what you will) kings, or ſhepherds, and
" their train, had kept the government of E" gypt in their own hands for the ſpace of five " hundred and eleven years, the king of " Thebes, and the remainder of Egypt, that " was not as yet ſubjected, made a violent
" and an obſtinate war upon the ſhepherds,
" and routed them, under the command of king
" * Aliſfragmuthoſis: And when the great-
" eſt part of them were driven out of Egypt,
" the reſt withdrew into a place called Abaris,
" of ten thouſand acres in content; and this
" the ſhepherds, (according to Manetho) en-
" cloſed with a ſtrong ſubſtantial wall, that
" ſecur'd them all neceſſaries within them-
" ſelves. He ſays further, that Thumoſis the " ſon of Aliſfragmuthoſis, laid ſiege to it
" with four hundred and eighty thouſand men:
" But when he found that the place was not
" to be carry'd by aſſault, they came to con" ditions, upon articles to depart Egypt, and
" a ſafe convoy to go whither they would.
" Upon theſe terms they march'd out with " their goods and families, to the number of
" two hundred and forty thouſand ſouls, by
" the way of the wilderneſs into Syria; and
" for fear of the Aſſyrians, who were then maſ-
" ters of Aſia, they retir'd into a country that " is now known by the name of Judea; where
" they erected a city large enough to receive
" this vaſt multitude, and call'd it Jeruſalem."

The ſhepherds routed and driven out of Egypt into Judea.

The building of Jeruſalem.

THE ſame Manetho tells us in another book of his Egyptian hiſtory, " That he finds theſe
" people, in books of great authority, diſtin-
" guiſh'd by the name of captive-ſhepherds;
" our anceſtors having been brought up to gra-
" zing, and from that paſtoral employment,
" taking the name of ſhepherds. They reckon
" that they had ſome ground for calling them
" captives too; for it was by that name that
" our father Joſeph made himſelf known to " the king of Egypt, when he obtain'd per" miſſion to ſend for his brethren. But of
" this more particularly elſewhere." So that it will be ſufficient at preſent to conſult the teſtimonies of the Egyptians, upon this ſubject, and to hear Manetho over again in his own words, about the time when this happened.

"KING *Thumoſis reign'd five and twenty "years and four months, from the departure "of the ſhepherds out of Egypt, to the build- "ing of Jeruſalem. His ſon Chebron took "the kingdom after him, and govern'd thir- "teen years; and after him, Amenophis, "twenty years and ſeven months; his ſiſter "Ameſſes, one and twenty years and nine "months; her ſon Mephres, twelve years and "nine months; his ſon Mephramuthoſis, five "and twenty years and ten months; his ſon "Thumoſis nine years and eight months; his "ſon Amenophis, thirty years and ten months; "his ſon Orus, thirty ſix and five months; "his daughter Acencheres, twelve and one "month; Rathotis her brother, nine years; "his ſon Acencheres, twelve and five months; "another Acencheres his ſon, twelve years "and three months; his ſon Armais, four and "one month; his ſon Armeſis, one year and "four months; his ſon Rameſſes Miamun, "ſixty ſix and two months; Amenophis, nine- "teen and ſix months. Sethoſis, having rais'd "a great force both at ſea and land, conſti- "tuted his brother Armais lieutenant-general "of Egypt, and veſted him with all ſovereign "powers and privileges, the wearing of the "crown excepted; and with a caution not to "oppreſs the queen or her family, nor to inter- "meddle with the king's concubines.

Sethoſis makes his brother Armais lieute- nant-general; and over-runs the country.

"SETHOSIS, upon this, march'd up to Cy- "prus and Phenicia, and ſo forward to the "Medes and Aſſyrians, conquering ſtill as "he went; ſome by the ſword, others by "the very terror and reputation of his arms. "He was ſo elevated by his ſucceſſes, that he "ſtopt at nothing; but laying all waſte to "the eaſtward, he carry'd the whole country "before him. While this was doing, his "brother Armais, without any difficulty or "ſcruple, broke faith with his brother in E- "gypt, and did juſt the contrary to what he "ſhould have done. He expell'd the queen, "abus'd the king's concubines, and, at the in- "ſtance and advice of his falſe friends, aſ- "ſum'd the crown, and took up arms againſt "his brother. The Egyptian high-prieſt gave "Sethoſis notice of all theſe indignities from "time to time: Upon which advice, the king "came immediately back again by the way "of Peluſium, and made good his govern- "ment. From this prince the country took "the name of Egypt; for Sethoſis was alſo "call'd Egyptus, and his brother Armais "nam'd likewiſe Danaus."

Armais breaks his brother.

Thus far goes Manetho. And from hence it plainly appears, upon a clear computation, that our predeceſſors, otherwiſe known by the name of ſhepherds, left Egypt three hundred ninety three years before ever Danaus went to Argos; tho' the Greeks value themſelves mightily upon the antiquity of that prince. Wherefore Manetho advances two great points for us, out of the Egyptian writings; one, that our forefathers came over to the Egyptians from ſome other place; the other, that they were gone again almoſt a thouſand years before the ſiege of Troy. As for ſome other reports of Manetho, that he has ſuperadded; not out of the Egyptian memorials, but by his own confeſſion, from ſtories without authors; I ſhall take my time to ſhew that thoſe fancies are nothing more than fables and fictions without any ground. But we ſhall ſee now what account the Phenicians have given the world of this matter. There are among the Tyrians, publick records of great antiquity; and they are ſo carefully preſerv'd too, that nothing eſcapes the regiſtry that is worth the remembring. They make mention, among ſeveral other conſiderable paſſages concerning ourſelves, of king Solomon's erecting a temple at Jeruſalem, an hundred forty three years and eight months before their predeceſſors built Carthage; deſcribing alſo the very model of the temple.

Manetho clears two great points.

Tyrian records of great antiquity.

Solomon's temple built long before Carthage.

HIRAM, the king of Tyre, had ſo great a friendſhip and eſteem for David, that he lov'd his ſon Solomon the better, even for the father's ſake; and as an inſtance of the value he had for him, made him a preſent of an hundred and † twenty talents of gold, toward the ornament of the fabrick, and furniſh'd him with the choiceſt wood from mount Libanus, for the roof and wainſcot. Neither was Solomon wanting on the other hand, in a magnificent return: As, among other acknowledgments, he made him a preſent of Zabulon and Naphthali. But the love of wiſdom was the chief inducement to that tenderneſs of friendſhip betwixt them. They exchang'd problems one with another, to be reſolved; in the ſolution of which, Solomon approv'd himſelf the better skill'd, and had the preference. There are extant among the Tyrians to this day, divers copies of the letters that paſs'd betwixt them; and for confirmation of what I ſay, I ſhall appeal to Dius an hiſtorian, among the Phenicians, of an unqueſtionable credit, and in his own words.

The king of Tyre, and Solomon dear friends.

The teſtimony of ſeveral famous hiſtorians, as Dius, a Tyrian, for one.

"HIRAM the ſon of Abibal, ſucceeded his "father in the government. He repair'd and "improv'd divers cities in the eaſtern parts of "his dominion; enlarged Tyre, and, by the "help of a dam, join'd it to the temple of the "Olympian Jupiter, ſtanding in an Iſland, and "beautify'd it with many donatives. After "this, he went up to mount Libanus, to cut "down wood for temples.

Hiram, the ſon of Abibal, ſucceeded his father.

"WE have a report that Solomon the king "of Jeruſalem, and Hiram, interchang'd cer- "tain riddles to be unfolded, upon condition, "that he that fail'd of the ſolution, ſhould in- "cur a forfeiture; and that Hiram, finding "the queſtion too hard for him, paid the pe- "nalty. But one Abdemonus, a Tyrian, af- "ter this, reſolved the ſaid queſtion, and "propos'd new ones for Solomon to interpret, "upon the penalty of paying ſo much to Hi- "ram." This is the ſubſtance of what Dius ſays upon this ſubject.

I SHALL come now to Menander, the Epheſian; an author that has made a collection out of hiſtorical memorials, of the lives and actions of princes both Greek and Barbarians. Which, for the better authority of the work, he hath extracted from the records of the ſe-veral

veral places of which he treats; and having paſs'd through the ſucceſſion of the Tirian kings as far as Hiram, thus he goes on.

" UPON the death of Abibal, his ſon Hi-
" ram came to the crown, and liv'd to enjoy
" it thirty four years. This prince threw up
" a huge mount that join'd Eurychorus to the " city of Tyre, and dedicated a golden pillar
" to Jupiter, which was there depoſited in his " temple. He went after this, into a foreſt,
" to a mountain call'd Libanus, where he cut
" down all the cedar for roofs for temples;
" demoliſhing the old buildings, and raiſing
" others. One he dedicated to Hercules, ano" ther to Aſtartus; theformer in the month Pe-
" ritius, and the other when he march'd againſt
" the Tityans, for not paying their taxes: but " upon the reducing of them, he preſently
" return'd.

" HIRAM had at this time a young man, a
" ſervant in his houſe, whoſe office it was to
" expound Solomon's riddles, and his name
" was Abdemonus. From this king's time
" now to the building of Carthage, the com-
" putation lies thus.

The pedigree of Hiram.

" BALLEAZAR the ſon of Hiram, ſucceeded
" his father, and dy'd in the forty third year
" of his age, and the ſeventh of his reign.
" The next was Abdaſtartus, the ſon of Bele-
" azar; who dy'd in the twentieth of his life,
" and the ninth of his reign; this prince was
" murder'd by his nurſe's four ſons, and the " eldeſt of them govern'd twelve years in his " place: and after him, came Aſtartes the " ſon of * Deleaſtartus, who liv'd ſixty ſix
" years, and reign'd twelve. After him came " his brother † Aſerymus, who liv'd fifty
" four years, and reign'd nine, and was mur-
" der'd by his brother Phelles; who took the " government upon him in the fiftieth year of " his age, and after a reign of eight months,
" was ſlain by one ‡ Ithobalus a prieſt of the " goddeſs * Aſtarte; who liv'd to the age of " ſixty eight years, and rul'd thirty two. His
" ſon Badezor ſucceeded him, who liv'd for" ty five years, and reign'd ſix: and then
" his ſon † Margenus liv'd two and thirty " years and reign'd nine. The next was Pyg-
" malion, who liv'd fifty ſix years, and go-
" vern'd forty. It was in the ſeventh year of " his reign, that his ſiſter Dido built Car" thage in Africa. So that from the time of " Hiram to the erecting of Carthage, we ac" count a hundred fifty five years and eight " months. Now taking for granted that the " temple of Jeruſalem was built in the twelfth
" of king Hiram, it makes a hundred forty
" three years and eight months, from the raiſ-
" ing of the temple to the building of Car-
" thage."

CAN any thing be clearer now, or more pertinent to our purpoſe than this teſtimony of the Phenicians? for our anceſtors were undoubtedly come into Judea before they built a temple in it; and that temple was not built neither, till they had made themſelves maſters of the country by the ſword; as I have made appear abundantly out of holy writ in my hiſtory of the Jews.

WE ſhall ſee now how far the Chaldeans agree with the reſt, in the juſtification of our hiſtory; and begin with Beroſus, a Chaldean by extraction, and an author of eminent credit with all lovers of letters, for the learned pieces of aſtronomy, and the Chaldean philoſophy, which he wrote in the Greek tongue.

The Chaldean writers agree with the reſt.

THIS Beroſus, after the manner of the moſt ancient hiſtorians treats of the deluge, and the deſtruction of mankind, juſt as Moſes reports it: and of the ark alſo; and how the firſt father of our race was preſerv'd in it riding upon the mountains of Armenia. He runs thro' the genealogy likewiſe of the ſons of Noah; their names and their ages, and ſo carries on the train, from Noah himſelf to Nabulaſſar, the king of the Babylonians and Chaldeans, with an account of this king's exploits. He tells how he ſent his ſon Nabuchodonoſor with a mighty army into Egypt and Judea; where finding the people in rebellion, he broke in upon them; and when he had conquer'd them, and ſet fire to their temple at Jeruſalem, he return'd, carrying away our whole nation in captivity to Babylon. After this confuſion, the city lay deſolate for ſeventy years, till the days of Cyrus king of Perſia. He ſays likewiſe, that the Babylonians were in poſſeſſion of Egypt, Syria, Phenicia and Arabia; and the king much a greater prince than any of his predeceſſors. But we muſt not forget Beroſus in his own words: As for example.

Beroſus the hiſtorian treats of the deluge, &c.

" NABULASSAR the father, ſays he, under-
" ſtanding that his deputy in Egypt, Cele-
" Syria, and Phenicia, was up in arms, being
" old himſelf, and paſt the fatigues of war,
" he ſent his ſon Nabuchodonoſor (in the vi-
" gour of his youth) at the head of a ſtrong
" army to bring him to reaſon. This prince
" encounter'd the rebel, defeated him, and
" recover'd all the provinces that were en" gaged in the revolt.

Beroſus's account of Nabulaſſar and Nabuchodonoſor.

" IT happened at the ſame time that Na-
" bulaſſar fell ſick at Babylon and dy'd, after

" not long before the ſon had notice of his

" confidents, to ſee them brought up to Baby-
" lon, together with the army and baggage,
" he himſelf, and a ſmall retinue along with " him, took his journey for Babylon by the " way of the deſart. Upon his arrival, he

" ing themſelves for his intereſt, and for the

The deſcription of it " would be too tedious; but it muſt not be " omitted however, that this curious and ad- " mirable piece was the work of only fifteen " days.

" THERE were in it alſo ſeveral artificial " rocks, that had the reſemblance of moun- " tains; with nurſeries of all ſorts of plants, " and a kind of hanging garden, ſuſpended in " the air by a moſt admirable curioſity of con- " trivance. This was to gratify his wife; " who being brought up in Media, among " the hills, and in the freſh air, found a re- " lief in ſuch a proſpect."

THIS is what Beroſus ſpeaks of this king; and there are ſeveral other things worth taking notice of in his Chaldean antiquities, where he blames the Greeks for making Semiramis, the queen of Aſſyria, to be the foundreſs of Babylon. Now Beroſus is the more credible in what he ſays, for coming up ſo near to the Phenician records about the king of Babylon, and his ſubjecting all Syria and Phenicia to his command. Philoſtratus ſays effectually the ſame thing in his ſiege of Tyre; and Megaſthenes, in the fourth book of his Indian hiſtory; where he makes this king of Babylon to have been a greater and a braver hero than Hercules himſelf; adding withal, over and above, that he ſubjected the greateſt part of Libya and Iberia to his dominion.

Beroſus concerning the temple of Jeruſalem.

As to what concerns the temple of Jeruſalem, we have the authority of Beroſus for it, that it was laid in aſhes by the Babylonians; and that Cyrus, who had at that time the abſolute command of Aſia, began afterwards to rebuild it; as the ſame Beroſus has it, in his third book, and in theſe words.

An hiſtory of Nabuchodonoſor

" WHEN Nabuchodonoſor was juſt enter'd " upon the third wall, in the forty third year " of his reign, he fell ſick and dy'd. ‡ Evel- " Marodoch his ſon ſucceeded him; but hav- " ing made himſelf odious to the higheſt de- " gree by his exorbitant luſts and oppreſſions, " he was cut off by the treacherous practice " of Niriglisſoroor his ſiſter's husband, in the " ſecond year of his reign. After his death, " the traitor advanc'd himſelf to the crown, " and kept it four years. His ſon Laboro- " ſardochus came very young to the govern- " ment, and continu'd in it only nine months; " being then deſtroy'd by the treachery, even " of his very friends, who look'd upon him as " a youth of vicious and very dangerous in- " clinations, and ſo took him out of the way. " He was no ſooner diſpatch'd, but the con- " ſpirators met; and ſo laying their heads " together, choſe one Nabonidus for their " king, being both a Babylonian, and of the " ſame family. The walls about the river of " Babylon, were finiſh'd by this prince.

" IN the ſeventeenth year of this king's " reign, Cyrus, with a mighty army out of " Perſia, over-ran all Aſia, and ſo marching " directly towards Babylon, Nabonidus fair- " ly met him in the field; fought him, and " loſt the battle: only himſelf, and ſome few " of his people got into the town of Borſippe. " Cyrus was now before Babylon; making " no doubt, but upon forcing the firſt wall, " he might carry the place. But upon ſecond " thoughts, finding his deſign impracticable, " he quitted the ſiege, and went back to Bor- " ſippe, with a full reſolution to attack the " place. But Nabonidus choſe rather to caſt " himſelf upon Cyrus's mercy, than to ſtand " the ſhock, and ſo upon his ſubmiſſion, Cy- " rus baniſh'd him out of Babylon, and put " him in the quiet poſſeſſion of an eſtate in " Caramania; where he ended his days in the " condition of a private man.

Cyrus over-runs all Aſia.

THESE words of Beroſus agree exactly with our books: That is to ſay, that Nabuchodonoſor deſtroy'd our temple in the eighteenth year of his reign; and in that condition it lay deſolate for ſeven years. In the ſecond year of king Cyrus, the foundations of it were laid anew; and in the ſecond of Darius, the whole was rebuilt. We ſhall now ſubjoin to the foregoing authorities, ſomewhat out of the Phenician hiſtories; for proofs can never be too many, provided they agree in chronology; and the computation ſtands thus.

Beroſus agrees with our books.

And ſo do the Phenicians.

NABUCHODONOSOR laid a ſiege of thirteen years to Tyre, in the reign of king Ithobal. Baal came after him, and reigned ten years: and then they erected judges in the place of kings; as there was Ecnibalus the ſon of Baſ- lech, who govern'd two months; Chelbis the ſon of Abdeus, ten months; the high-prieſt Abbar, three months; † Mytgonus and || Geraſtus Batus the ſons of Abdelimus, ſix years; and Balatorus among the reſt, one year; upon whoſe death they ſent for Merbalus from Babylon, who reigned four years; and upon his death they took his brother Iram, who govern'd twenty years, in whoſe time it was that Cyrus made himſelf maſter of the Perſian empire. Now all this put together, amounts to fifty four years and three months. It was in the ſeventh year of Nabuchodonoſor's reign, that he began the ſiege; and in the fourteenth of king Iram, that Cyrus had the empire: ſo that what the Chaldeans and the Tyrians deliver concerning our temple, does but farther verify our own writings upon that ſubject. Here is enough ſaid already to put the queſtion of our antiquity paſt any farther diſpute, unleſs men will be wilfully blind.

BUT having to do with a people that will have all the world to be Barbarians but themſelves, and allow nothing for authentick, but upon the credit of their own authority; we have no other way than to make uſe of our very adverſaries, for witneſſes on our behalf againſt themſelves, and to appeal to Greek authors in our own juſtification.

The Jews appeal to their very enemies.

THERE was one Pythagoras, a Samian, an eminent philoſopher, and the moſt celebrated man of his time for piety and wiſdom. This Pythagoras was not only well ſeen in our laws, but in many caſes a ſtrict obſerver of Pythagoras.

* Bitumen was a thick fat ſort of clay or ſlime, like pitch, found near Babylon, made uſe of in building, inſtead of mortar, its cement being of incredible ſtrength and duration. ‡ Scr. Evil-Merodach. † Al. Myttonus. || Al. Geraſtus.

them,

them, as moſt manifeſtly appears: Not from any thing that he ever wrote, but from what others knew, and reported concerning him.

Hermippus. As Hermippus, for one; a very exact and careful hiſtorian. He tells a ſtory in the firſt book of his * Pythagoras, of one Calliphon of Croton, a particular confident of Pythagoras.

Calliphon. This Calliphon dy'd, he ſays, and his ſoul would never let Pythagoras reſt, night nor day, for precepts and inſtructions. It gave him in charge not to paſs forward at any time where his aſs had ſtumbled, to abſtain from drinking muddy water, and to ſpeak ill of no man. And then he goes on, that this was in imitation of the Jews and the Thracians, with an application to himſelf. And it was truly ſaid; for this man incorporated divers cuſtoms of the Jews into his philoſophy.

OUR people were likewiſe ſo well known in places of note, in times long ſince paſt, that ſeveral cities do, to this day, retain our rites and faſhions; and others reckon them worth

Theophraſtus. the imitation, as appears by Theophraſtus in his book of laws, where he ſpeaks of the Tyrian laws againſt ſwearing by any ſtrange God, naming the Corban among the prohibited oaths; that is to ſay, in Hebrew, the gift of God: And it is only to be found among the Jews.

Herodotus Halicarnaſſeus. HERODOTUS Halicarnaſſeus was no ſtranger to our nation neither; for he makes ſome mention of us in his ſecond book: Where ſpeaking of the people of Colchos, he has this paſſage. "As to the matter of circumciſion, I find only the Colchians, the Egyptians, and the Ethiopians to have us'd it of old: But the "Phenicians, and the Syrians in Paleſtine, own "the uſe of it from the Egyptians. The Syrians, who border upon the rivers Thermodon and Parthenius, and their neighbours "the Macronians, are reputed to have taken "it up of late from the Colchians. There are "no others that are circumcis'd: And they "proceed after the manner of the Egyptians. "But for the Egyptians and Ethiopians, I cannot ſay which had it of the other." Now this author is poſitive that the Syrians of Paleſtine are circumcis'd; whereas there are no people circumcis'd in Paleſtine but the Jews. Now ſpeaking this upon knowledge, it muſt neceſſarily be intended of the other.

erilus. AND then there's † Cherilus, an ancient poet, in an account he gives of the ſeveral nations that fought under Xerxes, the king of Perſia, againſt the Greeks, he makes mention of our people after all the reſt, in words to this effect:

Theſe people, with an admirable grace,
Brought up the rear; their language Tyrian was;
Themſelves unknown, the mountains their abode,
By Solymus, that near a vaſt lake ſtood.
Their hair cut round, and their heads cover'd o'er
With head-pieces of tann'd horſe-hides they wore.

FROM hence it is evident, that ſpeaking of the mountains of Solyma or Jeruſalem, and of a huge lake at hand there, it can be underſtood of no other than the Jews who inhabit among thoſe mountains, and of the lake Aſphaltites, which is by much the largeſt in all Syria. And ſo much for Cherilus. Neither were the Jews barely known to the Greeks, or only to the common ſort of them, but likewiſe to their wiſe men and philoſophers of the firſt rank; and that with marks too of a ſingular friendſhip and eſteem.

Clearchus, a diſciple of Ariſtotle. CLEARCHUS, a diſciple of Ariſtotle, a peripatetick, and one of the greateſt men of the ſect, perſonates his maſter in the way of a dialogue with Hyperochides, in his firſt book of ſleep, upon the ſubject of a Jew of his acquaintance.

"IT would be tedious, (ſays he) to run "through the whole hiſtory of the people of "the Jews; and therefore I ſhall only give "you a taſte of this particular perſon's admirable wiſdom. Hyperochides made anſwer, "That it would be the greateſt favour he could "do them. Why then, (ſays Ariſtotle) I ſhall "begin, according to the rules of art and method, with what concerns his original or "profeſſion. He was a Jew of the lower Syria, of the race of a ſort of philoſophers "that the Indians call Calani, and the Syrians call them Jews, from their country of "Judea, where they live. Their capital city "has a hard name, and they call it Jeruſalem. He was a perſon of great hoſpitality "to travellers and ſtrangers; and no leſs conſiderable for his diſcourſes and good manners. It was my fortune to be in Aſia, with "ſome diſciples of mine; and this heavenly "man gave us ſeveral viſits there, to the high "ſatisfaction and improvement of thoſe that "underſtood the bleſſing of ſuch a converſation." This is the teſtimony of Clearchus, in favour of the Jews, though but by way of digreſſion.

THIS is the character, according to Clearchus, that Ariſtotle gave this Jew; over and above his wonderful temperance and moderation, in the government of his appetites and paſſions. They that have a mind to know more of him may read it in the original, without running out into ſuperfluities.

Hecateus the Abderite. HECATEUS the Abderite, a great man both for learning and buſineſs, being trained up with Alexander the Great, and living with Ptolemy king of Egypt, the ſon of Lagus, wrote an entire tract expreſly upon the ſubject of the Jews; from whence I ſhall briefly extract ſome paſſages that I find for my purpoſe, and begin with the timing of them.

HE gives an account of a battle fought betwixt Ptolemy and Demetrius, near Gaza, eleven years after the death of Alexander, and in the hundred and ſeventeenth Olympiad, according to Caſtor. "It was in this Olympi"ad, (ſaid he) that Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus "defeated Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus, "otherwiſe called Poliorcetes, in a battle not "far from Gaza." Now it is agreed on all hands, that Alexander dy'd in the hundred and fourteenth Olympiad, and it follows conſequently, that the Jews were a flouriſhing people in the days of that great prince.

HECATEUS ſays farther, that after the battle of Gaza, "Ptolemy made himſelf maſter

" of Syria, and the adjacent places; and that " people were ſo charm'd with Ptolomy's hu- " manity and good-nature, that a great many " follow'd him into Egypt, for the affability " of his converſation. There was among the " reſt, one Hezekias, a high-prieſt of the " Jews, and a perſon of the firſt quality among " his country-men: ſixty ſix years of age, a wiſe " man, and a powerful ſpeaker; and one that " underſtood the affairs of the world, as well " as any man living. The ſame author ſays " likewiſe, that the number of Jewiſh prieſts " who received tenths, and liv'd all in com- " mon, were near fifteen hundred, or thereа- " bout.

Hecateus's character of Hezekias, to the honour of the Jews.

AND afterwards, ſpeaking again of the ſame Hezekias; " We had ſeveral meetings " and conferences, (ſays he) with this great " man and others about him; concerning our " different cuſtoms, practices and opinions: " Inſomuch that he carry'd us to his habita- " tion, and inſtructed us in the manner of his " people's government and diſcipline, which " he ſhewed us in writing."

HECATEUS proceeds next to the zeal and veneration we have for our laws; even to the degree of chuſing death, torments and all extremities; nay, and ſuffering cheerfully too, rather than be guilty of the leaſt violation of them. And then he goes on upon the ſubject of our patience, under ill uſage and reproach. " What indignities have theſe people endur'd " (ſays he) from their neighbours? How have " they been perſecuted by the Perſian kings and " their officers, and yet ſtood firm to the laſt " extremity againſt all trials? As for inſtance: " The temple of Bel was fallen down at Ba- " bylon, and Alexander, being at that time " upon the place, had a mind to repair it, and " accordingly order'd all the ſoldiers to aſſiſt, " in carrying timber and materials towards the " advancing of the work. The Jews were " the only people that refus'd, and were ſe- " verely puniſh'd for their diſobedience: But " when the king ſaw nothing would work up- " on them, out of a generous tenderneſs for " ſo brave a conſtancy, he gave them an ex- " emption. Upon their return (ſays the au- " thor) into their own country, they demo- " liſh'd all the temples and the altars that they " found erected to ſtrange gods: For which " ſome of them were fin'd and puniſh'd, and " others pardon'd." This hiſtorian enlarges then upon the wonderful ſteddineſs of our reſolutions, the vaſt multitudes of our people, the prodigious numbers that were carry'd away captives by the Perſians into Babylon, and others again, after the death of Alexander, tranſported into Egypt and Phenicia, upon occaſion of a ſedition in Syria. He ſpeaks likewiſe of the extent, the beauty and the fruitfulneſs of our country, (that is to ſay, of Judea) which he computes at near three millions of acres, and a moſt excellent and fruitful ſoil. And as to the city of Jeruſalem, the ſpaciouſneſs of it, the numbers of its inhabitants, and the model of the temple, he ſpeaks to this effect:

" THE Jews have in their poſſeſſion a great " many towns, villages and ſtrong holds; but " one city above all the reſt for largeneſs and " ſtrength. It is accounted * fifty furlongs in " compaſs, an hundred and fifty thouſand in- " habitants, and the name of it Jeruſalem. " In the middle of this city ſtands an inclo- " ſure of ſtone, an hundred † cubits about, and " two mighty gates to it. Within this inclo- " ſure, is a quadrangular altar, made of un- " wrought ſtones that never any tool touch'd; " the ſuperficies of it ‡ twenty cubits over, and " the depth ‡‡ ten. Near about it there ſtands " a ſpacious building, with a golden altar and " candleſtick in it, of two talents weight; and " lamps burning continually night and day. " But for images, plants, groves, &c. as in " other temples, there was no ſuch thing to be " found. But there are prieſts that paſs their " time there day and night in great purity, " and they drink no wine at all." The ſame author again tells us an odd ſtory of a Jew, upon an expedition, who ſerv'd under one of Alexander's ſucceſſors, and theſe are his words:

A deſcription of Jeruſalem.

" As I was travelling one time (ſays he) to- " ward the Red Sea, there was one Moſollam " in the company, a Jew, and one of our horſe " guard, who was look'd upon to be very " brave, and a famous markſman with a bow " and arrow. As they were journeying to- " gether, a ſouthſayer, who took upon him to " foretel the fortune of their voyage, bad them " all ſtand, and they did ſo. This Jew ask'd " them what they ſtood for? Look ye, (ſays " the cunning man, and ſhew'd him a bird) if " that bird ſtands, you are to ſtand: If it riſes " and flies on, you are to go forward too; but " if the bird takes its flight the contrary way, " you muſt all go back again. The Jew, with- " out any more words, lets fly an arrow and " kills the bird. The diviner and his com- " panions fell preſently upon the Jew, in moſt " outrageous terms. Why certainly, (ſays the " other) you are all mad, to make ſuch a " buſtle about a fooliſh bird. How ſhould " that poor wretch pretend to tell us our for- " tune, that knew nothing of its own? If this " bird could have foreſeen good or evil to " come, it would have kept itſelf out of the " way of this arrow." But here's enough of Hecateus; and they that deſire more of him, may fetch it out of the book itſelf.

The power of imagination.

ONLY one word now out of Agatharchides; not as any friend of ours, but I take him in charity to be no malicious enemy. " He tells " a ſtory how Stratonice caſt off her husband " Demetrius, and paſs'd out of Macedonia in- " to Syria, with a deſign to marry the king " Seleucus. But Seleucus not anſwering her " expectation, ſhe ſtirr'd up a commotion in " Antioch, while he was with his army in " Babylon. At his return he took Anti- " och, and Stratonice, making away for " Seleucia, was taken, and it coſt her her life." Now her only courſe had been to have taken her paſſage by ſea: But ſhe was diverted from it by a dream. Agatharchides, reflecting upon Stratonice's ſuperſtition, takes an occaſion to treat more at large upon that topick; and so enters upon an invective against the Jews.

The strictness of the Jewish sabbath.

"THE people (says he) they call Jews, are "possess'd of a city by the name of Jerusalem, "a place of an impregnable strength. They "have a custom there of resting the seventh "day, without either bearing of arms or til- "ling the ground, or attending any common "business whatsoever: But they employ it "wholly in their temples, and upon their de- "votions, from the morning to the evening.

"PTOLEMEUS the son of Lagus made his "advantage of this custom, and enter'd the "city with an army upon that day. And "what was the consequence of it? Why when "the Jews should have been defending their "lives and liberties, their heads were altoge- "ther taken up with the superstitious foolery "of not violating their sabbath: And so they "deliver'd themselves up to an insupportable "tyranny, which taught them, by experience, "the unwarrantable foundation of so perni- "cious a law: From hence it is that men fly to "dreams and opinions; never considering that "things necessary are not to be controul'd by "human reason." This is Agatharchides's way of ridiculing our conduct: But whoso- ever passes a sober judgment upon the whole matter, will find the proceeding grounded upon the most glorious foundation of honour and virtue; for what can be more heroical than to postpone life and country to the duty we owe to God's holy laws and religion?

Agatharchides reflects upon it.

THERE are many historians, 'tis true, who liv'd in the same age with us, and yet say nothing of us; not out of ignorance, but envy rather, or some other spiteful passion, as will be made appear. Jerome was a co-temporary with Hecateus, and wrote a book entituled, Of the successors of Alexander. He was the favourite of king Antigonus, and had the government of Syria. Now Hecateus wrote a complete volume of our affairs, and Jerome has not so much as one word of us, though we did in a manner draw the same air together. But men act according to their differing inclinations: Some are for transmitting the memory of the good things that are in us to posterity; and others for suppressing them to the scandal even of truth itself.

The Jews justify'd.

BUT we are not yet without evidence, sufficient to justify our claim to the antiquity we pretend to; which may easily be prov'd from the Egyptian, Chaldean and Phenician histories, besides the Greeks over and above: For, to omit those before mention'd, there's Theophilus, Theodotus, Mnaseas, *Aristophanes, Hermogenes, Euemerus, Conon, Zopyrion, and many others, perhaps more than I am aware of, who have particularly made mention of us. Now the greater part of these authors must undoubtedly be in the dark, as to the history of the first ages of the world, for want of the holy scriptures for their guide: But they all agree, however, in a common acknowledgment of our antiquity; and that's as much as we desire. As for Demetrius Phalereus, the elder Philon, and Eupolemus, they are not much out of the way, and deserve to be born withal, for want of the means of being better inform'd.

THERE is yet one article behind that I have oblig'd myself to clear; that is to say, I am to disprove all the reproaches and scandals that have been cast upon us, and to expose the authors of them upon the credit of their own witnesses; for they have spoken as much against themselves as against us. But the spite and partiality of passionate writers is no new thing to men conversant in history: Some exercise their malignity upon whole nations, cities, manners, &c. some, in short, upon one thing, some upon another; as Theopompus did by the Athenians, Polycrates by the Lacedemonians, and the author of Tripoliticus (not Theopompus, as some imagin) did by the Thebans. Timeus hath been very foul also, both upon these people and others; and it is still their way to derogate from what is most excellent. Some out of malevolence and envy, others to get themselves a name by setting up for the authors of extravagant stories; by which means they pass with fools for wise men, and with wise men for fools. This is their way of defaming the Jews; and, to gratify the Egyptians, they endeavour to blast the truth itself.

The Egyptians partial and prepossess'd.

THE Egyptians being known to be our enemies, there was no better way to gratify those people, than to disguise and falsify the story, both of our forefathers coming into Egypt, and that of their going out again: for they hated and envy'd us for many reasons. First, for growing so powerful and considerable while we were among them; and afterwards so happy when we were from them. The diversity of religions was another cause of dissention; there being the same difference, in proportion, betwixt their religion and ours, that we find betwixt the divine purity and created nature; for they made Gods of their beasts, and worshipped brute animals, one with another indifferently. This was the doctrine they drew in with their mother's milk, and that prepossession, render'd these fooliish people incapable of better things. They had a mortal hatred for the proselytes that came over to us; and they were sunk to such a sottish abjection of mind, that they made no difficulty of contradicting themselves, and giving the lye to their own records. This shall be made good out of the authority of a great man of their own, whom I have already made use of in proof of our antiquity.

Manetho's Egyptian history.

WHEN Manetho was upon his Egyptian history, he pass'd a solemn protestation that he would faithfully extract it out of the holy scriptures; "And so he prefaces his discourse "with a story of our ancestors carrying an ar- "my into Egypt, and subduing the country; "but that, being driven out again soon after, "they settled themselves in a province that is "now call'd Judea, built a city by the name "of Jerusalem, and erected a temple." Thus far he follows antiquity. But when he comes afterward to give himself a loose, and to deliver vulgar rumours and traditions, (as he calls them) the fables he raises of us are altogether incredible; for he makes no more of us than a rabble of Egyptian lepers, and other infected persons promiscuously jumbled together, that were driven out of Egypt for their uncleanness. He fancies them a king too, by the fictitious name of Amenophis; but was so conscious of the imposture, that he durst not venture upon calculating the preciſe time of his reign, as he does in other caſes; for the connexion would betray him. Under this cover he tacks ſeveral idle tales to his hiſtory, wherein he had almoſt forgotten his own reckoning; that is to ſay, that it was now five hundred and eighteen years ſince the ſhepherds went out of Egypt toward Jeruſalem; for it was in the reign of * Thumoſis, that they departed. From Thumoſis to the two brothers, Sethon and Hermeus, the government continued in a ſucceſſion for three hundred ninety three years. "Sethon, he ſays, "was otherwiſe called Egyptus, and Her-"meus was call'd Danaus, whom Sethon ex-"pelled the kingdom, and then kept the go-"vernment fifty nine years. His eldeſt ſon "† Rhampſes ſucceeded him, and reigned "ſixty ſix years." Now after owning the departure of our predeceſſors out of Egypt ſo many years before, he caſts the mock-king Amenophis into the royal liſt, and makes him a prince of divine ſpeculations; like Orus, he ſays, one of his predeceſſors; and adds further, "That he had a mind to ſee the Gods, "wherein one Amenophis the ſon of Papius, "and a prieſt of their way, ſo far gratify'd "him, that he told him his deſire ſhould be "granted, upon condition that the kingdom "might be clear'd of all lepers and other un-"clean perſons. This Amenophis, (ſays Ma-"netho) was a perſon of ſuch a reputation "for a holy man and a prophet, that the king "was overjoy'd at the promiſe, and preſently "gather'd together out of Egypt a multitude "of infirm, foul, and ſickly people, to the "number of fourſcore thouſand, and ſent "them away to the eaſtward of the Nile, to "work in quarries there, with a mixture of "other Egyptians to whom that ſervice was "allotted. There were, (ſays he) leprous "prieſts alſo, and learned men intermingled "with the reſt.

Manetho carries it on; that "This wiſe "heavenly man, in a horror of conſcience for "what he had done, and in the dread of a "judicial vengeance from heaven upon him-"ſelf, for giving that violent counſel, and "upon the king for taking it, finding by a re-"velation that divine juſtice, to balance the "tyrannical oppreſſion of their ſufferings, had "in providence appointed them the govern-"ment of Egypt for thirteen years: The prieſt "durſt not ſpeak one word of this to the king, "but committed the inſpiration to writing, "and ſo laid violent hands upon himſelf. This "gave the king terrible apprehenſions and "anxiety of mind:" And the author goes on as follows, word for word:

"The king being now ply'd with petitions "on the behalf of theſe miſerable people, "and particularly for ſome place of retreat "where they might live ſafe and eaſy, they "pitch'd upon ‡ Avaris, formerly known by "the name of Typhon, and the ſeat of the "ſhepherds. The prince granted them this "boon; and they were no ſooner ſettled in "it, but, finding it a commodious poſt for a "rebellion, they liſted themſelves under Oſar-"ſiph, a prieſt of Heliopolis, and took an "oath of fidelity to him in whatever he ſhould "command them; upon theſe preliminary "conditions, that they ſhould neither wor-"ſhip any of the Egyptian gods, nor abſtain "from any of the meats that they account "holy, nor intermarry but with people of "their own opinion. When they had gone "thus far, in oppoſition to the intereſt and cu-"ſtoms of the Egyptians, the commander pre-"ſently order'd the fortifying and the wall-"ing in of the city, and the levying of war "againſt Amenophis; who taking other prieſts "along with him, ſent an embaſſy to the ſhep-"herds at Jeruſalem, whom king Thumoſis "had forced away out of Egypt; with in-"ſtructions to the deputies to adviſe upon the "common cauſe, and to invite them into a "league againſt Egypt, with a promiſe to join "in the confederacy, and receive them into "Avaris, the ſeat of their anceſtors, where "they were ſure they could want nothing; "but they might fight when they found it "convenient, and with all the caſe in the "world make themſelves maſters of the pro-"vince. They were tranſported with joy at "this propoſal, and immediately drew out "to the number of two hundred thouſand "men, and ſo marched away outright to Avaris.

"Amenophis, upon the news of this in-"vaſion, was at his wit's end what to think "of the prophetical writing the prieſt left "behind him, and ſo immediately called a "great council of his princes and people to-"gether, and ſent away all the beaſts that "paſs'd for ſacred among the Egyptians, with "a ſtrict order to the prieſts to keep all their "idols as cloſe as poſſible. He committed "his ſon Sethon, otherwiſe called Romaſſes, "after his father's name Rhampſes, a child "of five years of age, to the care of a par-"ticular friend; and ſo marched away him-"ſelf, at the head of three hundred thouſand "fighting men to encounter the enemy. But "upon ſecond thoughts, and a check of con-"ſcience, he wheel'd off without fighting, "and went his way to Memphis; where he "and his people took ſhipping, and with Apis, "and the reſt of their Gods, fled into Ethio-"pia. The king of the country, who was in "alliance with him, gave him and his people "ſo generous a reception, that they wanted "for nothing the place afforded, either provi-"ſions, or habitations, for their entertainment "and convenience, to ſerve them the whole "courſe of that fatal thirteen years baniſh-"ment. Thus it far'd with the Egyptians in "Ethiopia; beſide that they had a guard al-"low'd them upon the frontier, for the ſafe-"ty of their king's perſon.

"But in the mean time, the Jeruſalem "auxiliaries made infinitely more ravage in "Egypt, than they that call'd them in: for "there was nothing they ſtuck at that was "either inhuman or wicked; and the very "ſpectacle of their impiety was a calamity "not to be expreſs'd. The razing, burning, "and rifling of towns and villages was no-"thing to them, without ſacrilege, and break-"ing the images of their Gods to pieces over "and above; moſt barbarouſly tearing the "conſecrated creatures, that the Egyptians "ador'd, limb from limb; forcing the prieſts "and prophets to be the executioners of them "themſelves, and then turning them off naked."

THE author ſays yet further, "That the "founder of that polity was one Oſarſiph, a "prieſt of Heliopolis, ſo called from Oſiris, "a God that was worſhipp'd there; and (he "ſays) that this prieſt changing his religion, "chang'd his name too, and called himſelf "Moſes." This is an Egyptian ſtory of the Jews, but contracted for brevity's ſake.

MANETHO ſays yet again, That "Amenophis and his ſon Rhampſes marched afterward out of Ethiopia, with two great armies, encountred the ſhepherds and the lepers, routed, and had the chaſe of them with a very great ſlaughter, to the borders of Syria." This is the account we have from Manetho, which is moſt ridiculouſly trivial and childiſh, as will evidently appear.

Joſephus's reflections upon the abſurdities of the whole.

HE gives it for granted, in the firſt place, that our forefathers were not originally of Egypt, but came thither from abroad, reduced the country, and after that, quitted it. But as to our mingling afterwards with the Egyptian lepers, and Moſes, that led us out of the land of Egypt, being one of them, this is ſo palpable a falſhood, that it will be prov'd out of his own mouth to have been many ages before. Now this is not only a fiction, but the foundation of it as ridiculous, as it is falſe.

KING Amenophis, (he ſays) had a mind to ſee the Gods. What Gods I beſeech you? For the ox, the goat, the crocodile, and the baboon, may be ſeen at any time; and theſe are the gods that they worſhip. But if he means celeſtial Gods, they are altogether inviſible. And what was it that put this conceit in his head now? why, another king, it ſeems, had ſeen them before. And why might not he as well have been told what they were, and how they look'd, without any further trouble? Very good! but the prophet, they ſay, who poſſeſs'd him with this extravagant curioſity, was a good and a wiſe man, and one whom the king did very much confide in: that is to ſay, that he would do a thing impoſſible to be done. But he fail'd of his end however. In one word more; why muſt the gods be ever the more inviſible at laſt, becauſe men are cripples, or lepers? they are offended at us for ill-manners, not for corporal defects. And how ſhall it enter into any man's head to imagine, that ſo many thouſand diſeaſed and impotent perſons ſhould be brought together at ſo ſhort a warning? or how came it that the king did not follow the direction of his prophets; and rather baniſh them according to his order, than condemn them to the mines and the quarries? as if his buſineſs had been rather to get workmen than to purge the province. And then he makes the prophet kill himſelf in the dread of a divine vengeance, and leave the king in a writing the fate of Egypt. But how came the prophet not to foreſee his own deſtruction as well as the reſt? why did he not diſſuade the king from the vanity of his fantaſtical longing? or to what end did he trouble himſelf about a calamity, that was not to take place till he ſhould be dead and gone? or was the miſery he fear'd worſe than death itſelf? but the moſt ſottiſh part of the ſtory is yet behind.

"THE king heard of this, (he ſays) and "mightily troubled he was, to think what "might come of it." And what did he do, I beſeech you? why, inſtead of purging Egypt as he ſhould have done, of the ſick and unclean, he reſtor'd them upon their firſt asking to Avaris, the habitation of their forefathers: and there they made choice of the high-prieſt of Heliopolis for their prince and governour, and to him they ſwore allegiance; in particular, that they would neither worſhip any of their gods, nor forbear eating any of their privileg'd meats, but deſtroy all as much, as in them lay, that the Egyptians eſteemed ſacred, and contract no marriages but with their confederates. Theſe were the meaſures that the multitude bound themſelves by oath to live and die by. In fine, they fortify'd Avaris, he ſays, and took up arms againſt the king; ſending to Jeruſalem for aſſiſtance, with a promiſe of putting it into their hands, (as their ſtation of old) not doubting but from thence, upon a conjunction, they might eaſily make themſelves maſters of all Egypt. He follows the ſtory, that they advanced with two hundred thouſand men; but that Amenophis the Egyptian king, becauſe he would not fight againſt God, took his flight into Ethiopia, and took Apis and all his deiſy'd animals along with him; and that afterwards the Jews, breaking in upon Egypt, laid their towns waſte, and then ſet fire both to their cities and temples, put their nobility to the ſword, and ſo committed all manner of out-rages without diſtinction or mercy. The prieſt, (he ſays) that had the adminiſtration of the government, was a native of Hierapolis; his name was Oſarſiph, ſo called from their God Oſiris, which he afterwards chang'd for that of Moſes. He ſays that Amenophis fell into Egypt, out of Ethiopia, with a mighty power, in the thirteenth year after his expulſion; and in a battle with the ſhepherds and the lepers, gain'd a noble victory, cut off great numbers of them, and had the purſuit of the reſt up to the skirts of Syria.

Notes upon Manetho.

MANETHO was not aware here again how unmaſterly he tacks his ſtories together: For though the lepers and the invalids might think it hard meaſure at firſt to be ſo treated by the king, at the inſtigation of the prophet, yet when they came afterwards to be eas'd of the ſlavery of the mines, and to be allow'd the comfort of a commodious habitation, this fair uſage one would think ſhould have ſweeten'd them again: or, if the averſion they had to the king was implacable, why did they not rather contrive ſome practice upon his perſon, than imbroil the publick, where they were all ſo much concern'd for the ſake of their relations? But the conteſt was with men, not with the Gods; neither would they act contrary to the laws they were brought up in; ſo that now we are to pay our thanks to Manetho, for declaring that the ring-leaders of this uproar were none of thoſe that came out of Jeruſalem, but the very Egyptians themſelves, and the prieſts eſpecially, that had ty'd them up by oath to what they did. What can be more nonſenſical than to ſay, that, when they ſaw none of the lepers friends or allies would join with them in the rebellion, or bear any part in the risk of the war, they were forced to ſend ſome of their ſick people to Jeruſalem for ſuccour? Well! and upon what ſcore of friendſhip or intereſt betwixt them? For they were rather to be look'd upon as enemies, in the contradictions of their lives and manners.

But they came, he says, at the first call, upon the promise, hope, and expectation of being put into the possession of Egypt; as if they who had been beaten out of Egypt had not understood the condition of the place. 'Tis true, if they had been in a necessitous starving condition, it might have been worth their while; but for people at ease, and in a much more fruitful and agreeable country than Egypt, to run such a hazard in favour of their own enemies, and those so scandalously diseased too, that they would never have been suffer'd in a private family; these are extravagances for none but madmen to be guilty of. And who could foresee the king's running away after all this, at the head of three thousand men? for that was the number (says Manetho) that he brought to Pelusium to encounter the rebels. He charges it also upon the Jerusalem army, that they seized the Egyptians corn and provisions, and brought the poor people into great distress by embezzeling their stores. And what could they expect less now from an open and a declar'd enemy? especially when the Egyptians had already done the very same thing, and bound themselves by oath to continue the same course.

WHAT shall we say then to his story of the rout Amenophis gave the enemy, with the slaughter and pursuit of them to the borders of Syria? Does Egypt lie so open on all hands, and would not they who had the management of the war, when they knew Amenophis was upon the march, secure the passes out of Ethiopia, and draw an army together to oppose him, which might so easily have been done? "But he pursued them closely (says Manetho) "over all the dry barren sands, as far as Sy-"ria, and did execution upon them all the "way he went." A likely matter! to pursue an enemy with an army over a desart that is hardly passable, even without any interruption. Here is enough out of Manetho to shew that we neither had our original from the Egyptians, nor any mixture with them. As for the leprous tainted part of them, we may reckon that there died many of them in the quarries, more in the war, and great numbers in this last action and flight. We shall proceed now to confute what Manetho says concerning Moses.

Moses vindicated from the scandals of Manetho.

THE Egyptians themselves are all agreed upon it, that Moses was a man of singular integrity and wisdom; and they stood out at nothing, tho' never so false and infamous, to make an Egyptian of him, (that is to say, their countryman) and one of the priests of Heliopolis, who was expell'd, with several others, for a leper. Now it appears from chronology, that Moses lived five hundred and eighteen years before this conjuncture, and conducted our forefathers out of Egypt into the country where we now inhabit; so that there needs no further proof that he was no leper, than what arises from his own words, i. e. That no lepers should be admitted into any towns or villages, but live apart in a distinct habit by themselves; and that whoever touch'd a leper, or lodg'd under the same roof with him, should be reputed unclean; and whoever should come to be cur'd of that disease, and restor'd to his former state, he should pass some certain purifications, wash himself with fountain water, shave all his hair off, and offer such and such sacrifices, before he should be receiv'd into the holy city. Now if Moses had been afflicted with this distemper himself, he would never have been so severe upon others for it.

AND this strictness of his was not only in the case of lepers, but no man was qualified for the priesthood who had the least maim upon him, or any other corporal defect; as it was deprivation also when it happen'd to be the case of a priest. Can any man think now that if Moses had been a leper, he would have made such laws against himself, and so much to his own shame and loss? As to the change of the name at last, from Osarsiph to Moses, what affinity does there appear betwixt the one and the other? Where's the agreement betwixt them? Moy in Egyptian is water, and Moyses is as much as preserv'd out of the water; and that's the whole mystery. It is now manifest, that so long as Manetho kept himself to the records of antiquity, he was not much wide of the truth; but when he gives himself up to fiction and fable, there is no longer any connection in his story.

Cheremon, another Egyptian hist. torian.

I SHALL now advance to Cheremon, another Egyptian historian, who supposes the same names and persons, of Amenophis and his son Rameses, with Manetho. He says, "That the goddess "Isis appear'd to Amenophis in a vision, and "chid him severely for suffering her temple "to be ruin'd in the war. And (he says) "that Phritiphantes, a holy scribe, suggested "it to the king, that if he would clear Egypt "of all people labouring under foul and ma-"lignant distempers, he should never be trou-"bled again with those nightly apparitions. "Upon this there was a call made of impo-"tent and infirm wretches, and two hundred "and fifty thousand of them banish'd under "the command of Moses and Joseph, two of "the number, and holy men; Moses in Egyp-"tian being call'd Tisithes, and Joseph Pe-"teseph. (He says) that they found at Pelu-"sium three hundred and eighty thousand "men, that Amenophis had left there, refusing "them a passage into Egypt, that they struck "a league, and join'd in an expedition against "the Egyptians; but Amenophis would not "stand it, and so withdrew into Ethiopia, "leaving his wife big behind him. She shift-"ed up and down in caves and holes, till at "length she was deliver'd of a male child, "that she called Messenes; who growing up "to man's estate, drove about two hundred "thousand of the Jews into Syria, and brought "back his father Amenophis out of Ethiopia." Thus far Cheremon.

These writers contradict one another.

THERE needs no more now to overthrow the credit of these writers, than to confront them. There is no reconciling of truth and error, and no dividing of truth against itself. But when men fly to fables and impostures, they write fancy rather than history. Manetho imputes the banishment of the lepers to Amenophis's curiosity to see the Gods; Cheremon to the vision of Isis: The former makes the priest Amenophis the adviser to the purging of the king's dominions of the sick people, the other says it was Phritiphantes: and they agree every jot as well in their numbers as in their stories: One makes them eighty thousand, the other two hundred and fifty thousand. Manetho again sends the lepers first to

to the quarries; and after that, tranſports them to Avaris, where they ſend to Jeruſalem for help, and make that the riſe of the war. Cheremon will have it, on the contrary, that being driven out of Egypt, they made uſe of three hundred and eighty thouſand men at Peluſium, that Amenophis had left there; and with that body of men invaded Egypt, and frighted Amenophis away into Ethiopia. This he tells us, but, (which is wonderful) not one word who theſe men were, whence this vaſt army came, whether Egyptians or foreigners, or why Amenophis would not receive them. And then there's Cheremon's dream of Iſis and the lepers. He ſays again, that Moſes and Joſeph were expell'd together; whereas Joſeph was dead four ages before Moſes's time, computing the whole at about an hundred and ſeventy years: Manetho makes Rameſſes, the ſon of Amenophis, a baniſh'd man with his father, a party in the war with him, and father and ſon fellow exiles in Ethiopia; but Cheremon makes him a poſthumous child, and born in a cave after the death of his father. In time he grows up to be a conqueror, and drives away near two hundred thouſand Jews into Syria. What a ſottiſh credulity is this! Without telling us what theſe three hundred and eighty thouſand were, or how t'other eighty thouſand men periſh'd; whether they fell in battle, or went over to Rameſſes. But which is the greateſt wonder of all, he does not ſo much as tell us who they are that he calls Jews, or to which of the two parties he gives that appellation; whether to the two hundred and fifty thouſand lepers, or to the three hundred and eighty thouſand at Peluſium. But it would be time loſt to confute thoſe who confute themſelves: And there is no conviction ſo ſtrong as that which comes out of their own mouths.

Lyſymachus, a ſhameleſs and a profeſs'd falſifier.

I come now to Lyſimachus, a profeſs'd falſifier, as well as the reſt; but for the faculty of an extravagant invention, ſo much beyond them all, that he out-does them all with the malice of the faction. He ſays "That in the "reign of Bocchoris king of Egypt the Jews "were ſo leprous, ſcabby, and over-run with "foul diſtempers, that they preſs'd into the "temples to beg for charities. There dy'd "great numbers of them of contagious diſeaſes; upon which there follow'd a famine in "Egypt. Bocchoris, in this diſtreſs, ſent to conſult the oracle of Jupiter Ammon about this "dearth, and the anſwer was this, That he "ſhould purify the temples, by ſending away "all unclean and impious perſons out of them "into the deſart, and drowning thoſe that "were ulcerated and leprous) for the ſun itſelf had a horror for ſo abominable a ſight) "and this being done, the earth ſhould bring "forth fruit again. Bocchoris, preſently upon this, calls his prieſts and his diviners about him, and, by their advice, orders the "ſick people to be ſorted together, and deliver'd up to the ſoldiers: Thoſe who were "afflicted with ſores and leproſies, to be "wrap'd up in lead, and caſt into the ſea; "and the others to be cary'd into the wilderneſs, and there expos'd to be ſtarv'd. The "night coming on, theſe poor people began "to think what to do with themſelves: So "they made fires, ſet watches and guards, and "the next night kept a faſt, to reconcile themſelves to the Gods whom they had offended. "On the day following, there was one Moſes, (he ſays) who adviſed them to decamp, "and march on all together till they met with "better accommodation; with a charge to do "no good offices upon the way, nor ſo much "as to give any man good counſel that ſhould "deſire it; and likewiſe to break down and "deſtroy all the temples and altars they found "in the way. Theſe propoſals were no ſooner approv'd, and the reſolution taken, but "the multitude preſently put themſelves upon "the march over the wilderneſs, and after "many hardſhips, came at laſt into a country "that was both dreſs'd and peopled. They "treated the inhabitants cruelly to the higheſt "degree, burnt and pillag'd their temples, "and came, in the end, to a place that they "now call Judea, and built a city there by "the name of Hieroſyla, (according to the "occaſion) being as much as to ſay, the ſpoil "of holy things: But coming afterwards into "power and reputation, they were aſham'd "of their own name, and changed Hieroſyla "into Hieroſolyma, and call'd themſelves "after their city."

We have here a third king, quite different from the two former kings of Manetho and Cheremon, who, without one word of the dream and the Egyptian prophet, went to ask counſel of the oracle about lepers and other unclean perſons. He ſays, "That the Jews "gather'd together in multitudes about the "temples." Does he mean the lepers by the Jews; as if the Jews were only tainted with that diſeaſe? For he ſeems ſo to reſtrain it in calling them the people of the Jews. But why does he not tell us alſo whether he means natives or ſtrangers? If Egyptians, why does he call them Jews? Or if ſtrangers, why does he not tell us whence they came? And then again, if there were ſo many of them drown'd, and the reſt thrown out into deſarts, how came there to be ſo many left; and how came they likewiſe to paſs the wilderneſs, poſſeſs the country, erect a city, and to build the moſt glorious temple in the world?

How comes he now again to give us only the bare name of our law-giver, without any thing of his country, his perſon, or his family? And how came he to make ſuch extravagant laws in his paſſage, to the diſhonour both of Gods and men? Either theſe exiles were Egyptians, or not: If the former, they would hardly caſt off their country's laws on a ſudden; or if they came from elſewhere, they had undoubtedly certain laws and cuſtoms of their own, which they could not eaſily be induced to quit. It is likewiſe to be conſider'd, that if they had join'd in an oath of confederacy againſt thoſe who drove them out, they might have had a plauſible colour for it: But for a company of miſerable friendleſs wretches, as they own themſelves, to engage in a mortal feud and defiance againſt all mankind; what greater folly could there be in the world, ſave only the fiction of ſo ridiculous a ſtory? And yet the conceit of the name, with an alluſion to the city, and afterwards changing it, makes the foolery all of a piece. But how could the name of this city (derived, as he ſays, from the ſpoil of holy things) be look'd upon as honourable, in the opinion of its firſt founders, and and yet become afterwards so great a scandal to their posterity, that they were asham'd to own it, and for that reason changed it? Now this angry gentleman was so intent, I suppose, upon spite and mischief, that he took Hierosolyma for the same thing in Hebrew, that it is in Greek. But what need many words, for the exposing of an imposture that has the confidence to contradict and to disprove itself? Beside that, it is high time to put an end to this book, and pass to the next; wherein I propound to make good my undertaking.

IN ANSWER TO

APION, about the ANTIQUITY of the JEWS.

BOOK II.

HAVING already given ſufficient proof of the antiquity of our nation, upon the credit of ſeveral Phenician, Chaldean, and Egyptian hiſtorians, together with other Greek authors, in my reflections upon Manetho, Cheremon, &c. After this right, I ſay, done to the common cauſe, in the foregoing treatiſe, I ſhall now (my deareſt Epaphroditus) turn my diſcourſe more particularly to my perſonal adverſaries, and to Apion the grammarian, in the firſt place; if at leaſt ſuch a one may be worth taking notice of. As to his relations, they are vulgar and fabulous, after the way of that foul-mouth'd ſort of people; the air of his writings flat and heavy, palpable ignorance over and above, and a vein of calumny running from one end of them to the other; a mixture, in fine, that ſpeaks the compoſitor to be unmannerly, violent, and troubleſome, to the higheſt degree. But yet conſidering that there are more fools in the world than wiſe men, and that fools are better pleaſed with fooleries than with matters of more gravity and weight; and conſidering again, how many there are that had rather hear their neighbours traduc'd, than well ſpoken of; I find myſelf under ſome kind of neceſſity to call this fond falſe man to an account for the groſſneſs of his arrogance, in making himſelf judge of the cauſe: But then I have this encouragement on the other hand, that people are generally well enough content to ſee the miſchief of malicious ſcandals and clamours turn'd upon the heads of the authors.

Apion a dark, a coarſe, and a fabulous writer.

As to his very manner of writing, it is ſo dark and intricate, that there is hardly any gueſſing at his meaning, in the confuſion, contradictions, and inconſiſtence of his ſtories. One while he miſtakes the hiſtory of our forefathers departing out of Egypt, the ſame way that others have done, whom I have already confuted: Another while, he falls foul upon the Alexandrian Jews, and then launches out into outrages againſt the rites and ceremonies of our holy temple and worſhip.

Joſephus's remarks upon Apion's follies and miſtakes.

Now as to the two points, of our forefathers deriving their deſcent originally from Egypt; and of their being driven out again for any foul diſeaſe, or infectious diſtemper, or any other reaſon of that kind; I have ſaid more than needed, to the clearing of thoſe imputations. So that I ſhall only ſum up what Apion hath added over and above, and particularly in the third book of his Egyptian hiſtory. "Moſes, "(he ſays) was by birth, of Heliopolis, as I "have heard from the oldeſt men upon the "place, of my time. The people formerly "had their religious meetings in the open air, "till Moſes, who was well-skill'd in the wor-"ſhip of his country, brought their congre-"gations out of the fields into private houſes "in the city, enjoining the people to addreſs "their prayers ſtill toward the ſun. Now "with a reſpect to the ſituation of the place, "there were, inſtead of obeliſks certain pil" lars advanc'd upon the figures of baſons with " engravings upon them; and the ſhadow fal- " ling upon theſe baſons, (for all was open " above) ſtill as the ſun mov'd, the ſhadow " mov'd along with it.

The whole ſtory ridiculous from one end to the other.

This was the rare conceit of our wonderful grammarian. But I ſhall rather leave the confutation of him to the writings of Moſes, than take it upon myſelf. As for Moſes, he gives no account, either of any ſuch form preſcrib'd, or made uſe of, at the firſt erecting of the tabernacle; or that he ever order'd poſterity to do any thing like it; neither was Solomon (afterward the founder of the Jeruſalem temple) ever aware of any ſuch fantaſtical curioſity, as Apion ſpeaks of.

As to the authorities he cites, of the old men, who told him Moſes was an Heliopolitan, he was too young, it ſeems, to know it himſelf, and therefore conſulted ſome of his cotemporaries, who, he ſays, were well acquainted with him. Was there ever ſo rank or ſo ridiculous a contrivance? Apion could not find out what countryman either Homer, or Pythagoras was; though the latter but of yeſterday in compariſon. How comes he then to be ſo poſitive in the caſe of Moſes, who liv'd ſo many ages before them; and all this upon the credit of what he had heard old men ſay?

And theſe hiſtorians are no leſs divided, about the time of Moſes's leading the lepers, the lame, and the blind out of Egypt. Manetho makes it to be in the reign of Tethmoſis, near three hundred ninety three years before the baniſhing of Danaus to Argos. Lyſimachus will have it in the reign of king Bocchoris; that is to ſay, ſeventeen hundred years before Meſon, and ſeveral others reckon according to their own fancy. But Apion, who ſets up for the oracle of the whole party, fix'd the time preciſely upon the firſt year of the ſeventh Olympiad, the very year, he ſays, of the building of Carthage. He makes mention of Carthage, as a token that would infallibly confirm the truth of his computation. Whereas, at the ſame time, without conſidering what he does, he furniſhes arguments and evidence againſt himſelf; at leaſt if any heed may be given in this caſe to the Phenician records; for we find in that hiſtory, that Hiram liv'd at leaſt an hundred and fifty years before the building of Carthage, as we have proved already out of the Phenician annals; and that he had a particular friendſhip and veneration for Solomon, the founder of the temple at Jeruſalem, and contributed materials in abundance toward the perfecting of that work. But Solomon, in fine, laid the foundation of the temple ſix hundred and twelve years after the Jews went out of Egypt.

As to the number of the exiles, Apion agrees in the ſame falſe account with Lyſimachus, of an hundred and ten thouſand. But then the original he gives of the word ſabbath, is childiſh even to admiration. " When the " Jews, (ſays he) had been ſix days upon the " way, they were ſeized with ulcers, and in- " flamations about the groin; and for this rea- " ſon they reſted the ſeventh day. And being " now ſafely arriv'd in the country, called at " preſent Judea, they gave the day the name " of the ſabbath, from the Egyptian Sabbato- " ſis; which is as much as to ſay, the diſeaſe " of the groin, as aforeſaid". Ought not an author of this complexion to be laugh'd at, for ſuch ridiculous trifling, or exploded for offering to impoſe upon the world, under the face and countenance of hiſtory, ſuch intolerable abſurdities, ſuch monſtrous and inconſiſtent improbabilities? An hundred and ten thouſand men all labouring under the ſame diſtemper! And if they were likewiſe blind, lame, and languiſhing, as Apion elſewhere reports them, how was it poſſible for ſuch an infirm multitude to hold out, but ſo much as one day's journey, in the deſart? And this was not all neither, for they were to cut their way thro' all oppoſition over and above. Is it not an unlikely thing, I ſay, that an hundred and ten thouſand men ſhould all fall ill at the ſame time, of the ſame diſeaſe? This could never be according to the ordinary courſe of nature; and it would be the groſſeſt of blunders to impute it to chance.

And is it not an admirable fancy of Apion's, the bringing of an hundred and ten thouſand ſick and weak men, ſafe and ſound, every ſoul of them, to Judea in ſix days? And then what a ſtory does he tell you of Moſes's advancing up to mount Sinai, between Egypt and Arabia, and lying cloſe there for forty days; at the end of which, coming down, he deliver'd the law to the Jews? I would fain know now, how it is poſſible for ſuch a body of men to march over ſo vaſt a deſart in ſix days; or to ſubſiſt forty days in a place that affords neither bread nor water.

His trifling with the grammatical reaſon of the word ſabbath, is frivolous to the laſt degree of impertinence and folly; for there is a mighty difference betwixt the two words Sabbo and Sabbatum: By the latter, we underſtand the Jews day of reſt; and the other he expounds himſelf, to be only the name of the Egyptian diſeaſe. This may paſs for a ſupplement of certain new fables, that Apion has ſuperadded to the ſtory of Moſes; and ſo for the Jews going out of Egypt, that was never heard of before. But where's the wonder for a man to bely other people, who firſt claſhes with himſelf? He was born at Oaſis in Egypt, but renounces the place of his nativity to be thought an Alexandrian; which ſhews what opinion he hath of the Egyptians; for that's the name he gives to all people, whom he would repreſent for the worſt of men: And this is it that makes him take ſuch pains to diſguiſe his extraction, and ſhuffle off his original. They that glory in the dignity of their country, reckon it a point of honour to make good their title, and to maintain the rights and privileges belonging to it, againſt all violence and intruſion. Now this is the caſe of the Egyptians, with reſpect to us. Either they claim country and kindred of us, on the one hand, where they pretend to value themſelves upon that relation: Or where they take themſelves to lie under a ſcandal, they are willing, on the other ſide, that we ſhould bear our part in the reproach. But Apion manages all his outrageous paſſions againſt us, as if his buſineſs were to gratify the Alexandrians, for allowing him the freedom of their city; well underſtanding the mortal feud there was at that time betwixt them and the Alexandrian Jews; and ſtill, though he pretended to expoſe only one ſort of Jews, the venom of his calumny and malice extended to the whole race.

But

BUT what were the grievous and intolerable indignities all this while, that he charges with ſo much bitterneſs upon the Alexandrian Jews? The Jews, ſays Apion, upon their coming out of Syria, ſettled themſelves along the coaſt, at a place within the waſh of the tide; but no port at hand for a veſſel to ride in. Well! and was not Apion much to blame now to caſt a ſcandal upon ſo famous a city; and a city he ſo much glory'd in (how vainly and falſely ſoever) as the place of his nativity! For that quarter is a dependency upon Alexandria, and univerſally reputed a moſt commodious habitation. If the Jews took it by force, and ſo maintain'd it againſt all oppoſition, ſo much the more to their honour.

The Jews had ſeveral eminent benefactors.

BUT to deliver the plain truth of the matter, it was Alexander the great that put the Jews into poſſeſſion of it, and granted to them the ſame freedoms and immunities with the Macedonians themſelves. But what would Apion have ſaid now, if, inſtead of an eſtabliſhment in this royal city, they had had their reſidence allotted them at Necropolis; and if their tribes were yet call'd Macedonians to this very day? But either Apion hath read the epiſtles of king Alexander, Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, and the ſucceeding kings of Egypt, the inſcriptions that Ceſar cauſed to be engraven upon the pillar at Alexandria, in memory of the privileges by him granted to the Jews: Apion, I ſay, hath either read theſe memorials, or he hath not; if the former, he muſt needs be a very ill man to write things ſo contrary to his knowledge; and if the latter, he has forfeited his credit, for undertaking a ſubject he was ignorant of.

A nonſenſical cavil.

AND his wonder and admiration at the Jews calling themſelves Alexandrians, argues no leſs ignorance; for do we not know that all colonies take their names from the firſt founders? To prove this we ſhall not need to look out for foreign inſtances, having ſo many nearer home. The Jews of Antioch we call Antiochians, our forefathers being made free of that city by king Seleucus; and ſo the Jews of Epheſus, are called Epheſians, and thoſe of Ionia, Ionians: to which right they ſtand entitled by the ſucceſſive privileges of former grants. And this is a grace that the ſtate of Rome hath vouchſafed, not only to particular perſons, but to whole provinces and nations. How came the ancient Iberians, the Tuſcans, and the Sabines to be called Romans elſe? Now if Apion will not allow the benefit of this common liberty to others, why does he claim it to himſelf, in taking upon him the name of an Alexandrian? What pretence hath any man (according to his rule) who was born in the inland part of Egypt, to write himſelf an Alexandrian, and eſpecially an Egyptian; thoſe people being the men of the whole world to whom the maſters of it, the Romans, refuſe this liberty? But our envious hiſtorian, lying under an incapacity of pretending to this advantage himſelf, turns his diſpleaſure againſt thoſe that are in a rightful poſſeſſion of it.

The Jews highly in favour with Alexander.

IN the erecting of this city, Alexander made uſe of the aſſiſtance and ſervice of the Jews; not for want of men, but in the teſtimony and approbation of their faith and integrity, and with a reſolution to do them farther honour and reſpect. Alexander, ſays Hecateus, had ſuch a tenderneſs for the modeſty and loyalty of the Jews, that, beſide other ſignal bounties, he gave them the province of Samaria, over and above, tax-free.

And ſo with Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus.

AFTER Alexander, came Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus; who had every jot as good an opinion of the Alexandrian Jews, as his predeceſſor, and into their hands he committed the truſt of all the forts and ſtrong holds in Egypt. And for his better ſecurity, he planted Cyrene, and other cities of Libya, with theſe people.

Ptolemy Philadelphus.

PTOLEMY Philadelphus ſucceeded Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus; who did not only ſet all the Jewiſh priſoners at liberty that he had in his country, but remitted them ſeveral duties, and other ſums of money; and, which was more than all the reſt, he contracted a paſſionate inclination to be inſtructed in our laws and cuſtoms, and in the holy myſteries of the ſacred ſcriptures; inſomuch that he preſs'd earneſtly for interpreters to be ſent him in order to his better information. Now for the more ſpeedy advance of the work, the care of it was committed to Demetrius Phalereus, Andreus, and Ariſteas (no common men): Demetrius the miracle of his age for learning and virtue, the other two, captains of the guards of his body, to whom was committed the care of the work. It was not to be thought now, that this prince could ever have had ſuch a veneration for the Jewiſh laws and cuſtoms, and for the piety and wiſdom of our forefathers, without a ſuitable reverence and affection for the profeſſors of theſe holy rules and methods. But Apion muſt be very little read in that hiſtory, if he did not know that the Jews were highly in favour with almoſt the whole race of the Macedonian kings.

Ptolemy Euergetes.

THE third Ptolemy (called Euergetes) having made himſelf maſter of Syria by force, paid no ſolemnity of acknowledgments for his victory to the Egyptian Gods, but ſacrific'd, and gave God thanks in the temple at Jeruſalem, after the manner of the Jews.

Ptolemy Philometor.

PTOLEMY Philometor, and the Queen Cleopatra, committed the charge of the whole government to Onias and Doſitheus, who were both Jews. Apion meanly derogates from the action; whereas he ſhould rather have thank'd them for preſerving that Alexandria, whereof he very falſely pretended himſelf to be a citizen. For when Egypt was up in a rebellion, and upon the very brink of being irrecoverably loſt, theſe two Jews ſet all right again. Soon after this, Onias enter'd the place (ſays Apion) with a ſmall army, in the preſence of Thermus the Roman embaſſador: and this is all he ſays of the exploit, tho' it cannot be deny'd to have been a brave and a generous action.

Ptolemy Phyſcon ſucceeds Ptolemy Philometor. Phyſcon makes war upon Cleopatra, and Onias engages in her defence.

UPON the death of this Ptolemy Philometor, Ptolemy Phyſcon the ſon, marched out of Cyrene, with a deſign to force Cleopatra * and the king's ſons out of Egypt, and uſurp the kingdom to himſelf. Upon this ground it was that Onias made war upon Phyſcon, in defence of Cleopatra, like a true friend to a crown'd head, as well in adverſity as in proſperity. But there never was a more remarkable inſtance of God's power and juſtice than upon

upon this occaſion. For when Ptolemy was ready to join battle with Onias, he caus'd all the Jews in Alexandria, men, women and children to be ſtript and bound, and ſo thrown naked to the elephants to be trampled to death; and the beaſts were made drunk too, to inflame their fury. But in the concluſion, and beyond all expectation, the elephants quitted the Jews, and turning their rage another way, they deſtroy'd a great many of Ptolemy's beſt friends. In this inſtant of time, there appeared to him a hideous figure, with a menacing precaution to him to leave perſecuting the Jews; and the favourite miſtreſs of all his concubines, (ſome call'd her Ithaca, others Hirene) joining in the ſame office of mediation, the interceſſion wrought ſo effectually upon him, that he not only granted the requeſt, but heartily repented himſelf of all the cruelties that he had either actually committed or intended. This is a truth ſo notorious, that the Jews of Alexandria keep to this day an anniverſary feſtival in memory of their deliverance. And yet ſuch is the ſpiteful malevolence of Apion, that enemy of mankind, that he takes upon him to reproach the Jews for joining in this war againſt Phyſcon, as an impious action; whereas he ſhould rather have extoll'd it as a laudable piece of juſtice.

A miraculous providence in favour of the Jews.

Envy and deſtruction all over.

And ſo for the laſt Cleopatra that reign'd in Alexandria, how does Apion celebrate that queen, and lay all the blame at our door, only becauſe ſhe was ungrateful to us? Why does he not expoſe her in the lewdneſs of her life and manners, in her iniquity and falſeneſs to the tendereſt of husbands, friends and relations, to the Romans in general, and to her imperial benefactors? Did ſhe not cauſe her own ſiſter Arſinoë to be put to death in the temple without a crime? Did ſhe not as treacherouſly murder her brother? Did ſhe not ride the temples of the Gods of her anceſtors, and the ſepulchres of her forefathers? Did ſhe not receive her kingdom as a bounty from the hand of the firſt Ceſar, and afterwards rebel againſt his adopted ſon and ſucceſſor? What was it but Cleopatra's charms and philtres that debauch'd Anthony, and made him a traitor both to his country and to his friends? Some princes ſhe dethron'd, others again, ſhe made the paſſive inſtruments of her iniquity.

Apion celebrates the laſt Cleopatra, though the lewdeſt of women.

To paſs now from her ingratitude, lewdneſs, inhumanity and avarice, to that infamous meanneſs of ſpirit that ſhe ſhew'd at the naval battle of Actium, where ſhe abandon'd even her belov'd Anthony himſelf, and the father of many children by her; and her forcing him to deliver up his army and his honour, and all this to follow her. Could any thing be meaner, or more contemptible? In fine, upon Ceſar's taking Alexandria, ſhe was tranſported to ſuch a degree of rage, that ſhe valu'd herſelf upon the merit of a mercileſs barbarity: Inſomuch that ſhe reckon'd it would have made ſome amends for the loſs of the town, if ſhe could but have put all the Jews that were in it to death with her own hand. Now if it be again, as Apion reports, that Cleopatra refus'd corn to the Jews in a time of famine, why does he charge that upon us as a diſgrace, which in effect redounds to our honour? But Cleopatra receiv'd the juſt reward of her evil doings.

And what can we do better now for our own juſtification, than to appeal to Ceſar himſelf, the publick decrees of the ſenate of Rome, and the teſtimonials of Auguſtus Ceſar? Which will all bear us witneſs of the faith and true allegiance we have ever paid to the empire; and particularly in the war againſt the Egyptians.

The Jews appeal to Ceſar himſelf in juſtification of their loyalty.

Now theſe are the pieces and the authorities that Apion ſhould have conſulted, if he would have done us right. He ſhould have examin'd what opinion Alexander himſelf and other great princes had of us; all the Ptolemies, the ſenate, and ſo to the moſt illuſtrious of Roman emperors. If Germanicus could not ſupply all the Alexandrians with corn that wanted it, this was no fault of the Jews, but the infelicity of a barren ſeaſon, or a hard year. For no body ever doubted the good affection of the emperors toward the Alexandrian Jews, neither were they deny'd wheat any more than their neighbours; but, on the contrary, they found credit upon all occaſions, as in the command of the river and other conſiderable paſſes; and they were truſted, in fine, in all places and matters of moment, beyond other people.

But then, ſays Apion, if the Jews be citizens of Alexandria, how comes it that they do not worſhip the ſame Gods, and embrace the ſame religion with the reſt of their fellow citizens? Now to anſwer you in your own way; how come you, who are all Egyptians, to fall foul on one another, and to have irreconcileable differences in opinions in the matter of worſhip? Shall we pronounce you preſently to be no Egyptians for this? Or ſhall we doubt, on the other hand, whether you are, in truth, men or no, for taking ſo much pains to breed up beaſts, even contrary to nature, and then for worſhipping them when you have done? Whereas our people live in union and agreement. Now if you are ſo divided among yourſelves, what wonder is it if the Alexandrian Jews, who came thither from abroad, ſtick to their old laws ſtill, how different ſoever from yours?

Apion's objection anſwer'd.

But Apion will have it again, that all the broils and commotions in the ſtate there, were occaſion'd by theſe diſagreements in matters of religion betwixt the Alexandrian Jews and ancient inhabitants. Now if this imputation holds good againſt the Alexandrian Jews, why not as well againſt all other Jews elſewhere too? For whereſoever we are diſpers'd, we are nevertheleſs all of a piece. So that he that looks narrowly into theſe turbulent revolutions, will find them occaſion'd only by ſuch as Apion himſelf: For ſo long as the Greeks and Macedonians were in this city, the Jews had the free exerciſe of their religion, and the people lived all quietly and happily together. But as the Egyptians more and more encreaſed, ſo the times in proportion grew more and more troubleſome. But the Jews all this time continu'd the ſame, throughout all changes; while the other, having neither the conſtancy of the Macedonians, nor the prudence of the Greeks, ſtirr'd up all theſe broils: And being, over and above, poiſon'd with the ill habits and practices of the Egyptians, and irritated by the averſion they had for the Jews. Theſe were the people, I ſay, that gave the riſe to all our conconfuſions: So that we are only charg'd for the errors and miſcarriages of our very accuſers. Apion is likewiſe pleaſed to vilify us as ſtrangers, tho' fully qualify'd with the rights of freemen; and yet our adverſaries at the ſame time ſet up for citizens, without the leaſt colour of a pretence or title to that privilege. We do not read that any prince in the hiſtory of former times, or that any of the late emperors ever granted letters of freedom to the Egyptians. But the firſt who introduc'd us to a right to that claim, was Alexander the Great, and the grant hath been ſince enlarged with additions by other kings; and ſince that again, continu'd and confirm'd to us by the Romans.

Joſephus turns them upon Apion and his party.

The Jews vilify'd by Apion; and vindicated by Joſephus.

APION takes occaſion to lay great blame upon us alſo, for not ſetting up images and ſtatues in honour of the emperors; as if they could not have taken notice of this themſelves, without his intermeddling on their behalf. Now inſtead of arraigning us, he ſhould rather have celebrated the generous courteſy of the Romans, in allowing their ſubjects the freedom of their own religion, without extorting from them ſuch honours as they could not pay them with a good conſcience; ſo that they contented themſelves with thoſe reſpects which might be honeſtly render'd them. It is the good-will that ſtamps the obligation, and ſets a value upon the benefit, without the intervention either of neceſſity or violence. Well! But it is a common practice, you will ſay, both with the Greeks and other nations, to ſet a high eſteem upon the pictures or images of their fathers, mothers, children; nay, and of ſtrangers ſometimes, and ſo to their very ſervants, &c. And ſhall men grudge a deference of the ſame kind and quality to their lords and maſters? My anſwer is, That ours is a quite different caſe, with reſpect to our venerable lawgiver, who hath poſitively forbidden us the uſe of all images, and of any creature whatſoever, either animate or inanimate. And he did not this in any proſpect of derogating from the dignity of the Roman empire; but he would not ſuffer any corporeal image or repreſentation to be made of an inviſible and an incomprehenſible God. But we are not yet forbidden the paying of a reverence to good men, in the next place to God himſelf; as in the caſe of the emperors and the people of Rome, for whoſe welfare and proſperity we offer daily ſacrifices, at the charge of the publick, and for no other mortals under the ſun.

The caſe of graven images.

THIS may ſerve for any anſwer to Apion's extravagances about Alexandria; but not without admiration at the confidence of Poſidonius, and Apollonius Molon, who furniſh'd the materials, and charge us for not worſhipping the ſame gods with other people. To ſay nothing of numerous ſcurrilous ſtories upon that ſubject, even to the degree of blaſpheming and ridiculing our very temple itſelf, and without any check of conſcience for what they do. Not but that a falſity of any ſort is one of the moſt unmanly of vices, and moſt unbecoming of gentlemen; but eſpecially where the ſcandal of it falls upon a holy temple, ſo famous all over the world for the exemplary ſolemnity of an orderly devotion.

A ſenſeleſs tale of an aſs with a golden head.

"IN this holy place (ſays Apion) the Jews "had the golden head of an aſs of very great "value; which head the Jews worſhipp'd, "and it was a deity anſwerable to their religion; the image (he ſays) of an immenſe value was found depoſited in the treaſury, and carry'd away by Antiochus Epiphanes, upon the rifling of that ſacred place." Now my anſwer to Apion is this: That ſuppoſing the ſtory to have been a truth, it would not yet look well out of the mouth of an Egyptian to reproach us with it; for an aſs is not one jot more ſcandalous than a goat or a weezle, or ſeveral other beaſts which the Egyptians adore. How could any man be ſo beſotted now as to believe himſelf, in ſo incredible an impoſture, with twenty groſs contradictions in the face of him? Have we not ſtill govern'd ourſelves from time to time by the ſame laws and cuſtoms, without ever ſhifting or changing? And tho' Jeruſalem hath borne her part in the common fate of other cities, and fallen into the hands of enemies over and over, as Theos, Pompey the Great, Licinius Craſſus, and of Titus Ceſar now at laſt, temple and all, there was no talk of an aſs's head found there, nor of any thing extraordinary, but the pureſt piety, and the enſigns of it, which will not be properly a ſubject for this place.

As for Antiochus, his pilaging of the temple was a faithleſs and a perfidious action. He did not maſter it as a fair enemy, but as a treacherous friend, and a traitor to his allies. He wanted money, and thus he ſupply'd his neceſſities, like a common thief by robbery: But in ſhort, we have many grave hiſtorians to bear us witneſs, that there was nothing found, as he pretends, upon the rifling of it, to make the party or the cauſe ridiculous. As among others, I may reckon Polybius the Megalopolitan, Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicolas the Damaſcen, Timagenes, Caſtor the chronologer, and Apollodorus; who do all agree, that Antiochus being very neceſſitous, broke faith with the Jews, and robb'd the temple of a prodigious maſs of gold and ſilver. Now if Apion had not had the heart of an aſs, and the impudence of a dog, two of the gods uſually worſhipp'd by them, he would have taken theſe circumſtances into conſideration. But we are not yet come to have that veneration for our aſſes, that the Egyptians have for their aſps and crocodiles; wherein they are ſo ſuperſtitious, that whoſoever is ſtung by the one, or ſnatch'd away by the other, they reckon he goes immediately to the gods. But aſſes are to us the very ſame thing they are to other wiſe men: We make uſe of them to carry our burdens, and do our drudgery; but if they ſpoil the corn, or will not do as they ſhould do, we correct them with blows.

The treachery and ſacrilege of Antiochus.

Now after all this ſpite and calumny, Apion's inventions have been either ſo ill laid, or ſo ill put together, that he could never get credit enough in the world yet to do us any hurt. But there is another malicious ſtory ſtill behind, that paſſes all the reſt, and he borrow'd it from the Greeks: We ſhall not need to ſay more of it than this, That they know little of what belongs to piety or holy things, who do not underſtand, that the prophaning of a temple by walking through it, is a much more pardonable offence, than the raiſing of ſcandals againſt religious men, and reflecting indignities upon thoſe who ſerve at the altar: But it was their buſineſs rather to palliate a ſacrilegious and a perfidious prince, by imputing ting what he did to his neceſſities, than to do right to us, and our temple.

A fantaſtical encounter between Antiochus and a Grecian.

APION ſays farther, "That Antiochus, "upon entring the temple, found a man in "bed there, with a table before him, ſet out "with all the delicacies that either ſea or "land afforded. This man was ſo ſurpriz'd "at the encounter, that, looking upon Antio-"chus as his good angel, and one that came "to reſcue him, he threw himſelf at his feet, "and in a poſture of adoration, implor'd his "aſſiſtance. The king bade him ſpeak freely, "and tell him what he was; how he came "thither, what he did there; and finally, "what was the meaning of that treat there "upon the table. The poor man, upon this, "burſt out preſently into a paſſion, and with "ſighs and tears gave him this anſwer.

"I AM (ſays he) a Greek; and as I was "wandring up and down this country for a "livelihood, I was taken up at unawares by "ſome outlandiſh people, who brought me "to this place, and ſhut me up here, with "order not to let any creature come at me. "I was at firſt well enough pleaſed with an "entertainment ſo much beyond my expecta-"tion: but upon ſecond thoughts, finding my-"ſelf a little ſuſpicious and uneaſy, I ſound-"ed ſome of my keepers to know what might "be the meaning of this way of proceeding, "and the reſolution they gave me was this; "That the Jews had a law or cuſtom among "themſelves once a year, upon a certain day "prefix'd, to ſeize upon a Grecian ſtranger: "and ſo when they had kept him a fattening "for one whole year, to take him out into a "wood, and offer him up for a ſacrifice, ac-"cording to the ſolemnity of their own forms; "taking a taſte of his blood, with a horrid "oath at the ſame time, to live and die mor-"tal enemies to the Greeks: after which, they "caſt the remainder of this miſerable carcaſs "into a ditch. The Greek told Antiochus "likewiſe, that his time was within a few "days of being expir'd; adjuring him by the "veneration he had for the Grecian Gods, to "deliver him from that inhuman treachery of "the Jews."

THIS tragical invention was carry'd on to the higheſt pitch of ſhameleſs cruelty; but not ſo far yet, as to diſcharge Antiochus of the ſacrilege in any ſort, as thoſe paraſites would have had it, who trump'd up this ſtory in his favour. For it was not upon the Greek's account that Antiochus enter'd the temple; but he found him there after he was in, without any foreknowledge of the matter; ſo that it was a wickedneſs in his heart, not to be warranted upon any falſe pretence whatſoever, as will appear manifeſtly from the thing itſelf. Now the difference is much greater betwixt our laws and the Egyptians, and thoſe of ſeveral other nations, than betwixt us and the Greeks; or where is the country, in fine, that has not people of all religions ſome time or other to paſs thro' it? and how comes it now at laſt, that this fantaſtical barbarity ſhould be exercis'd only upon the Greeks? or how is it poſſible that the Jews ſhould all join in the ſolemnizing of theſe ſacrifices; and ſo many thouſands, as Apion numbers them, have every one a morſel out of the carcaſs of one miſerable wretch? and then how comes it that we have not the name of this perſecuted Greek, whoever he was; and that Antiochus did not ſend him back again in pomp and ſtate, into his own country, which would have given him the reputation of a prince of piety and a true lover of his people, beſides procuring him the alliance of all other nations, who wou'd have readily join'd him againſt the power and hatred of the Jews?

No convincing of a fool but by demonſtration.

BUT there's no working upon fools by argument, without the demonſtrative evidence of ſenſe and fact. Now there is not any man that ever ſaw this temple of ours, but can witneſs the care that was taken, by inviolable laws and proviſions, to order every thing in purity and perfection. It was divided into four partitions, and a guard appointed for each of them apart. The firſt diviſion was open to all comers, ſtrangers and all, without any reſerve; only women excepted in their monthly courſes; Jews and their wives (that is to ſay, clean and purify'd) were admitted into the ſecond; and male Jews purify'd in like manner, into the third. The fourth was only for the prieſts in their ſacerdotal habits: and none but the high-prieſt, in his pontifical robes peculiar to his dignity, to enter the holy ſanctuary: nay, ſo ſtrict and punctual were they in all the niceties of form and decorum, that the very prieſts themſelves could not have admittance but at ſuch certain hours.

A deſcription, and a diviſion of the temple.

The rules and methods of the Jewiſh worſhip and diſcipline.

UPON the opening of the temple in the morning, the prieſts that were to officiate, attended and enter'd; and ſo at noon, upon the ſhutting of it up again. There was in the temple an altar, a table, a cenſer and a candleſtick, according to the direction of the law; neither was it lawful to carry into it any other veſſel. There was no eating or feaſting, nor any thing at all done in myſtery, but in the face of the whole congegation; and all things in ſuch method too, that tho' there were four tribes of prieſts, and in every tribe upward of five thouſand perſons, they took their turns yet of attendance upon their ſet and certain days; and ſo ſucceſſively, as one went off, another came on: and then about noon, meeting all together in the temple, they deliver'd up their reſpective truſts one to another: ſome diſcharging themſelves of the keys, others of the veſſels, and without bringing any thing at all into that holy place that belongs to meat or drink: for it is not lawful to offer any thing upon our altars, but what is provided for the ſacrifice. What then can we call Apion's writings but an heap of inconſiſtencies and improbabilities, put together at a venture without any regard to truth or falſhood; which is certainly the fouleſt thing that can be ſaid of any man who ſets up for an hiſtorian, or a lover of letters? beſide that at the ſame time, when Apion publiſhes his ſpiteful invectives againſt us without any foundation, on the one hand, he ſuppreſſes all the good things of us, that he certainly knows to be true, on the other. Now for the fancy of his Greek priſoner, his luxurious entertainment, and the people's paſſing thro' the temple as a thoroughfare, where it is notoriouſly known that none but prieſts durſt preſume to ſhew their heads; this is all a forgery and a contrivance of malice prepenſe, to ſeduce thoſe who are unwilling to give themſelves the trouble of ſearching out the truth. Theſe are the evil practices he has made uſe of to vilify and traduce us.

Nothing ſo foul as partiality in an hiſtorian.

APION purſues the humour ſtill, with one fable fable upon the back of another, to make us yet more and more odious; and ſo furniſhes another foppiſh ſtory out of the mouth of the Grecian, in theſe words. "While the Jews "and the Idumeans, (ſays he) were engaged "in a long and an obſtinate war, there came "a man over to the Jews out of ſome city or "other of Idumea, where they worſhipped "Apollo, and this man's name was Zabidus; "who promis'd them to put Apollo, the God "of the Dorians, into their hands, if they "could but get the Jews to gather all toge-"ther into the temple in a body. Zabidus, "upon this, contriv'd a certain machine of "boards, and, conveying himſelf into it, ſet "up three rows of lights upon it, which ap-"pear'd at a diſtance like a comet upon the "ground. *

A ridiculous fiction of one Zabidus.

"THIS apparition was ſo great a ſurprize "to the Jews, that they ſtood gazing at it a far "off, without ſo much as one word ſpeaking. "Zabidus, in the mean while, ſtole into the "temple, and without any difficulty, ſeiz'd "the aſs's golden head (as he pleaſantly ren-"ders it) and carry'd it away to Dora." The ſillineſs of this invention ſpeaks Apion the greater aſs of the two; together with an incomparable impudence, over and above the folly of it; for there are no ſuch places to be found as ſeveral that he mentions. He does not ſo much as know where Idumea lies; or that there is no ſuch city in it as Dora. There is a place indeed of that name in Phenicia, not far from mount Carmel; but this is four days journey from Judea, and none of Apion's Dora.

Reflections upon Apion's fooleries.

HE is much in the right ſure to condemn us for not worſhipping other people's gods, if, as he ſays, our forefathers were ſo credulous as to believe that Apollo would come over to them, and that he look'd like a walking comet. It was a wonder again that the Jews ſhould not know a lamp or a torch, when they ſaw it, from a ſtar, that had ſo many of their own: and the miracle was little leſs, that Apollo ſhould go off clear with his aſs's head thorough ſo many thouſands of people, without ſo much as being queſtion'd about it, and no guards to ſtop him, either in town or country; and this in the heat of the war too.

HERE are more words already about a ridiculous hiſtory than the thing is worth; and yet I cannot but wonder again, over and over, how the temple gates of ſixty † cubits in in height, ‡ twenty in breadth, plated all over, and within a little of maſſy gold; two hundred men every day to ſhut them, and a crime unpardonable to leave them open: —— How theſe gates, I ſay, ſhould be manag'd by one ſingle man, and Zabidus, according to the ſtory, to keep the aſs's head to himſelf. Wherefore it may be a queſtion, whether Zabidus brought the head back again, or elſe gave it to Apion, to be laid in the temple on purpoſe for Antiochus to find it, and ſo to furniſh matter for another lying ſtory.

Apion forgeth an oath, and chargeth it upon the Jews.

IT is as falſe again, what he ſays of the oath: That is to ſay, that the Jews do ſolemnly ſwear by the Maker of heaven, earth and the ſeas, That they will never do good to any ſtrangers, and above all others, not to the Greeks. Now if this falſifier had ſaid, (eſpecially not to the Egyptians) he might better have conſiſted with himſelf; at leaſt if our predeceſſors were driven out of Egypt, not for their ill manners, but for their misfortunes. As to the Jews and Greeks, they were at ſo great a diſtance one from the other, that there was not the leaſt colour for envy or hatred betwixt them. Nay, on the contrary, ſeveral of them came over to our religion; ſome perſiſted in it, others went off again: but for this pretended oath, Apion is the only man that ever heard of it; and no otherwiſe neither, than as a fiction of his own contriving.

BUT the next is a moſt admirable contrivance. He brings it as an argument againſt the juſtice of our laws, or manner of worſhip, and the truth of our religion, that we are under the burden of ſervitude, and oppreſſion, not only in our perſons, but in our capital city itſelf; a city, that how free and powerful ſoever it hath been formerly, is at preſent no better than a tributary to the Romans; and where are the people now that are to contend with them? or who but Apion would reaſon the caſe at this foppiſh rate, as if dominion were an entail? Whereas government and ſubjection take their fortunes in the world by turns. Only the Egyptians pretend an immunity from all ſervices to the rulers of Aſia and Europe; which they ground upon the gratitude of the ſtrange gods, that fled from abroad into their country for ſanctuary, and there ſecur'd themſelves in the ſhape of beaſts. Was ever ſo ſenſeleſs a vanity as this heard of, from the mouth of a ſort of people who never enjoy'd one day of liberty in an age, either at home or abroad? How often have the Perſians had the Egyptians at their feet; razing their cities, ravaging their temples, deſtroying their idol deities, and vilifying their worſhip? But I am not for writing after Apion's copy, and turning a misfortune into a reproach. Where was there ever a braver people than the Lacedemonians, or a nation of more exemplary piety than the Athenians? And yet neither the virtue of the one, nor the courage of the other was ſufficient to ſecure them againſt the chances of war, and the common fate of kingdoms and ſtates. To ſay nothing of the miſerable diſaſters that have attended the beſt of kings, as Creſus for one; the laying of the tower of Athens, the temples of Epheſus and Delphi, and ſeveral other illuſtrious places and palaces, all in aſhes. Now the ſcandal in ſuch inſtances as theſe, falls in courſe upon the actors of theſe tragical devaſtations, not upon the ſufferers of them; however our accuſer Apion has found out a new way of crimination, without ſo much as dreaming how far Egypt itſelf is concern'd in the parity of the caſe. But he was ſo taken up with the fabulous exploits of Seſoſtris king of Egypt, that he knew not what he did. Now if we were given to be vain on the other hand, we might find kings of our own to boaſt of, as David and Solomon, with the hiſtory of the princes and nations that were ſubdu'd by their victorious arms. But we ſhall rather keep to our text. What were the Egyptians, but firſt,

The Jews misfortunes turn'd to their reproach.

A diſcourſe upon government and ſubjection.

The Lacedemonians and the Athenians, brave but unfortunate. No fence againſt the chances of war.

* Here ends the chaſm in the Greek copy ſupply'd by the Latin.

ſlaves

ſlaves to the Perſians, with other princes of Aſia, and ſo to the Macedonians; while we all this while liv'd in a ſtate of freedom, with the command of all the neighbouring cities, for the ſpace of a hundred and twenty years, that is to ſay, to the time of Pompey the great? And then at laſt, when the Romans had over-run all the other kings they had to do withal, our forefathers were the only people they treated like friends and allies for their faith and valour. But Apion, it ſeems, knew nothing of all this, and makes himſelf a ſtranger to things as clear as the ſun to all the world beſide.

The Jews the only favourites of the Romans.

Apion has now another throw at us, for an obſcure ignorant ſort of people. "The Jews (he "ſays) have no famous men among them for arts "and ſciences, or for the political wiſdom of "managing governments and ſtates; ſuch, I "mean, as Socrates, Zeno, Cleanthes, and the "like." Nay, he does not forget to place himſelf in the liſt of his famous men; but bleſſes Alexandria in the honour of having Apion for a citizen. As to this character of Apion, all people have ſo mean an opinion of him, for the extravagant corruption of his life and manners, that it would never have been believ'd but from his own mouth: So that Alexandria is rather to be pity'd than envy'd for valuing itſelf upon ſuch a ſupporter. As to the point in competition betwixt the two nations, which of them ſhould have the preference for men of art and learning, the reader has no more to do but to conſult our Antiquities for his ſatisfaction. And then for that part of the ſcandal that remains unanſwer'd, we cannot do better than to refer him to his own contradictions, wherein he accuſes himſelf and other Egyptians.

The calumnies of Apion laid open.

His vanity and ſelf-conceit.

He takes great offence at our ſacrificing ordinary beaſts, the ſcruple we make at the eating of ſwine's fleſh; and then for the ceremony of our circumciſion, he makes a downright mock of it. As to our killing of beaſts, it is no more than what all the world does as well as we; and then for our ſacrifices, he diſcovers himſelf before he's aware to be an Egyptian, by ſpeaking againſt them; for a Greek or a Macedonian, that makes a profeſſion of offering whole hecatombs to the Gods themſelves without any difficulty, would never have ſtumbled upon that block. They ſhare alſo with their prieſts in the fleſh of their oblations, and no danger all this while of deſtroying the ſpecies of thoſe animals, as Apion ſeems to apprehend; whereas if all other people were of the Egyptians humour, the world would come quickly rather to want men, and there would be a ſtock of ravenous wild beaſts to fill their places; for thoſe are the Gods they train up and worſhip.

If the queſtion were now put to Apion, what ſort of Egyptians he takes to be the holieſt and the wiſeſt men, his anſwer undoubtedly would be the prieſts; for they have theſe two precepts tranſmitted down to them in a tradition from their firſt kings, i. e. to worſhip the Gods, and to apply themſelves to the ſtudy of wiſdom. And this they all make profeſſion to do; they are all of them circumcis'd over and above, forbear ſwine's fleſh, and join with no other ſort of Egyptians in their ſacrifices; ſo that Apion did wonderfully miſtake his meaſures, when, inſtead of gratifying the Egyptians with invectives againſt us, he advanced a direct accuſation againſt thoſe he pretended to favour, in charging the ſame ceremonies upon them that he blames us for; and likewiſe adviſing and encouraging circumciſion in others, as we have it upon the credit of Herodotus. It ſeems to me now that Apion's puniſhment (as it follows here) was very juſt upon him, for ſpeaking ſuch bitter things againſt the laws of his country. He was forced, by advice, upon a circumciſion; the wound feſter'd, and the part ulcerating upon it, the diſtemper carry'd him off in miſerable torments. This may ſerve for a warning to thoſe that, like Apion, abandon all the rules and duties of life and good manners themſelves, and then employ their wits in defaming of their neighbours. This was Apion's caſe: He apoſtatiz'd from the laws of his own country, and he bely'd ours. We are now come to the end of Apion's life, and it is time to put an end to this book too.

The precepts of the Egyptian prieſts.

The miſerable death of Apion.

But ſince ſo it is, that Apollonius Molon, Lyſimachus, and ſeveral others, have caſt out ſome words, like fools or madmen, to the diſhonour of Moſes, our excellent law-giver, aſperſing him for an impoſtor and a magician, and repreſenting his laws as peſtilent and dangerous, it will not be amiſs to give the world ſome ſhort account, as well particular as general, of our converſation and government; and I doubt not but to make it appear that there was never ſuch a body of laws fram'd for the common good of mankind, as theſe of Moſes; either for the advancing of piety, juſtice, charity, induſtry, the regulation of human ſociety, reſignation, and patience, to the very contempt of death itſelf; never the like, I ſay, if people would but impartially conſider them; for I am not here upon a panegyrick to the honour of our anceſtors, but doing a neceſſary right to the cauſe, againſt calumny and detraction.

Moſes defended againſt Apollonius and others.

The excellency of Moſes's laws.

Now Apollonius does not carry on his malice, like Apion, in a continu'd ſet diſcourſe, but now and then by intervals as the humour takes him: One while he makes atheiſts of us, and a hateful ſort of people both to God and man; another he will have us to be cowards; and then our fault is at the next word that we are too forward and fool-hardy, and arranter ſots than the moſt ſtupid of barbarians; for the Jews never invented any thing (he ſays) that mankind was the better for. Now there needs no more to the confuting of theſe ſpiteful ſuggeſtions, than to examine the conſtitution of the laws by which we are govern'd, and the ſtrict conformity of our lives and practices to thoſe precepts. But now if we ſhall be forc'd, in our own juſtification, to rip up the imperfections of other polities, they may thank themſelves for provoking us to it by an opprobrious compariſon, and making the reproach we caſt upon them neceſſary to our own defence.

Apollonius his way of defaming the Jews.

There are, in ſhort, but two points in the caſe. Firſt, are the laws we pretend to good and profitable, or not? Secondly, are we ſtrict obſervers, or not, of our own laws? If they ſhould deny the former, we are ready to make it out from an undeniable abſtract of the very laws themſelves. And then the ſecond part is ſo clear, that it will not bear ſo much as a queſtion. But to carry it a little farther yet; it

Two main points in the caſe.

It is without diſpute, that the firſt founders of laws for the eſtabliſhment of order and diſcipline, out of a good will to the publick, are to be prefer'd infinitely before thoſe that live without any rule or method at all; for they all appeal to antiquity, and take it for a greater honour to teach others what they ought to do, than barely to imitate what they ſee done before them. Now this being given for granted, it is the law-giver's part in the firſt place, to make ſuch a proviſion of laws, as may ſerve to promote the good of the community, by the very convenience and reaſon of them; while the people, on the other ſide, ſtand firm to the eſtabliſhment, in deſpite of all trials and temptations.

Moſes undoubtedly the firſt law-giver.

As to the antiquity of our law-giver, he has undoubtedly a right to a precedence before all others: For Lycurgus, Solon, and Zeleucus of Locris, with the reſt of the eminent Greeks they ſo much boaſt of, were all but novices and upſtarts compar'd with Moſes. The very name of law was not as yet ſo much as heard of, and Homer himſelf wanted a word for it. The people in thoſe days were not govern'd by written precepts, but by the abſolute will and pleaſure of kings, and ſo it held a long time by authoritative orders and proviſions to anſwer the occaſion. But our law-giver, having his claim of priority granted him by his very enemies, acquitted himſelf likewiſe to admiration, in all the offices of adminiſtration and council. Firſt in compoſing ſuch a body of laws as might anſwer all the neceſſities of human life; and after that, in getting them receiv'd among the people, with a declaration that they would mantain and obey them. But we ſhall the better judge of the man by his works.

Homer himſelf wanted a word for a law.

The hiſtory of Moſes.

WHEN our fore-fathers, under his conduct, to the number of many thouſands, march'd out of the land of Egypt into the country that God had had appointed for them, thorough a barren, ſandy deſart without water, and had ſeveral encounters with the enemy by the way, in defence of themſelves, their wives, and their children; who was their guide all this while to carry them off through theſe almoſt inſuperable difficulties, but our careful law-giver ſtill, in the quality both of a valiant general, a wiſe councellor, and their common protector? A perſon of ſo exemplary a modeſty, that, tho' the people were every man of them at his command, to do what he would with them, he never took upon himſelf to act any thing by his own power; but in caſes where other men pretended to tyrannize and domineer, and to indulge a general licence and debauch, Moſes, on the contrary, walk'd in the fear of God, and by his example encourag'd the people in the exerciſe of piety and juſtice, as their beſt ſecurity, together with the improvement of all accidents.

Moſes was the peoples guide and God himſelf was Moſes's.

MOSES was much in the right to look upon God as his oracle and adviſer; and then, being ſatisfy'd in himſelf that he could not do amiſs, ſo long as he committed himſelf to the conduct of divine Providence, he did his uttermoſt to poſſeſs the common people alſo with the ſame thing; for nothing puts ſuch a check upon us in all our iniquities, as to conſider that God ſees us; ſo that, in fine, our law-giver was not a ſeducer or a magician, as he is falſely repreſented, but ſuch another as Minos and others after him were reputed among the Greeks; ſome aſcribing the original of their laws to Jupiter, others to Apollo, or the oracle at Delphi. But whether theſe men believed this themſelves, or only gave it out to have the people believe it, may be a queſtion; but we ſhall beſt judge of the excellency and ſacredneſs of theſe laws by comparing them, which is the next thing we are to do.

The original of the Grecian laws.

SEVERAL nations have their ſeveral forms of government, and their diverſities of laws. Some governments are committed to a ſingle perſon, others to the people: But our law-giver was neither for the one nor the other, but, betwixt both, for that which he calls a holy common-wealth; aſſigning God himſelf for the head of it, with a reſpect both to worſhip and power, as the fountain and the author of all good. To him it is that we fly for ſuccour in our diſtreſſes, who hears our prayers, and ſearches the very ſecrets of our hearts. He inculcates to us the doctrine of one God, one uncreated, unchangeable, and eternal being, infinitely glorious and incomprehenſible, any further than what we know of him by his works. Now this is no more than what we have in a great meaſure from the wiſer ſort of the Greek philoſophers themſelves, even by the light of nature; for they do all unanimouſly agree, upon the congruity of theſe principles, to the majeſty and excellence of God; as Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, Plato, and after them the Stoicks, who are almoſt wholly of the ſame mind as to this ſubject. But the multitude, being engag'd in a violent and a ſuperſtitious prepoſſeſſion againſt theſe opinions, the philoſophers durſt not venture too far in the promoting of them. But our law-giver was the only man that liv'd as he taught, both to the ſatisfaction of the preſent age, and to the eſtabliſhing and confirming of poſterity in the truths that he deliver'd, governing himſelf alſo by this conſtant rule, that he made the publick good the end ſtill of all his laws. He gave to underſtand, that God's worſhip was but one part of a holy man's duty, and ſo caſt in the other branches of it, as fortitude, juſtice, and a conſtant interchange of good offices toward mankind over and above; inſomuch that all his precepts and preſcriptions terminated in the advancement of piety, to the honour and glory of God; this being a point that he had thoroughly ſtudy'd and examin'd.

Several forms of government.

Moſes's holy common-wealth.

What thoughts the Greek philoſophers had of a deity, by the light of nature.

The difference betwixt Moſes and other law-givers.

As to what concerns religion and good manners, it was his way to join the theory with the practice; whereas other law-givers commonly took one part of the diviſion, and left the other. As for example; the people of Lacedemon and Crete were nevertheleſs inſtructed in morals, tho' not by rule and precept; but the Athenians, and well nigh all the other Greeks, had their laws for every thing, tho' they fell ſhort in the practice; whereas our law-giver provided for both in one, attending at the ſame time to the cultivating and perfecting of our morals, with the adapting of proper proviſions in writing to anſwer all occaſions. He begins upon the ſubject of meats and diet, what we may be allow'd to eat, and what not, and with whom, and reducing all people indifferently to the order of that method. He takes the ſame care alſo for a regulation in the matter of labour and reſt, to the end that no man may be ignorant of his duty; for what the law bids us to do, is the dictate and command of our maſter, and it puniſhes only wilful offenders: But to leave us wholly without excuſe now, in caſe of tranſgreſſing any of theſe holy laws; it is not enough to hear them read over and over (once, twice, or perhaps oft'ner) but we are poſitively commanded (all other work or buſineſs apart) to meet conſtantly once a week in a full congregation, expreſsly to attend the reading of the law, and the getting of it by heart, which was never practis'd by any other law-givers. Nay, ſo far are the generality of the world from living in a conformity to their own laws, that they do not ſo much as underſtand what they are; but upon committing a fault, they are oblig'd to ask other people what law they have broken. This is, in ſhort, the very caſe even amongſt men of the firſt quality too; who are not aſham'd tacitly to confeſs their ignorance, in the taking of men learned in the law to their counſel and aſſiſtance; whereas our people have the laws at their fingers ends, as ready as their own names; having been train'd up to them from their very cradle, till they are imprinted in their hearts. And this makes men the more wary of offending, when they find themſelves ſure to be detected and puniſh'd.

Of morality and religion. The Jews are all train'd up to the ſame laws and government.

They keep one day of the week holy according to the law.

A wonderful agreement in life and manners.

This is the foundation now of that admirable agreement we find among ourſelves. We have all of us the ſame thoughts of God, the ſame forms of diſcipline and worſhip, our way of life and manners, the very ſame too. It is not with us, as it is with other people that entertain various opinions of one and the ſame God; and thoſe, not only the common ſort of men, who utter their own wild and extravagant notions, and bolt out whatever comes next, but the philoſophers themſelves. Some of them deny the very divinity of God, others his providence, upon an impious ſuggeſtion that all men are equal, and that all things are in common. Now we ſay, on the contrary, that God ſees and diſpoſes of all things, (nay our very wives and ſervants are of the ſame perſuaſion) and that all the actions of our lives ought to be directed to the honour and ſervice of God.

To ſpeak now to that reflection upon us, as men of no induſtry or invention, either in arts or letters, for keeping ſtill (as they ſay) to the dull plodding train of acting the ſame over and over again: Whereas men of wit and ſpirit value themſelves rather upon making of old things look new, and refining upon the wiſdom and cuſtoms of their fore-fathers. Now for our parts, we make it a point of conſcience not to depart, either in word, thought, or deed, from the eſtabliſhments of former times: The very antiquity itſelf being an infallible mark of a good and well grounded law, which neither time nor argument, will be ever able to deſtroy. But for us now, who firmly believe theſe laws of ours to be of divine inſtitution, we have nothing more to do than to preſerve them ſacred and inviolate. For who ſhall dare to offer at the removing of thoſe foundations which God himſelf hath laid? Or but to think of mending them; tho' by transferring the moſt beneficial proviſions out of the beſt of other governments, to the ſervice of our commonwealth? Can any conſtitution be more agreeable, firm, or juſt, than that whereof the king of kings hath vouchſafed to be the author? As to the prieſts, they are qualify'd in common for ſeveral ſpecial ſervices, and the high-prieſt in an order of power and ſuperiority above all the reſt. And they are not promoted by the law-giver to that dignity, for ambition, wealth, or any corrupt intereſt, but for the ſignal teſtimony they have given of their piety, temperance and wiſdom; and to them is committed the care of religion, and God's holy worſhip. They ſerve alſo as judges in controverſies betwixt man and man, with a power to puniſh thoſe that do amiſs. What government now, or what form of government, can be more ſacred or venerable than this; or what greater honour can we do to almighty God, than to ſpend our lives in a daily attendance upon his ſervice, and under the inſpection of the prieſts, to ſee that all things be done with order and reverence? The ſolemnity of this devotion makes every day look like a feſtival: And, whereas other people have much ado to hold out, tho' but for ſome few days, in the continu'd celebration of their myſteries or ſacrifices, as they call them, we are yet as firm, chearful and vigorous in the diſcharge of our duties at this hour, as we were ſo many ages ſince, upon the very firſt inſtitution of them.

Qualifications for the prieſthood.

Antiquities ſacred and of divine authority.

Among other known precepts of our religion, we are taught in the firſt place, That God is all in all, perfect, happy, and ſelf-ſufficient; the beginning, the middle, and the end of all things, glorious in all his actions and works; nothing ſo manifeſt as his power and greatneſs, or at the ſame time ſo incomprehenſible. It is not for the tongue of man to expreſs, or for the heart of man ſo much as to conceive any reſemblance of that divine majeſty. He is, in fine, incomparable in all his excellencies and attributes, infinitely beyond art or imitation: ſo that it is impoſible to ſee, or to imagine any thing like him; for, being a ſpirit, he is alſo inviſible. But we are allow'd to read him however in his works; as in the light, the heavens, the earth, the ſun, the moon, the rivers, the ſea, ſeveral ſorts of animals, various plants, &c. which were all the work of God, and created without either labour or hands, or any ſecond to his aſſiſtance: But his will, and his word gave them their being. He made every thing by the word of his power, and in the ſame inſtant looking upon it, he pronounc'd it to be good. This is the almighty Sovereign that we are all bound to love and adore, in the ſtudy and exerciſe of virtue, which is the only way to pleaſe him.

Of God's power and providence. Of God and his works.

As there is but one God, and one world, in common to all mankind, it holds in the analogy that there ſhould be but one temple too; for God takes delight in the congruities of order and proportion. In this temple, the prieſts offer up their daily devotions; the firſt in quality, is the firſt that ſacrifices. He takes care that the laws be duly obſerv'd, hears cauſes, and puniſhes thoſe that the law condemns; and it is in effect as penal to diſpute the authority of the prieſt, as to appeal from the judgment of God himſelf.

One God, one world, and one temple.

The office and authority of the prieſts.

In eating the fleſh of our ſacrifices, we muſt have a care not to extend that liberty to the degree of gluttony and exceſs; for God, who is a lover of ſobriety, and all manner of temperance, can never be pleas'd with the extravagances of violence and profuſion.

An abſtract of Moſes's laws and precepts. The ſacrificers are to be temperate and ſober.

The

THE prieſt begins his office with prayers for the general good of mankind, and after that, every man for himſelf, as a part of the whole; being well aſſur'd, that nothing is ſo acceptable in the ſight of God as a mutual charity and tenderneſs among men, one for another.

What to pray for.

WHEN we offer up our prayers and vows to Almighty God, we are not to petition for wealth, honour, and the good things of this world; for theſe are bleſſings which he is pleaſed to beſtow in common upon mankind; but our prayer muſt be for a good diſpoſition of mind, to make a proper and right uſe of what we have.

Of purifications.

THE law hath alſo preſcribed us certain formal purifications, in the caſe of women, and under other ſorts of limitation and reſtriction, too many and too tedious to be inſerted in this place. This is what the law ſays of God, and of the ways of pleaſing him, and he himſelf all this while is effectually that very law.

Of marriages.

BUT now to the point of marriage: If it be purely for the ſake of children, without any by-regard to the fortune, and not to gratify any looſe appetite; if there be no force or fraud in the caſe, and, provided it be done with the conſent of parents, and not within the degrees forbidden, our laws approve of it. But as for the ſin of unnatural luſts, the very attempt is puniſh'd with death.

The wife to be ſubject to her husband.

THE law ſays further, that the woman ſhall be ſubject in all things to her husband; which muſt not be taken for a diſpenſation to abuſe her under that cover, but as a proviſion for the upholding of decency and good order; for God hath given the man power over his wife.

Penalties in caſes of incontinence.

The woman is to have no carnal knowledge of any other man, upon pain of death without mercy; and he that abuſes a betrothed virgin, incurs the ſame penalty. It is the ſame thing alſo in caſe of corrupting a married woman, or a mother of children. This is all according to our law, which is likewiſe no leſs ſevere upon thoſe women who either conceal their children when they are brought into the world, or otherwiſe deſtroy them: for the ſoul ſuffers with the body, beſide that it is in ſome degree an unpeopling of the world. Whoever accompanies with a woman, is look'd upon by our law to be unclean; and the woman alſo is obliged to waſh and purify herſelf after that congreſs with her husband; to which end there is purifying water ſtill at hand for ſuch an occaſion: ſo near is the communication in this caſe betwixt ſoul and body.

Corporal purifications.

As to the cuſtom of feaſting, or merry-making at the birth of children, our law doth not upon any terms approve of it; partly, to train them up to ſobriety betimes, and in part, for fear it might prove a temptation to intemperance and debauch. It is alſo provided that children ſhould be brought up to the knowledge of letters, both in law and hiſtory; for an encouragement to them on the one hand, to do great things in imitation of great examples, and to fortify them on the other ſide, in a perfect underſtanding of their duty.

Care taken to moderate the pomp of funerals.

THERE was care taken alſo for moderating the vain pomp and expenſe of burials, in monuments, and funeral ſolemnities. But yet for the decency of an office ſo human and neceſſary, it was committed to the domeſticks to ſee right done to the memory of their maſters; and all people were permitted upon the death of any man, to come in, and lament, and condole over the deceaſed; but the houſe was ſtill to be purify'd ſo ſoon as the funeral was over, and the family to keep at a diſtance, as men reputed unclean.

NEITHER is the law ſilent in caſes either of wilful murder, or of chance-medley; but it directs a diſtinguiſhing puniſhment according to the quality of the crime.

The duty of children to parents, and of the younger to the elder. Of friendſhip

WE are enjoined reverence to parents, next to the veneration we pay to God himſelf; and the law appoints the ungrateful and the diſobedient to be ſton'd to death. The younger ſort are commanded to pay a reſpect to their elders; for God was before all things. There muſt be no ſuch thing as a ſecret among friends; for friendſhip implies an entire confidence without any reſerve. Nay, where a friendſhip is diſſolv'd, we muſt not yet be falſe to a former truſt.

Severe laws againſt bribes, fraud, extortion, &c.

THE judge that takes a bribe is to be puniſh'd with death, for ſiding with the guilty, and oppreſſing the righteous. Every man is reſtrain'd from touching any thing wrongfully of his neighbour's, from taking away what does not belong to him, or lending his money upon uſury. And ſo let this ſuffice as to the regulation of our dealings one with another.

How to treat ſtrangers.

IT will be worth our while, in the next place, to ſee how we are to behave ourſelves toward ſtrangers, and to ſhew that our law-giver hath not been wanting in any thing toward the advancing of the publick good; either by keeping us firm to our own laws, or by communicating the benefit of them to others that have a mind to partake of them. For he receives with open arms all that come over to us, of what nation ſoever, indifferently; provided they agree in the ſame common principles of life and manners. But for thoſe who come to us only by the bye, and without any intent to join with us, thoſe people are not ſuffer'd to intermix with us in our ſolemnities: But we are obliged, however, to do them the beſt offices we can to all other purpoſes. As for example: If they ſhould want fire, water, food, or the like, we are commanded to ſupply them, or to ſet any of them right that are out of the way; and ſo to give a dead body a decent burial. Now theſe are all duties of humanity abſtracted from religion.

How to behave our ſelves towards our enemies.

HE preſcribes rules of moderation alſo to be obſerv'd toward enemies, without forcing war to the extremities of fire and ſword. Nay, our law-giver's charity extends to the very eaſing of priſoners, women eſpecially; and ſo for the dead bodies that fell in battle, he would not ſuffer them to be ſtripp'd.

Duties of humanity apart from thoſe of religion.

SUCH, in fine, was the paſſion he had for the encouraging of tenderneſs and good nature among men, that he recommended the practice of it, even towards unreaſonable creatures, in allowing us no other power over them, than for the lawful and the neceſſary uſe and ſervice of mankind. As for domeſtick creatures that are brought up tame in our houſes, they are to be ſpar'd; neither in other caſes are the dam and the young to be deſtroy'd together. Beaſts of labour and common uſe, are likewiſe to be forborn, tho' in ſome reſpects miſchievous.

THESE were the conſtitutions and proviſions of our law-giver upon this topick, both for the pro-promoting of tender inclinations by inſtructive doctrines, (as aforeſaid) upon that ſubject; and likewiſe for the deterring of tranſgreſſors by an exemplary and an inexorable rigour. For the puniſhment in many caſes is no leſs than death; for inſtance, in adultery, rape, and unnatural practices, as well in the agent as in the patient, and the penalty reaches all conditions too, whether bond or free.

Duties of common juſtice between man and man.

We have our laws alſo concerning weights and meaſures, and all ſorts of frauds in buying or ſelling, taking away another man's goods, or appropriating to ourſelves what is not our own. Now offenders of this kind, are puniſh'd with much more ſeverity under our laws, than elſewhere.

He that blaſphemes God, or but attempts any kind of indignity upon his divine Majeſty, and he that behaves himſelf contumaciouſly toward his father or his mother, they are all doom'd to death upon the place. And the reward at laſt promiſed to theſe people for what they do and ſuffer, in the obſervance of theſe laws, is not gold and ſilver, imperial crowns, and precious ſtones, but the comfort and teſtimony of a good conſcience, with an aſſurance of an eternal happineſs; an aſſurance grounded not only upon the predictions of the law-giver, but upon the promiſe alſo of the God of truth to thoſe that keep his laws. And in this truſt and confidence, they look upon death itſelf only as the bleſſed means of tranſporting them from this life to a better.

The reward of well doing.

I ſhould have made a conſcience of ſaying thus much, if the matter of fact were not as clear as the ſun in the hiſtory of our fore-fathers, what torments they have undergone, and with what reſolution they have borne them, rather than let fall one word to the diſhonour of their profeſſion. But let us make it the caſe now, that the Jews were a people never ſo much as heard of upon the face of the earth, and no witneſſes to the veneration we have conſtantly paid to our laws: What would the Grecians think of it, if any body ſhould but tell them a ſtory of what they had heard, or read, of a people in ſome imaginary unknown land, that had ſtood true and firm for ſo many ages, to the religion, laws, and cuſtoms of their predeceſſors? Would they not all wonder at it, eſpecially when there are ſuch continual changes among themſelves?

The Jews firm in all extremities.

As for their modern writers that treat of ſtate and government, how are they ridicul'd for relating incredibilities? To ſay nothing of ſeveral other philoſophers, that have handled the ſame ſubject, there is Plato himſelf, the very oracle of the Greeks, and a man in ſingular eſteem for his wiſdom, piety and manners, and a philoſopher of the firſt rate over and above; how is this great man banter'd and buffoon'd upon a publick theatre, by ſome ſelf-conceited pretenders, for his wild notions of government, as they call them! When yet upon a ſtrict examination of his writings, they will be found agreeable both to reaſon and nature. But to take him upon his own confeſſion: "It is not ſafe (he ſays) for a wiſe man to "tell what he thinks of God, for fear of the "impetuous ignorance of the common people." But Plato (they ſay) writes like a man of vanity and licenſe. Lycurgus indeed was a man celebrated for a law-giver in perfection, out of a reverence they had to the duration of his laws under the ſame adminiſtration. Now if ſo it be, that antiquity and long continuance of laws adds to their ſanction, and is an argument of their goodneſs, with what face ſhall the Lacedemonians ſet up for competitors with us, in the point of antiquity, who have been now upward of two thouſand years in poſſeſſion of our claim? To which I muſt add this over and above, that the Lacedemonians themſelves kept up their laws to the height, no longer than while they were free and enjoy'd their liberty: But ſo ſoon as fortune abandon'd them, they fell off, and abandon'd their laws.

Plato a great man, and yet ridicul'd for his politicks.

Lycurgus famous for the reputation and continuance of his Laws.

But for our parts, after all the broils and changes in Aſia, and ourſelves reduc'd to the laſt extremity, it cannot be ſaid that we ever departed from the cuſtoms and ceremonies of our fore-fathers; neither can it be objected againſt us, that we ever conſulted either our caſe or our pleaſure, in preſerving them as we did. For whoever compares the condition of both parties, will find the Jews to have been upon much harder duty than the Lacedemonians. For they were put to no offices of drudgery, in digging and delving, or to any other handicraft-labour; but liv'd in the city, at their caſe, fat and fair, and all manner of neceſſaries provided them to their hand; ſo that they had nothing more to do, but now and then upon occaſion, to encounter the publick enemy. And what if I ſhould ſay now that they fail'd in that too? For they went over in frequent deſertions, not only here and there one, but in whole troops together ſometimes; who contrary to law and duty, and the common obligation of citizens and ſoldiers, deliver'd themſelves up with their arms tamely to the enemy. Can any body ſay the ſame thing of us now? I cannot call to mind above two or three at moſt of our people, that ever betray'd their cauſe for fear of death. I do not ſpeak of a ſoldier's death with his ſword in his hand, and in the field of battle, but of a death of exquiſite cruelty and torment; a miſery that many of our people have been expos'd to; not out of a bloody malice, as I verily perſuade myſelf, but to try the experiment of ſo heroical a conſtancy, and to ſee if there be any ſuch men in the world, as will rather be torn to pieces, than be guilty of any one word or action derogatory to the dignity of their laws.

The Jews ſtand all trials.

Now this conſtancy of the Jews above all other nations is no great wonder neither; for the very ordinary way of our living would be a kind of ſeverity to any other ſort of people: That is to ſay, in the fatigues of labour, hard fare, days of indiſpenſible abſtinence and reſt, coarſe lodging, cloathing, and the like. I would fain know now how theſe people, in the heat and freedom of a military life, would behave themſelves at the ſame time in the forbearance of forbidden meats, and in the caſe of other reſtrictions? Whereas the thing that we glory in is, the giving of ourſelves up to an unchangable conſtancy and reſignation, in obedience to our laws and duties.

The ſeverity of the Jewiſh diſcipline.

Wherefore let the Lyſimachus's, and the Molons, and all that ſcribbling crew of cenſorious pretenders, and perverters of youth; let them all go on, I ſay, in their uncharitable way of repreſenting us for the worſt of men.

It is not our buſineſs to traduce other people's laws, but to keep ſteaddy to our own. Nay, ſuch was the tenderneſs of our gentle law-

Moſes makes a conſcience of irreverence, even towards falſe gods.

law-giver, that he would not ſuffer ſo much as the leaſt indignity or contempt to be put upon the reputed gods of other nations: and this he did, out of a reverence to the very name of a deity. But it will not become us yet to be altogether ſilent, in a caſe where it is both ſo eaſy, and ſo neceſſary, to ſtop the mouths of our adverſaries; and where, in truth, the work is done by other authorities ready to our hands. As for inſtance. Where is that wiſe man among the Greeks, that does not heartily exclaim even againſt the moſt celebrated of their poets, and eſpecially their law-givers, for poiſoning the common people with the impious doctrine of a plurality of Gods, and advancing the account to what number they think fit, and deriving their original from what age and country they pleaſe: nay, and allotting them their proper ſtations and places like other creatures? as they have their ſubterranean gods, their ſea-gods, and ſome of the eldeſt of the race, or family, they keep up chain'd in hell. As for their celeſtial gods, they give Jupiter ('tis true) the name of father, but with the heart and practice of a tyrant: inſomuch that his wife, his brother, and the daughter of his own brain, enter'd into a conſpiracy, according to the fiction, to deſtroy him, as he himſelf had ſerv'd his father. This was the value, in fine, that all wiſe men had of theſe fabulous deities; the fancy being ſo ridiculous, that they could not ſo much as think of it without ſcorn and deriſion. Some of their gods they make to be ſtriplings, others in the prime of their youth and ſtrength, and others again they repreſent to be grave ſeniors with long beards. They have their gods likewiſe (or patrons) of mechanical arts and trades; as ſmiths, weavers, &c. pilgrims, champions, harpers, archers. They have their feuds and factions alſo among themſelves, and ſide with mortals againſt one another. They receive wounds in the quarrel, grieve and pine away under the anguiſh of them. Nay, theſe pretended gods and goddeſſes go farther yet ſtill, even to the horrible licence of amours, and embraces, indifferently with men and women. And what's the caſe of their almighty Jupiter himſelf, the father, as they call him, and the prince of their whole train of gods! but after the whoring and corrupting of his miſtreſſes, he has not the power at laſt to ſave either them or their baſtards; but, with an aking heart, he ſees them all ruin'd before his face, becauſe the Fates will have it ſo?

The Greeks fabulous deities.

WHAT a train have we here of lewd and execrable debauches, and of worſe conſequences in probability yet to come! adulterers in heaven, open and barefac'd; and not only committed by the gods, but by them alſo celebrated and proclaim'd, to the degree of envying the proſtitutes. Now if their ſovereign lord of heaven and earth, Jupiter himſelf, could not hold out againſt the charms of a laſcivious ſtrumpet, what are we to expect from the paſſions and weakneſſes of other ſubordinate and inferior deities? and what ſhall we ſay again of god's turn'd into ſhepherds, and maſons, and made cloſe priſoners in hell? of gods in liveries, and ſerving-men for wages? can any man endued with common ſenſe and reaſon, do leſs than abhor and deſpiſe the inventors, the encouragers, and the believers of theſe blaſphemous ſtories? in ſome caſes again, they make gods of their paſſions, as frights, fears, and the like; and then worſhip them in the worſt of forms; ſo that there can be nothing ſo ſcandalous among men, but may do well enough in the character of one of their gods. And yet all this is not ſufficient to deter the people from ſacrificing to the more tolerable ſort of theſe monſters. But they look upon their gods as the authors of good and evil, and conſequently as their friends, or their enemies, in proportion to the one or the other. Upon this conſideration they do by their deities as with ill-natur'd men; they worſhip and endeavour to appeaſe them with preſents, for fear they ſhould hurt them.

BUT how comes mankind all this while to labour under ſo many deſperate and dangerous miſtakes concerning God? unleſs either from the law-giver's ignorance of the divine nature from the beginning, or elſe for want of communicating to the world the notions they had of things, as matters of little moment perhaps in their opinions; and ſo left the poets and the orators betwixt them to make gods after their own wild and extravagant imaginations; and by this means confounding their politicks, with idle tales and amuſements of uncouth deities and ſtrange worſhip.

The ground of ſo many groſs miſtakes concerning God.

PAINTERS and ſtatuaries contributed alſo in a great meaſure to this abuſe, by the liberty the Greeks took in dreſſing up their gods in what ſhape and figure the workman pleas'd, every man according to his particular fancy. And they had their varieties for matter alſo as well as for form; ſome working in plaiſter, others (of the better ſort) in gold and ivory, ſome in ſculpture, others in colours: and the laſt piece, for novelty's ſake, was ſtill reputed the beſt. As the old gods fell off, and went out of faſhion, they were ſucceeded inſenſibly by new; and upon the failing of one religion, another ſtarted up. It was the ſame thing with their temples too; as one was laid in rubbiſh, another was rais'd out of the ruins of it, according to the humour of the preſent age; whereas the worſhip of God ought to be as unchangeable as God himſelf.

Painters and ſtatuaries create deities.

A divine worſhip is as unchangeable as God himſelf.

WE may reckon Apollonius Molon in the number of the overweaning fools. But for thoſe among the Greeks that deſerve the name of philoſophers, they are no ſtrangers to the truth of what I have deliver'd; but entertain the ſame reverent thoughts of God that we do, and with as ſenſible a contempt for the fables and fooleries on the other hand, as they ought to have. It was not for nothing that Plato would ſuffer no poets in his common-wealth: nay, he diſcharg'd Homer himſelf too, tho' with all the honours of a poet laureat, for fear the fabulous religion ſhould deſtroy the true. This great man of all others comes the neareſt to the example of Moſes, in the model of his common-wealth; where he charges all his ſubjects to ſtudy their laws, and to get them by heart, and not to intermingle cuſtoms with ſtrangers; but to preſerve their government in its original purity, and to pay a ſtrict obedience to their ordinances and decrees.

The Greek ſages had the ſame veneration for a deity with the Jews themſelves.

Plato's common-wealth in ſome ſort after the model of Moſes's.

APOLLONIUS Molon never thought of this, when he fell ſo heavily upon the Jews, for not admitting men to a participation in the myſteries of their religion, who were of a differing way and perſuaſion, as if this were our caſe alone; whereas all people (generally ſpeaking) do the ſame thing; the Greeks themſelves, and the ſobereſt men of the party too.

The Lacedemonians admit no ſtrangers.

The Lacedemonians, we ſee, would neither ſuffer a mixture of ſtrangers among them, nor ſo much as their own citizens to travel abroad, for fear of contracting ill habits either way, and degenerating into a liking of ill cuſtoms and manners. Now this was a ſeverity liable enough to a cenſure, to debar them the common privileges of ſociety and commerce: but ſo far are we from this unmerciful rigour, that, tho' we do not thruſt ourſelves into other people's matters, we are yet ready and open to entertain all proſelytes, and to receive thoſe that have a mind to join with us; which muſt not be deny'd to be a generous and a charitable diſpoſition.

The Athenians open to all proſelytes. The Athenians make it death to act or ſpeak againſt their religion

But to paſs now from the Lacedemonians to the Athenians; they, on the other hand, make it their glory to give admittance to all ſtrangers: but this was more, I ſuppoſe, than Apollonius was aware of. The Athenians were ſo inexorably zealous for the honour of their gods, that it was made capital to let fall ſo much as one irreverent word upon that ſubject. What was it that Socrates dy'd for? not for betraying the common-wealth, or burning their temples; not for treaſon or ſacrilege; but for framing new oaths by the direction, as he ſuggeſted, of a divine ſpirit. Whether this was jeſt or earneſt, it remains a ſecret to this day: but for this it was however that Socrates was try'd, condemn'd, and put to death by poiſon. He was likewiſe charg'd for infuſing falſe doctrines into the heads of the people, and endeavouring to ſupplant the religion and the laws of his country. This was the end, in fine, of Socrates, a citizen of Athens.

I ſhall now produce another inſtance of Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, who was put to death for affirming the Athenians god, the ſun, to be only a red-hot ſtone. And then there was a * talent offer'd by proclamation to any man that ſhould bring in the head of Diagoras the Melian for ridiculing the myſteries of their religion. And they would have gone the ſame way to work with Protagoras too, if he had not gotten away in time. His pretended crime was the writing of a tract, wherein he delivers himſelf doubtfully of the Athenian gods. But what wonder is it to ſee men treated at this barbarous rate, where even the women themſelves found no better quarter. As for example; did they not put a prieſteſs to death, upon an accuſation of worſhipping ſtrange gods? and was it not made death alſo for any man to introduce a foreign religion? what can be more evident now, than that, ſo far as theſe laws were in credit, the people thought the gods of other nations falſe, and unfit to be believed: for if they had not, they would never have barr'd themſelves the comfort and benefit of their favour.

Nay, the Scythians themſelves, tho' the moſt blood-thirſty people upon the face of the earth, and ſcarce one degree above brutes, made ſo great a ſcruple yet of preſerving the myſteries of their profeſſion, that they butcher'd the famous Anacharſis, only for ſpeaking too reverently of the Grecian gods. We read likewiſe of ſeveral of the Perſians that ſuffer'd death upon the ſame account. Now for Apollonius Molon, he was a known friend to the Perſian laws, and one that had them in admiration as well as the Greeks, for their firmneſs and agreement in the matter of worſhip (I ſpeak of their conſtancy upon the burning of their temples,) yet Molon had not only a good opinion of their ways, but was alſo in ſome ſort an imitator of them, in the extravagant liberties he took of abuſing other men's wives, and putting out the eyes of their children: inhumanities that are declar'd death without mercy by our laws, tho' committed but upon irrational creatures.

The barbarous Scythians themſelves have a tenderneſs for laws and cuſtoms.

The conſtancy of the Jews, and the grounds of it.

Such is the veneration we have, in ſhort, for the obſervance of theſe laws, that neither power, profit, fear, or any other conſideration under the Sun, can ever divert, or deter us from the conſcientious diſcharge of our duty. And we do not put ourſelves upon theſe hazards and experiments, in a proſpect of picking a quarrel, and making an advantage of it, but for the ſupport and maintenance of our lawful rights. We have ſubmitted to all other ſorts of outrage, with patience and reſignation; but whoever offers to force us to a tranſgreſſion of our laws, touches us to the quick: in which caſe the ſenſe of that oppreſſion hath made us daring and obſtinate to the laſt degree. But what have we to do to envy the laws of other nations, which we ſee abandon'd by the very founders of them? What have the Lacedemonians to ſay for themſelves in excuſe of their hard-hearted inhoſpitality, and the liberties they take in an unmarry'd life? and ſo for the people of Elis, and Thebes, in the impudence of their prepoſterous and unnatural luſts? a practice that a ſhameleſs connivance hath almoſt turn'd into a legal allowance: and it hath ſo far prevail'd among the Greeks alſo, that they have intitled their very gods to the abuſe; who, in the heat of an unbridled appetite, married, and coupled with their own ſiſters, and compounded for the tranſgreſſion.

The practices of lewd law-givers.

What ſhall we think of thoſe law-givers now, that take more pains to ſave the criminals than to puniſh them; by commuting for a pecuniary mulct in the caſe of adultery, and atoning for fornication by marrying the abuſed virgin? It would be endleſs to ſum up all the deſperate temptations, to the renouncing of piety and virtue, that are thrown out to unwary people, in theſe compoſitions and expedients, even to the total ſubverſion of their laws: nay, the reſolution is often taken beforehand of trampling all that is ſacred under foot. But this can never be ſaid of us, whom neither diſtance, abſence, tyranny, nor death

* As there were two Attick talents, which was here meant is not very certain: the leſs weighed fifty ſeven pounds ſeven penny weight and twelve grains, and its value in ſilver amounted to one hundred ſeventy one pounds one ſhilling and tenpence halfpenny, and in gold to two thouſand ſeven hundred thirty ſeven pounds ten ſhillings. The greater weighed ſeventy ſix pounds ten penny-weight, and its value in ſilver amounted to two hundred twenty eight pounds two ſhillings and ſixpence, and in gold to three thouſand ſix hundred and fifty pounds of Engliſh money. Was to be indulged the liberty of gueſſing, I ſhou'd think it moſt probable to ſuppoſe that the greater ſilver talent is here underſtood.

itſelf, the ſaving of life, liberty, or fortune could ever remove from the rule of our obligation. Now if it be for the intrinſick excellency of our laws, that our hearts are ſo ſet upon them, it muſt be granted, that our affections are well plac'd, and that the laws themſelves anſwer the end they were made for: but if it ſhall be ſaid, that they are void of all goodneſs, how much more to blame are they who pretend to have better laws of their own, and will not maintain them?

The antiquity of a law proves the goodneſs of it.

BUT time tries all things, and no ſuch proof of the goodneſs of a law as the antiquity of it. So that we ſhall caſt the cauſe upon that iſſue, for the honour both of our law-giver, and of the laws themſelves, with a regard to God's holy worſhip. It will be granted us beyond all controverſy, that Moſes was the firſt law-giver we read of, by many ages; and that as our laws were deliver'd from heaven by him, ſo they were follow'd and imitated, more or leſs, by all other nations. The ancient Greeks, as to the generality of them, had in appearance, I muſt confeſs, laws peculiar to themſelves; but their philoſophers had all this while the very ſame perſuaſion of God that we have, and inculcated the ſame doctrines of life and manners.

All nations imitate the Jews, more or leſs.

NAY, ſuch is the reputation we have a long time had in the world, for our piety and good government, that there is hardly any nation, either Greek, or Barbarian, that does not live in ſome ſort of conformity to our example; either in the obſervance of our ſeventh day's ſabbath, the uſe of lamps, the celebration of faſts, abſtinence from ſuch and ſuch certain meats; and ſo in matter of humanity, charitable agreement and ſociety, indefatigable labour and induſtry, and an invincible conſtancy in ſuffering for the truth. In all theſe obſervations, I ſay, they do but write after our copy.

BUT the moſt wonderful thing of all is yet to come: that is to ſay, how this ſingle body of laws ſhould of itſelf work ſo powerfully upon all mankind, without any other authority for the putting of it in execution, and influencing mens minds, in ſome proportion, as the Almighty influences the univerſe. Now whoſoever looks but into his own country, or into his own family, will find all this to be true that I have ſaid.

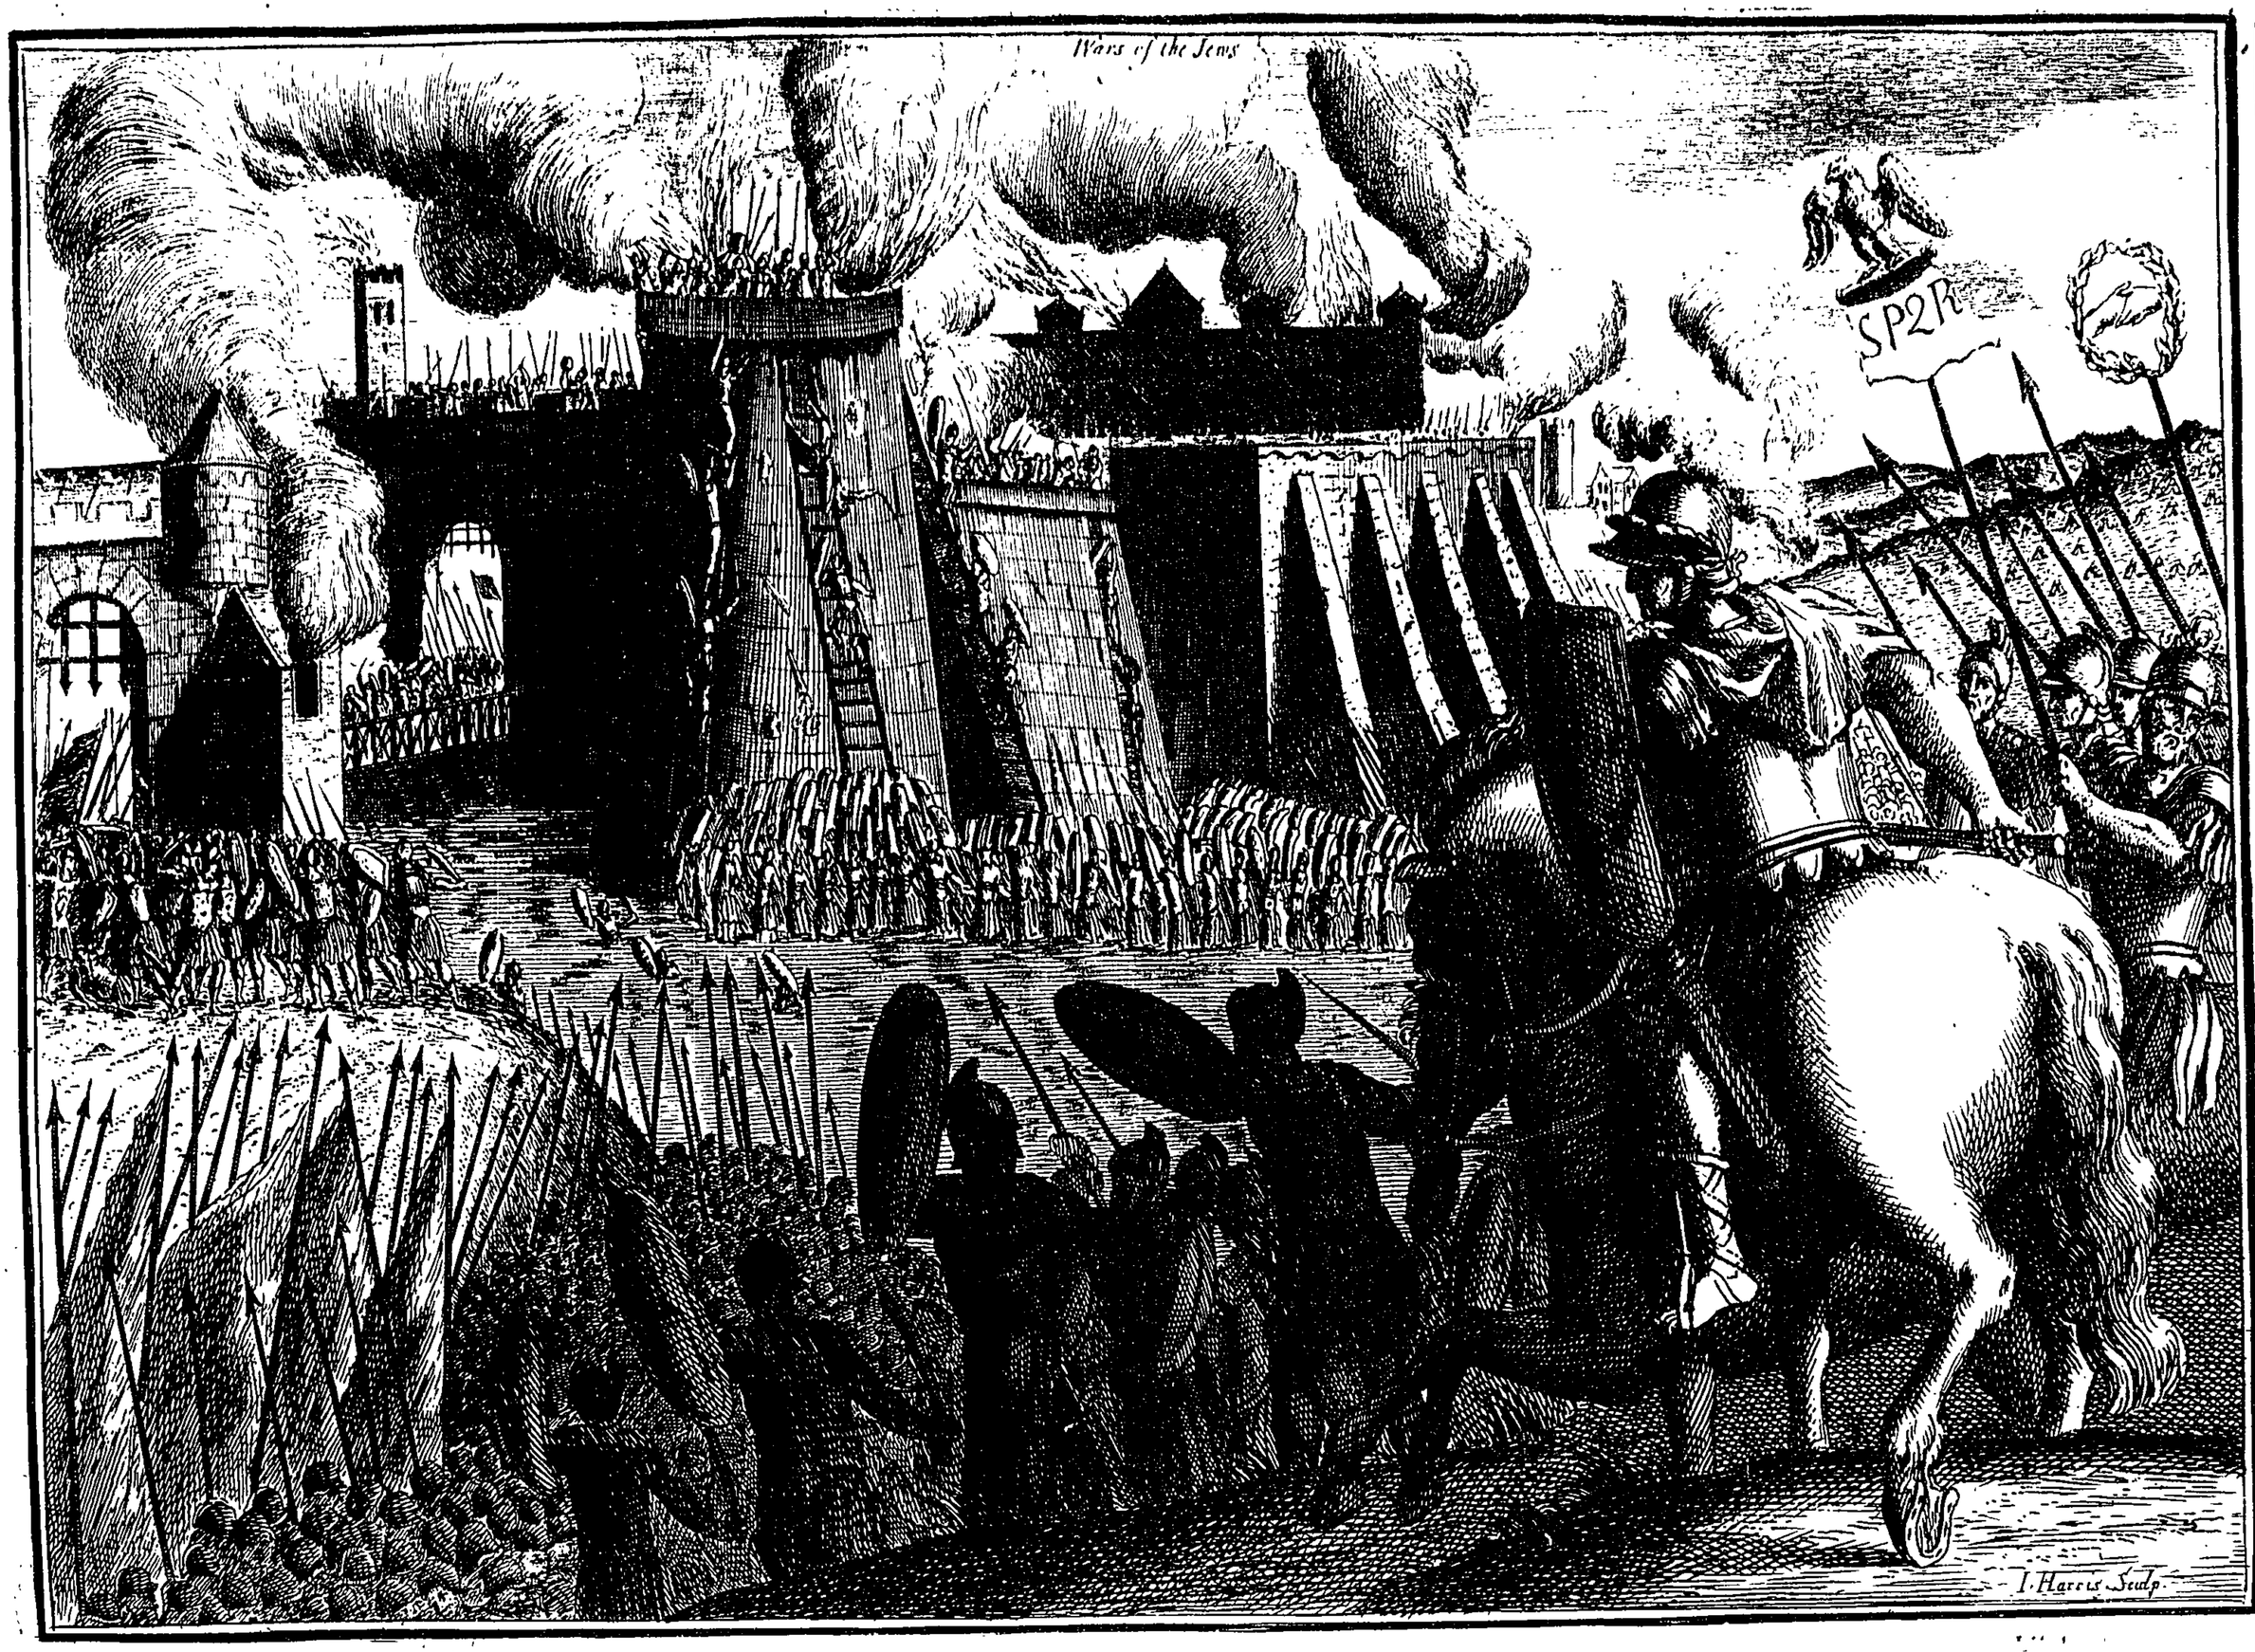
WILL any man, that does not hate us, adviſe us now to change our old laws for new ones; and the better for the worſe too? or if it be otherwiſe, let the people give over reproaching us. We do not eſpouſe this cauſe out of ill-will to any man, but out of the veneration we have for the memory of our prophet, and in a full perſuaſion that God himſelf ſpeaks to us by the mouth of Moſes. Or make it the caſe now, that we did not ſufficiently underſtand the value of our own laws, purely upon their own account; the mighty number of profeſſors and admirers, would be enough to give us a high eſteem of them. I have handled this ſubject more at large in my antiquities, being forc'd upon what I have ſaid at preſent, by a kind of neceſſity, for the vindication of truth againſt calumny and injuſtice, without any deſign of advancing our own credit upon the diſparagement of others.

The Jews no upſtarts.

Several malicious ſcandals diſprov'd.

To draw towards a concluſion, I reckon now that I have been as good as my word to every point of my undertaking; for I have abundantly prov'd the antiquity of a people that were calumniated for upſtarts, and I have likewiſe produc'd ſeveral eminent authorities, that make honourable mention of us in their annals. They will have it that our anceſtors came originally out of Egypt, which I have undeniably diſprov'd. They have trump'd up another ſtory of our being expell'd Egypt for corporal maladies and contagious diſtempers: whereas I have made it evident, on the other hand, that they cut out their way through the troops of their enemies into their own country. There are others again, who repreſent Moſes for one of the worſt of men, in contradiction to the concurrent teſtimonies of ſeveral ages to his immortal honour.

The deſign and intent of the Jewiſh laws.



AS to the vindication of our laws from ſcandalous tongues, there needs no more to convince any man of the piety and wiſdom of them, than barely to read and underſtand them. Theſe laws are in the firſt place declared enemies to iniquity and luxury, and promoters of peace, charity, induſtry and juſtice. They allow of no war, either to ſatisfy ambition or avarice: neither do they approve of returning evil for evil. They encourage boldneſs and reſolution in the common defence. They precaution people againſt being circumvented with fair and falſe pretences; and teach men to make their actions ſpeak more than their words.

UPON theſe conſiderations, I may with confidence affirm, that we have the beſt laws under the ſun. For what is there in nature preferable to an inviolable piety? what more agreeable and beneficial than union in proſperity, and a true friendſhip in adverſity? an intrepid bravery in the hazards of war, a ſedulous application to arts and husbandry in times of peace; and finally, whatever we do, or whereſoever we are, to have it conſtantly in our minds that an all-ſeeing God overlooks us, and a divine Providence governs all things? Now if theſe things were either written elſewhere, or lodg'd in other hands before they came to us, we are to acknowledge the ſame obligation to them, who had them firſt in poſſeſſion, that the pupil owes to his tutor. But if they were never ſeen or heard of any where elſe before, and if from generation to generation, for a long ſeries of ages, we have made them conſtantly the preciſe rule of our practice and profeſſion (as we have moſt certainly done) let the Apions and the Molons, and all ſuch as delight in the inventing and ſpreading of lies and detraction, ſay and do their worſt; I have my end in the account I have given to you, generous Epaphroditus, and other curious inquiſitors into the truth of our ſtory, for whoſe ſatisfaction chiefly theſe books in defence of our antiquity were written.

PREFACE

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

TO THE

Wars of the JEWS.

OF all the wars that were ever ſeen or heard of in this or former ages, whether national or civil, that of the Jews with the Romans, was undoubtedly the moſt conſiderable; and there are ſeveral pretenders to the writing of the ſtory. Some take up their materials barely upon truſt, and hear-ſay, without any knowledge at all of the matter in queſtion. And there are ſome again, who were eye-witneſſes, that ſtifle and diſguiſe the evident truth of things with partial reports and falſe gloſſes, more like orators than hiſtorians, in favour of the one ſide, or the other, as the faction ſtands affected, without any regard to the good faith or reputation of the work.

No war like that of the Jews with the Romans. Several men write with ſeveral ends.

UPON this conſideration, I Joſeph the ſon of Matthias, an Hebrew born, and a prieſt of Jeruſalem, have now enter'd into a deſign of turning that narration into Greek, for the common benefit of the ſubjects of the Roman empire, which I formerly communicated in my mother-tongue to Barbarians, for their better information: And I ſhall give farther to underſtand, that, in the beginning of the war, I firſt bore arms for the Jews againſt the Romans, and during the whole of it, was conſtrained of neceſſity to be preſent as eye-witneſs, being detained priſoner in the Roman camp, while all the remaining part of it was tranſacted.

This work originally in Hebrew. Joſephus a party in the war.

THIS terrible war broke out at a juncture, when the Romans were all embroil'd among themſelves: And the Jews, being ſtrong, rich, and ſeditious, wanted neither men, money, nor reſolution, to improve the opportunity; which they inflam'd into ſo deſperate a tumult, that they did not only flatter themſelves with the hope of carrying all before them, but at the ſame time ſtruck whole nations in the eaſt with an apprehenſion of being totally over-run: For the Jews, as well thoſe beyond Euphrates, as the reſt, were all determined unanimouſly to riſe as one man. The Gauls were alſo in motion upon the borders of Italy, the Germans unquiet; and in one word, every place in commotion, and things in confuſion every where upon the death of Nero: Some ſetting up for the empire itſelf, others for making their fortunes by a change of government, the ſoldiery as well as the reſt, and all bent upon innovations.

The ſtate of things when the war broke out.

Joſephus bound in honour and conſcience to write the hiſtory.

IN this ſtate of affairs, I thought it a duty neceſſary and incumbent upon me to vindicate ſo many important truths from impoſture and miſtake; and after having inſtructed the Parthians, the Babylonians, the moſt remote of the Arabians, the Jews on the other ſide of the Euphrates, and the Adiabeni, in a juſt account of the riſe, progreſs, and event of the war, not to ſuffer the Greeks, and ſo many of the Romans, who were unconcerned in the action, to be impoſed upon, by flatteries and fictions, and to continue wholly ignorant upon the main.

The partiality of hiſtorians.

BUT with what face ſhall people cry up that for hiſtory, which has neither ſenſe nor connexion in it, not ſo much as one ſyllable, (in my opinion) that makes for their purpoſe? As if they could not do honour ſufficient to the Romans, without vilifying the Jews. Now I do not underſtand how glory can be attained by triumphing over a weak adverſary. Why were they not aſhamed rather of being ſo long about it, conſidering the mighty power of the Romans, with the fame and conduct of their generals? Which is all leſſen'd, if, upon the gaining of their point, they derogate from the bravery and reſolution of thoſe they have overcome.

The braver the enemy, the more glorious is the victory.

FAR be it from me at laſt to enlarge upon the exploits of the Jews, as others do upon the Romans; for the thing I pretend, is to do right indifferently to both parties; without adding or diminiſhing; to give a true and faithful narrative of what I know and can prove to be facts, and to content myſelf in the indulgence now and then of an affectionate and tender affliction for the deplorable calamities and deſtruction of my country: But we were ruined by our own diviſions; and then for the burning of the holy temple, it was the tyranny of our own governours which forc'd the Romans, very much againſt their wills, upon that extremity. Witneſs Titus Ceſar himſelf, under whoſe command it was deſtroy'd: How did he compaſſionate us all along, when he ſaw how we were torn to pieces by inteſtine factions! Even to the degree of ſuſpending the final deſtruction of the city, when he had it in his power to have laid it in aſhes out of hand: And all this on purpoſe to give the authors of the war time to bethink themſelves better, and repent of the folly of their undertakings. If it ſhall be objected, that, in this paſſion and bitterneſs of mine againſt the oppreſſors and ſpoilers of my country, I have tranſgreſs'd the laws and bounds of an hiſtorian, I have nothing to offer, but the impotency of an ungovernable ſorrow in my excuſe. For of all the places that ever fell under the dominion of the Roman empire, Jeruſalem was undoubtedly the city that had the greateſt ſhare in both extremes, by turns, of glory and miſery: From the creation of the world, in fine, to this very inſtant, never were any people reduced to ſuch a tranſcendant pitch of miſery as the Jews were. And, for a farther aggravation of the calamity, we ourſelves were our own executioners, which makes the caſe yet more inconſolable. Now if any man ſhall think me too ſenſibly affected in ſo deplorable a ſtate of things, let him diſtinguiſh betwixt the tragical circumſtances of the ſtory, and the good-natur'd infirmities of the author.

The generoſity of Titus toward the Jews.

The glory and miſery of Jeruſalem by turns.

The Greeks no friends to the Jews.

UPON this occaſion, I cannot but blame and wonder at ſeveral eloquent men among the Greeks, to ſee them only by-ſtanders and eye-witneſſes of ſo remarkable a revolution for war and military actions, in compariſon of which the wars of former ages were but mere trifles, without concerning themſelves in any memorials of the hiſtory: Nay, (which is worſe) and derogating at the ſame time from the ability of others, who were willing to perform that office, whom, tho' they may excel in capacity and talent, they abundantly fall ſhort of in choice of a ſubject and laudable deſign. And yet theſe cenſorious criticks can take upon them at the ſame time to compile hiſtories of the Medes and Aſſyrians, though done already to their hands by antient writers, to whom they are as much inferior for ſtile and matter, as for deſign. But their way of writing was to relate what they had ſeen, ſpeak upon knowledge, and to be as good as their words, without laying themſelves open to the ſcandal of a contradiction, by any diſguiſe or falſe ſuggeſtion whatſoever. It is the part of a faithful and a judicious hiſtorian, to furniſh himſelf with materials that are new and not common, and ſo to tranſmit the memorials of his own time down to poſterity. Now that man cannot properly be ſaid to be a man of ſkill and induſtry, who only tranſpoſes like a plagiary the order and diſpoſition of another man's writings; but he rather who obliges the world with an entire body of hiſtory, that's all new, and his own. It has coſt me (being a ſtranger) a great deal of money and labour, to furniſh both Greeks and Romans with a memorial of tranſactions worthy to be known. But for the Greeks themſelves, tho' their mouths are open enough either upon the ſubject of controverſy or profit, yet in the matter of hiſtory, which requires truth and pains, they are all as mute as fiſhes; leaving it to a company of pitiful ſcriblers, who underſtand nothing at all, to m anage the province of hiſtorians, and communicate to the world the lives and actions of prin ces. But the good faith of hiſtory is never the leſs venerable with us, tho' the Greeks undervalue it.

The duty of a faithful hiſtorian.

I MIGHT give you an account here of the original of the Jews; who they were, how they came to leave Egypt, what countries they paſs'd thorugh in their wandrings, where they inhabited, how long and how often, and when and whither they went from thence: But at this time, and in this place, it would be both ſuperfluous and unſeaſonable; in regard that the ſtory has been ſo faithfully deliver'd over and over already, by ſeveral of our own people, and as candidly tranſlated by ſome of the Greeks into their own tongue. I ſhall begin my hiſtory where their writers and our prophets left off. As to the conduct of the war, which I was an eye-witneſs of, I ſhall be as copious and particular as is poſſible; but for what paſs'd before my time, I ſhall be more ſhort and general.

Joſephus's method and deſign.

THE method I propoſe to myſelf, ſhall be to ſet forth how Antiochus, ſirnamed Epiphanes, after the conquering of Jeruſalem, and keeping poſſeſſion of it for three years and an half, came to be driven out by the ſons of Aſamoneus; and afterwards, upon a conteſt betwixt the ſucceſſors who ſhould govern, how the Romans, under the command of Pompey, made their advantage of that diviſion; and how Herod, the ſon of Antipater, by the help of Soſius the general, put an end to the power of the Aſamonean line.

An hiſtorical abſtract of the war.

IN the next place, how after the death of Herod, and under the reign of Auguſtus, there happen'd a popular revolt of the Jews from the Romans; Quintilius Varus being at that time governour of Judea. I ſhall likewiſe treat of the war that broke out in the twelfth of Nero, and what paſs'd under the command of Ceſtius, with the notable exploits of the Jews upon their firſt entering into arms.

THEIR fortifying the borders upon the diſaſters of Ceſtius, and Nero's putting Veſpaſian at the head of the army for fear of the main chance; how this general, with his eldeſt ſon, enter'd into Judea with a powerful army of Romans; the defeat of a body of auxiliaries that were ſcatter'd all over Galilee, with the number of the ſlain; how he took ſome of their towns by force, while others ſurrender'd. I ſhall deliver nothing, in fine, but what I know to be true upon ſight, and certain knowledge: With a reſpect to the Roman management of the war, their government and diſcipline, the bounds and content of both Galilees, the condition and limits of Judea, the particular quality of the ſoil, the lakes and fountains, what towns were taken, and the miſeries they endur'd by fire and ſword. I ſhall do all this, without ſuppreſſing any part of my own misfortunes; wherein I doubt not of being believ'd, for I write to thoſe who know I ſpeak the truth.

MY next point will be, to ſhew how the tidings of Nero's death coming to Veſpaſian, juſt as he was ready to take Jeruſalem by ſtorm (the Jews at that time being reduced to a very weak condition) the affairs of the empire diverted him, and call'd him away to Rome. I ſhall take notice alſo of the preſages he had of his future greatneſs, the changes he found there, and the ſoldiery declaring him emperor, even againſt his will.

How

How upon his going into Egypt, to give neceſſary orders for ſettling of the commonwealth there, the Jews broke out into inteſtine feuds; the ſlavery they endur'd under tyrannical oppreſſors, and the fierce animoſities one amongſt another; how Titus, upon his return out of Egypt, made two inroads into Judea; how he levy'd an army, where he drew them up, and in what form of battle.

How many deſperate commotions he ſaw in Jeruſalem with his own eyes; the number of his approaches, the ſtrength and vaſt bigneſs of his works, the compaſs and the thickneſs of the three walls, the fortifications of the city, as alſo of the temple, the figure and the dimenſions of the altar: All this ſhall be exactly and faithfully related. And ſo for our ſolemn feſtivals, and the ceremonies which attend them; the ſeven ſorts of purification, the offices of the prieſtly function, the ſacerdotal robes, and all that is ſacred belonging to the holy temple. Nothing of this ſhall be either alter'd or omitted; but an exact and punctual account of it given, without making it either more or leſs.

I shall then come to the cruelty of our own governours towards thoſe of their own tribe and profeſſion, and the humanity of the Romans, even towards ſtrangers; and ſhew how often, and how generouſly Titus, out of an honourable deſire to ſave both the temple and the city, preſs'd and invited the Jews to come to an agreement among themſelves. I ſhall enlarge alſo upon the ſufferings and calamities of the people, and the variety of afflictions they labour'd under; one while by war, another while by ſedition, and then again by famine, till in the end they were made priſoners: Neither ſhall I paſs over the deſtruction of the fugitives, or the torments inflicted upon thoſe who were taken priſoners.

Jeruſalem taken, and the temple burnt.

Nor ſhall I forget the conflagration of the temple, againſt the very will and liking of Ceſar himſelf: The ſacred treaſure of all ſorts that was there conſum'd, the remainder of the city laid wholly in aſhes, the prodigies and portents that preceded the captivating of our tyrannical maſters, and the ſlavery of the people that were carry'd away, with an account of their reſpective adventures; the eager purſuit of the Romans after thoſe who eſcap'd the dint of the war; and the razing of the retreats and habitations of the conquer'd down to the very ground. I ſhall ſay ſomewhat likewiſe of Titus's progreſs through the country, to put things in ſome ſort of order again; and then of his return into Italy, and of his triumph.

These are the heads of the ſeven following books, which I have written for the ſake of truth, not diverſion; in confidence, that no man who knows any thing of the matter, or was preſent at the war, will blame me for it: And for the order of the work, I ſhall only refer the reader to the chapters.

CHAP. I.

Antiochus and Ptolemy contend for the ſovereignty of Syria. Antiochus enters Judea, and takes Jeruſalem. A cruel perſecutor of the Jews, and Bacchides as bad. Matthias kills Bacchides. Judas gets the temple, and reſtores God's worſhip. Antiochus dies. Eleazar kill'd by the fall of an elephant. Judas ſlain by the troops of Antiochus.

See Antiquities, lib. 12. cap. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 19.

THE great men of the Jews being divided into factions among themſelves, upon an impulſe of honour, (for men of dignity and power do not naturally love to be ſubjected to their equals) and this happening at a time when there was a conteſt betwixt Antiochus Epiphanes, and Ptolemy the ſixth, concerning the ſovereignty of Syria, Onias, one of the high-prieſts, got the better of it, and drove the ſons of Tobias out of the city; who flying to Antiochus for refuge, earneſtly beſought him with ſupplications, that he would break into Judea, and make uſe of them for guides. The king was eaſily prevailed upon to do the thing his heart was ſet upon before; and ſo he march'd into Judea with a very powerful army, took Jeruſalem itſelf by aſſault, and put a prodigious number of people to the ſword, who were ſuſpected to be favourites of Ptolemy. The pillage in general he gave to the ſoldiers, rifled the temple itſelf, and for three years and a half diſcontinu'd the prayers and ſacrifices which were wont to be offer'd up daily there to Almighty God. The high-prieſt Onias fled to Ptolemy, who gave him leave to build a temple and a city near Heliopolis, after the model of that at Jeruſalem; which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of elſewhere.

Antiochus and Ptolemy competitors. Onias too hard for Tobias.

Antiochus enters Judea, and takes Jeruſalem.

ANTIOCHUS, notwithſtanding he was now become maſter of a ſtrong and wealthy city, of which he had got the poſſeſſion beyond all thought or expectation; his enemies ſlaughtered and humbled at his feet, and their country ravaged and laid deſolate before him; yet all this was not ſufficient to put a ſtop to the courſe of an inſatiable cruelty and ambition: Beſide, the malice he carry'd in his heart for the difficulties he ſuffer'd in the ſiege, prompted him to force the Jews to renounce their laws, rites, and religion of their country. They were no longer to circumciſe their children, nor to offer any ſacrifices upon their altars, but hogs, which the law has expreſly forbidden. This was a barbarity that all good men had a horror for, and whoever diſcover'd but the leaſt reſentment of it, was ſure to die for it. Bacchides had at that time the command of Judea under Antiochus, and the world could not have found him out a fitter inſtrument for his purpoſe; he being a man naturally mercileſs and fierce, and as ready to execute miſchief, as the other could be to command it. It was his common practice to treat men of quality with blows, like ſlaves; and Jeruſalem, in fine, was no other than the image of a city that was taken every day over again. This was his way of proceeding, till the inſupportable inſolence provok'd ſome of the ſufferers to meditate a revenge.

Antiochus a cruel perſecutor of the Jews.

Bacchides as bad.

MATTHIAS the ſon of Aſamoneus, (of Modin) and one of the prieſts, drew out a troop of his own domeſticks, (having five ſons) and arming them with daggers, kill'd Bacchides, and ſo withdrew immediately to the mountains for their ſecurity, out of reach of the gariſons. Great numbers of the people join'd Matthias, till he found himſelf ſtrong enough to venture down into the plain; where he gave Antiochus's generals battle, and beat them out of the country. This ſucceſs gave him ſuch a reputation, that the people, in acknowledgment of their deliverance, choſe him for their general: In which command he dy'd, leaving the government to his eldeſt ſon Judas.

Matthias makes a party, and kills Bacchides.

Now Judas (upon a preſumption that Antiochus would not give it over thus) got a conſiderable body of an army together of his own countrymen; and in the firſt place ſtruck up an alliance with the Romans. Antiochus, upon this, made another incurſion into Judea, where he received a terrible repulſe and defeat. Judas ply'd his advantage, and gave an aſſault to the city-gariſon, being as yet untouch'd. In this action, the ſoldiers were beaten out of the upper city (commonly call'd the holy place) into the lower. Judas being now poſſeſs'd of the temple, purify'd it all over, run a wall about it, and furniſh'd it anew with all ſorts of veſſels for the ſervice of God's worſhip; the other being look'd upon as polluted and prophan'd. He caus'd to be erected alſo another altar, and ſacrifices to be offer'd upon it; but as ſoon as ever religion was reſtor'd, Antiochus dy'd.

Judas gets the temple, and reſtores God's worſhip.

Antiochus dies, and his ſon Antiochus ſucceeds him.

THIS Antiochus was followed by another of the ſame name, the ſucceſſor of his father's enmity to the Jews, as well as of his crown. He put himſelf at the head of an army of fifty thouſand foot, near five thouſand horſe, and eighty elephants; and ſo fell in upon Judea by the way of the mountains. He took the town of Bethſura; and paſſing through a narrow defile, in a place called Beth-zacharias, Judas engag'd him in the paſs, and before the armies could join, his brother Eleazar taking notice of one elephant taller than the reſt, with a great caſtle upon his back, and rich golden trappings, he took it for granted that Antiochus muſt needs be there upon it. In this confidence, he advanc'd upon the enemy, and made his way into their body, up to the elephant; but finding that the perſon upon him, whom he took for the king, was out of his reach, he ſtabb'd the beaſt into the guts, and was cruſh'd to death under the weight of him upon his fall; giving only to underſtand how much a brave man valu'd his honour above his life. But he, it ſeems, that rode this elephant, was only a private man; and if it had been Antiochus himſelf, Eleazar could have got no more by it than the reputation of preferring the glory of an heroical exploit above life. This diſappointment was look'd upon by his brother, as a preſage to the fate of the battle; for though the Jews maintain'd a long and an obſtinate fight, they were yet in the end over-borne by numbers; and after a great loſs of men, Judas with the remainder, retir'd into the Toparchy of Gophnis; but Antiochus march'd directly to Jeruſalem, and, after a few days ſtay, was forc'd to withdraw again for want of neceſſaries, leaving behind him a competent gariſon, and ſending the reſt to take their winter-quarters in Syria.

Eleazar cruſh'd to death by the fall of an elephant.

THE king being now out of the way, Judas was not idle; but taking heart upon the recourſe to him of ſeveral of his own nation, together with thoſe who had eſcap'd out of the late battle, he encounter'd ſome of the troops of Antiochus at a place call'd Adaſa; where he made himſelf ſo ſignal by his conduct and valour, that, being known in the battle, he was oppreſs'd by multitudes, and fell in the action. His brother John did not live many days after him, being inveigled into an ambuſh, and ſlain by the friends of Antiochus.

Judas ſlain by the troops of Antiochus.

CHAP. II.

Jonathan betray'd, and put to death by Tryphon. Simon recovers Judea, and is murder'd by the treachery of Ptolemy. A plot upon John, alias Hyrcanus, but diſappointed. The barbarous cruelty of Ptolemy to the mother and brothers of Hyrcanus. Antiochus lays ſiege to Jeruſalem. Sebaſte deſtroy'd by Ariſtobulus and Antigonus.

JONATHAN ſucceeded his brother as prince of the Jews, and behav'd himſelf with great caution and prudence towards thoſe of his own nation; ſtrengthening his intereſt alſo by making friends of the Romans, and coming to a better underſtanding with the ſon of Antiochus. Nevertheleſs all this was not ſufficient to ſecure him from danger. For the tyrant Tryphon, the tutor of young Antiochus, had recourſe to treachery, and how he might deprive Jonathan of the aſſiſtance of his friends over and above: So that upon Jonathan's coming to Antiochus at Ptolemais, with a ſlender train, Tryphon ſeiz'd him by ſurprize; and when he had him priſoner, march'd with his army againſt Judea, where Simon, the brother of Jonathan, beat him off, and routed him; upon which he went away in a rage, and put Jonathan to death.

See Ant. l. 13. c. 1, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18.

Jonathan betray'd by Tryphon, and put to death.

SIMON went on at the ſame rate of conduct and courage; he took * Gazara, Joppa, and Jamnia, made himſelf maſter alſo of † Accaron, and demoliſh'd it, aſſiſted Antiochus againſt Tryphon, who, before his expedition into Media, laid ſiege to Dora. But ſuch was the avarice of this king, that though Simon had contributed to the death of Tryphon, by the aid he had given him, it was not long after yet, that Antiochus ſent Cendebeus with an army, to lay waſte Judea, and to enſlave Simon himſelf. This prince of the Jews was ſomewhat in years, but manag'd the war however with a ſpirit of youth and vigour. He ſent his ſons before with the beſt of his troops, and went another way with the reſt; and having planted ſeveral ambuſhes up and down about the mountains, he ſucceeded every where, and gain'd a mighty victory: After which, he was declar'd high-prieſt. Thus was Judea deliver'd out of the hands of the Macedonians, after a ſubjection to them of an hundred and ſeventy years.

Simon overthrows Cendebeus, and recovers Judea.

THIS great man was murder'd afterward at a feaſt, by the treaſon of his ſon-in-law Ptolemy, who, having at the ſame time his wife and two of his ſons priſoners, ordered certain of his ſervants, whom he ſent for that purpoſe, to diſpatch John the Third, called alſo by the name of Hyrcanus. The young man, having notice of this deſign upon his perſon, haſtened away to the city, where he had a great many friends; partly out of the reverence they bore to his father's memory, and partly out of the hatred they had to Ptolemy, for his ill conditions. Now Ptolemy would fain have gotten into the city at another gate; but the people, having already taken Hyrcanus into the town, would not admit him. Upon this repulſe, Ptolemy betook himſelf to the caſtle of Dagon beyond Jericho; and Hyrcanus, being at this time poſſeſs'd of the ſacerdotal dignity, in ſucceſſion to his father, ſo ſoon as ever he had ſacrific'd, and diſcharged the duties of his function, he marched away preſently to beſiege Ptolemy in the caſtle, and to ſet his mother and his brothers at liberty.

Simon murder'd by the treachery of Ptolemy his ſon-in-law.

Hyrcanus ſucceeds his father in the pontificate.

HYRCANUS advanced up to the place, and had certainly carry'd it, if his tenderneſs and good nature had not hindred him: For ſtill as Ptolemy found himſelf preſs'd, his mother and his brothers were brought out and expos'd upon the wall for a ſpectacle, with menaces to caſt them down headlong from the battlements, unleſs Hyrcanus drew off that very moment; and thoſe menaces were accompany'd with blows too. Hyrcanus muſt needs be tranſported with rage and indignation at ſo barbarous a treatment; but ſtill the tenderneſs of piety and duty ſoften'd him again, on the other hand: The mother all this while, without any dread either of torments or death, adjuring the ſon to do juſtice upon that monſter, without any regard to what ſhe ſuffered; for to die by the hand of Ptolemy, ſhe ſaid, would be more welcome to her than immortality itſelf; provided only, that ſhe and her family might have juſtice done them upon that inhuman wretch. Hyrcanus, in fine, betwixt the reſolution and the authority of his mother, was prevailed upon to reſume his courage, and to proſecute the aſſault. But finding that ſtill as he repeated the attack on the one ſide, Ptolemy repeated the blows and indignities on the other, his courage failed him, and his very heart was drown'd in ſorrow. Theſe expoſtulatory deliberations continued the ſiege ſo long, that they were now overtaken by the ſeventh year; which with the Jews is a year of reſt, as the ſeventh day is a day of reſt. Ptolemy finding that upon this revolution the ſiege was reſpited, he put both the mother and brothers to death, and then fled to Zeno, otherwiſe called Cotylas, the governor of Philadelphia.

The barbarity of Ptolemy to the mother and brothers of Hyrcanus, whom he afterwards put to death.

ANTIOCHUS bearing an old grudge in his mind, for a defeat Simon had formerly given him, carry'd an army into Judea, with a reſolution to be revenged upon the ſon for the father's ſake; and there ſat down before Jeruſalem, and beſieged Hyrcanus in it. Hyrcanus in this diſtreſs, open'd the ſepulchre of David; (the richeſt prince that ever was,) took upwards of three thouſand talents out of it, and came to a compoſition with Antiochus for * three thouſand talents to raiſe the ſiege. This was the firſt prince of the Jews that ever entertained foreign mercenaries.

Antiochus lays ſiege to Jeruſalem.

And compounds for three thouſand talents to raiſe the ſiege.

ANTIOCHUS having now quitted Jeruſalem, and being upon the march with all his troops into Media, Hyrcanus took his time, and preſently moved towards Syria, upon intelligence that their towns were neither mann'd nor fortified; which he found accordingly to be true. So he took Medaba, and † Samea, Sichem and Garizim, with divers other places thereabouts: He over-ran the country of the Chuthites; a people bordering upon a famous temple erected there, in imitation of that at Jeruſalem. He took likewiſe ‡ Dorion, and Mariſſa, and a great many other towns in Idumea.

HE went afterwards to Samaria, a city rebuilt by king Herod, and now call'd Sebaſte. He begirt the place on all hands, and committed the care of the ſiege to his ſons Ariſtobulus and Antigonus; who brought them to ſuch diſtreſs for want of food, that the people were forced to make ſhift with that which, in truth, was not man's meat. In this extremity, they addreſs'd themſelves to Antiochus (otherwiſe called  Aſpendius) for ſuccour, who come readily to their aſſiſtance, but to his own undoing; for the two brothers gave him a total overthrow, following him upon the purſuit as far as Scythopolis; but in the end he got clear of them. Ariſtobulus and Antigonus returned after this to Samaria, ſhut them up again, took the city, and laid it in rubbiſh, carrying away the inhabitants captives. Every thing ſucceeding thus to their wiſh, the ſoldiers well diſpos'd and chearful, they would not ſuffer the briſkneſs of their tempers to abate; but in that heat marched as far as Scythopolis; where they divided among them the lands about mount Carmel.

Sebaſte deſtroy'd by Ariſtobulus and Antigonus.

The death and character of Hyrcanus king of the Jews, &c. Ariſtobulus ſtarves his mother, and puts his brother Antigonus to death, &c. He falls into a judicial diſtemper upon his brother's death. The miſerable end of Ariſtobulus.

JOHN and his ſons were ſo proſperous in all they undertook, that out of pure ſpite and envy, the nations entered into a conſpiracy againſt them, and would never let them be quiet, till they themſelves were brought to reaſon by an open war. After that deciſion, the remainder of John's life and government was eaſy and happy; and at the end of three and thirty years, he died, leaving five ſons behind him. He was ſo good a man, that never any perſon living had reaſon to complain of him. A ſingular felicity! and he was in poſſeſſion likewiſe, of three other advantages almoſt peculiar to himſelf. He was at the ſame time, a prince, a high-prieſt, and a prophet, receiving his revelations from God himſelf, and ſeldom or never failing in his predictions. As to his two eldeſt ſons, he foreſaw and foretold, that their dominion would not laſt long. It will be worth the while to write the hiſtory of their lives, and to ſhew how ſhort they fell of the reputation and happineſs of their father.

AFTER the death of Hyrcanus, Ariſtobulus, the eldeſt ſon, tranſlated the principality into a monarchy, and, in the firſt place, ſet the crown upon his own head. This was four hundred and eighty one years and three months after the return of the people into Judea from the captivity of Babylon. Ariſtobulus had ſo great a kindneſs for his brother Antigonus, that he made him co-partner with him in the royal dignity; but the reſt of his brethren were taken into cuſtody, and he cauſed his mother to be clap'd up too, for pretending ſome ſort of right to the government, upon a ſuggeſtion that John had left the regency in her hand: Proceeding, in ſhort, to that exceſs of cruelty that he ſtarved her in the very priſon.

Ariſtobulus ſtarves his mother, and puts his brother Antigonus to death.

BUT Ariſtobulus was effectually puniſh'd for theſe unnatural violences, in the loſs of Antigonus, whom he cauſed to be put to death, upon the calumnies of a faction, whoſe buſineſs it was to make him odious. Now Ariſtobulus had ſo great a tenderneſs for his brother, (having made him, as I ſaid, his companion in the government) and ſo good an opinion of him, that it was a conſiderable while before he would believe theſe ſpiteful ſtories, to be any other then forgery and ſlander. But there fell out one time an unlucky accident: Ariſtobulus happen'd to fall ſick during the celebration of the feaſt of tabernacles, and Antigonus, in the mean time, came back from the camp to Jeruſalem in a very ſplendid manner. Toward the end of the ſolemnity, he marched up to the temple in an extraordinary pomp and dreſs, attended with a train of armed men; and the more glorious he appeared, the greater honour (as he intended it) he did his brother; but all this upon an impulſe principally of devotion. The court-paraſites and tale-bearers, went preſently to inſtil evil notions into the king upon this occaſion. "They did not un-
"derſtand this appearance of arms and ſol-
"diers (they ſaid) nor was it for a private man
"to march with troops and guards; neither
"could Antigonus have any honeſt end in this "parade. But the honour of a ſhare in the "government would not ſerve his turn, they
"ſaw, without the whole and abſolute poſ-
"ſeſſion of it, which he intended to gain by "cutting him off."

ARISTOBULUS was ſo far prevailed upon by little and little, though with ſome difficulty, that he bethought himſelf of providing againſt all hazards, without diſcovering any ſort of jealouſy. He lodged at that time in the caſtle of Baris, afterwards call'd Antonia; where he ſent for his guards, and ordered them to wait for Antigonus in a certain dark paſſage under ground there. If he came without arms, they ſhould let him go; but if otherwiſe, they were to kill him upon the place. Ariſtobulus upon this ſends for Antigonus to come to him, but to bring no arms along with him. The queen concerted the plot with the conſpirators artfully enough, by engaging the king's meſſenger not to deliver the right meſſage: but rather to tell Antigonus, that the king heard of a very fine ſuit of armour he had got in Galilee, and being at preſent a little indiſpoſed, he had a great mind to ſee him as ſoon as he could, and that he ſhould come accoutred in thoſe arms. Antigonus (without the leaſt ſuſpicion of his brother's good faith and kindneſs) dreſs'd himſelf in his armour, and made all the haſte he could to ſhew himſelf. But in the blind paſſage before ſpoken of (known by the name of Straton's Tower) the guards fell upon him, and killed him. This inſtance may ſerve for a leſſon to us, that the bonds of nature, equity, and friendſhip, are all cancelled, where the ear is once open'd to pick-thanks and tale-bearers; and that there is no confidence to be put in the profeſs'd affection of court-favourites.

IN this place I muſt not forget a memorable ſtory of one Judas, by ſect an Eſſene; a man famous for divination, and one that was never charged in the way of his profeſſion, either with a falſity or a miſtake. It was his chance to be paſſing by as Antigonus went through the temple, and he cry'd out aloud (upon the ſight of him to ſome of his acquaintance there within hearing, as he had followers and diſciples in abundance.) "Nay then (ſays he)

After theſe reflections upon the preſage, the old man, with a ſadneſs in his countenance that betray'd the anxiety of his heart, ſtood a while muſing and thoughtful; and by and by comes the news of Antigonus's death, in a ſubterranean paſſage, bearing the ſame name alſo of Straton's Tower, with that of Ceſarea upon the ſea coaſt; and this was it that miſled the prophet.

A ſtrange prediction of one Judas, an Eſſene.

THE horrid fact was no ſooner committed, but the conſcience of Ariſtobulus flew in his face, and enflamed his diſtemper: So that betwixt horror of thought, a troubled mind, and the torments of his diſeaſe, his guts burſt, and he fell into a vomiting of blood. One of the ſervants who carry'd it out to throw it away, caſt it, by a moſt remarkable providence, upon the very place where Antigonus was ſlain, and the blood of the murderer fell upon the very ſtains of the blood of the murdered. Some who ſaw and obſerved it, took it to be done on purpoſe; as if it had been intended only for an oblation to the ghoſt of Antigonus. The by-ſtanders gave ſuch a ſhriek upon it, that the king, over hearing it, ſent preſently out to enquire what was the matter; and the more afraid they were of telling it, the more eager was the king to know it: So that in the end, betwixt force and menace, they told him the whole truth of the ſtory. This ſurprize brought tears into the king's eyes; and then fetching a deep ſigh. "Well (ſays he) it

Alexander ſet at liberty, and declared king; but rules tyrannically.

THE widow-queen, after the death of Ariſtobulus, ſet Alexander at liberty, and declared him king. He was the eldeſt ſon, and reputed a prince of moderation: But yet, ſo ſoon as ever he came to the crown, he put one of his brothers to death for aſpiring to the ſovereignty; but the other ſubmitting to live in a private condition, he took him home to himſelf.

Theodore defeats Alexander. Alexander takes Raphia, Gaza, and Anthedon.

AFTER the taking of Aſochis by Ptolemy Lathur the king of Egypt, Alexander gave him battle, and killed a great many of his men; but Ptolemy however got the better of it. Cleopatra, the mother of this prince, forcing him away into Egypt, Alexander took Gadara by ſiege, and Amathus, the faireſt caſtle by much of all beyond Jordan, and the place where Theodore, the ſon of Zeno, had depoſited his treaſure, and all he had that was precious. But Theodore coming upon him before he was aware, did not only recover his own, but took the king's baggage, and cut off near ten thouſand Jews in the battle. Alexander, by the help of ſome enforcements, after this blow, carry'd the war towards the ſea-coaſts, took Raphia, Gaza, and Athedon; which Herod afterwards called Agrippias.

The Jews in a mutiny againſt him.

IT is no new thing, where there are great numbers of people, to have great ſeditions; as at publick meetings, feaſtings, and the like. This was the caſe of the Jews againſt Alexander, in one of their ſolemn feſtivals; and it came to ſuch a height, that it fell little ſhort of a general revolt: So that, in his own defence, he was forced to take ſtrangers into pay; as Piſidians and Cilicians; but for Syrian mercenaries, their natural averſion to the Jews was ſo great, that he durſt not meddle with them. In ſhort, he cut to pieces upwards of eight thouſand of the mutineers, and then made war upon Arabia; where he ſubdued the Galaadites and the Moabites, made them his tributaries, and ſo returned back again to Amathus. By this time, Theodore being frightened away with the reputation of Alexander's ſucceſſes, quitted the place; and the other, finding it without a gariſon, raz'd it to the ground.

Alexander ſubdues the Galaadites and the Moabites. Amathus razed to the ground.

Alexander routed by Obodas.

HIS next adventure was againſt Obodas the king of the Arabians; who lay poſted in the province of Gaulan, the fitteſt place in the world for an ambuſcade. Alexander was there ſurprized, and driven into a deep valley; where his people were cruſhed to death in the defiles by the multitude of camels, to the ruin, in fine, of the whole army; Alexander himſelf eſcaping with much difficulty to Jeruſalem, where he found his old enemies more violent and implacable now than ever, ſince his laſt diſaſter. They gave him a great deal of trouble; but upon all encounters he was ſtill too hard for them: inſomuch, that within the compaſs of ſix years, he deſtroy'd at leaſt fifty thouſand Jews; but he had little joy of theſe victories, where he himſelf was the worſe for them. He betook himſelf, in the end, from arms to reaſoning, and to attempt the ingratiating of himſelf with the people ſome gentler way: But this vanity and inconſtancy of his humour, inſtead of gaining them over, rendered him ſo odious and contemptible, that, upon asking them what he could do in the world to pleaſe them, they told him he muſt die, and try what that would do; for they could hardly pardon him in his grave, for the injuries he had done them in his life-time,

Demetrius aſſiſts the Jews.

THEY called to their aſſiſtance king Demetrius Eucerus; who finding it his intereſt to come over to them, readily comply'd, and advancing with an army, joined the Jews near Sichem. They reckoned in all three thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand foot: And Alexander, with only a thouſand horſe, ſix thouſand mercenary foot, and about ten thouſand well affected Jews, encountred them. The two kings, before they engaged, made a trial what deſerters they could gain over from either party; Demetrius applied himſelf to Alexander's mercenaries, and Alexander, to the Jews that followed Demetrius; in hope of ſucceeding on both ſides, back and forward. But when they ſaw that neither the Jews nor the Greeks were to be wrought upon, they put it to a battle, and Demetrius carried it: Not but that Alexander's mercenaries ſhew'd themſelves men of honour and courage. This did not hinder, however, but that, upon the final event of this action, they ſeemed beyond all expectation to have both the better of it: For ſome of thoſe troops that had ſollicited Demetrius's aſſiſtance, deſerted him, and the compaſſion that ſeveral of the Jews had for their unfortunate king, tranſported ſix thouſand even of thoſe that had fought againſt him, to ſeek him out and join him in the mountains, where he had taken ſanctuary. This turn of humour and fortune, gave Demetrius ſuch a ſurprize, for fear the reſt of the army ſhould follow their example, that he quitted his deſign and withdrew. But theſe deſertions of the auxiliaries had no effect yet upon the multitude; for they maintain'd the war ſtill againſt Alexander, till they were all loſt: One part of them cut off, and the remainder driven in * Bemezel; where they were all made priſoners, and carried to Jeruſalem. But we ſhall now ſee how far the ungovernable rage of an impetuous paſſion will tranſport people, when they come once to abandon the meaſures of honour and virtue. Alexander made a treat for his concubines; and one part of the entertainment, was the ſpectacle of eight hundred priſoners upon the croſs, in the middle of the city; having firſt cut the throats of their wives and children, before their faces. This execrable frightful tragedy was preſented for a diverſion to Alexander and his women, in the height of the debauch: But then it ſtruck the party with ſo aſtoniſhing a terror, that eight thouſand of the inhabitants fled their country next night, and never came back again till after the death of this prince. By theſe ſanguinary methods, he came at laſt, with much ado, to ſettle himſelf and his people in ſome ſort of quiet.

THIS peace of Alexander was not ſo well ſettled, but Antiochus (otherwiſe called Dionyſius) the brother of Demetrius, and the laſt of the race of Seleucus, brought him into freſh trobules. This prince, having overcame the Arabians, put Alexander into ſome aprehenſions for himſelf: ſo that he ran a line, with a deep ditch, with a high wall before it, ſtrengthened with wooden towers of ſome tolerable defence. This line, or retrenchment, was carried all along the mountains near Antipatris to the borders of Joppa. But all this was no obſtruction to the progreſs of Antiochus; for he ſet fire to the towers, filled the ditches, and ſo paſſing over with his army, marched ſtraight away againſt the Arabians; poſtponing his revenge upon Alexander, who would have hindred him, to ſome other more convenient opportunity. Aretas, the Arabian prince, upon the approach of Antiochus, drew his men into ſtrong holds; and then, all on a ſudden, when Antiochus thought himſelf ſafe out of danger, the Arabian fell upon him at unawares with ten thouſand horſe. The fight was obſtinate and bloody; but yet ſo long as Antiochus lived, his men ſtood bravely by him, though the Arabians made a very great ſlaughter. But when Antiochus fell (as he was always the hotteſt in the action) his men turned their backs and fled: ſo that upon the iſſue, betwixt thoſe that were cut off in the fight and upon the purſuit, the army was totally deſtroy'd. Some ſlipt into Cana; where the greater part of them periſhed for want of bread.

THE people of Damaſcus had ſuch a dread and hatred for Ptolemy, the ſon of Menneus, that they entered into a league with Aretas, and made him king of Cele-Syria; who carried the war into Judea, defeated Alexander, and ſo went off again upon conditions.

Aretas and Damaſcus join.

THE king of the Jews, having taken Pella, went and aſſaulted Geraſa and carry'd it, though fortify'd with a triple circumvallation; making himſelf maſter, not only of the place, but of all Theodore's treaſure that was laid up there, both at once. After this, he demoliſhed Gaulan, Seleucia, and a city known by the name of Antiochus's Phalanx; with the ſtrong caſtle of Gamara, over and above. In this place he took priſoner Demetrius the governor, (a man of a moſt infamous character) and ſo return'd to Jeruſalem, where he was receiv'd with joy and acclamations, after a three years proſperous ſucceſs. At the end of the war, he fell into an indiſpoſition by a quartane ague; and, being poſſeſs'd with an opinion that action and ſtirring would do him good, he enter'd into a new and an unſeaſonable war, and ſtruggling beyond his ſtrength, he tir'd himſelf out with the fatigue, and ſo ended his days in a hurry, dying in the twenty ſeventh year of his reign.

Alexander's exploits.

His ſickneſs.

Alexander's death.

THE king left the government to his wife Alexandra, as one that had made herſelf very popular by her moderation and virtue: a woman far from the rigour and hardneſs of her husband, and therefore he made no doubt of the people's ready ſubmiſſion and reſignation to her authority. Neither was Alexander deceiv'd in his opinion, for the reputation of her piety atton'd for the diſadvantages of her ſex: being a woman perfectly well inſtructed in the Jewiſh rites and cuſtoms, and one that had ever given conſtant proof of her zeal for the obſervance of thoſe holy laws. She had, by Alexander, two Sons: the elder, Hyrcanus, and him for his age ſhe advanced to the pontificate. And then, finding him alſo of an unactive temper, and thereby the more manageable, ſhe reckon'd there would be no danger in declaring him king too. But then for Ariſtobulus the younger, being of a more ſprightly and enterprizing ſpirit, ſhe thought it more adviſable to keep him in a private ſtate of life.

He leaves the regency to Alexandra.

And two ſons, Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus. Hyrcanus advanced to the pontificate.

THERE was among the Jews a certain ſect call'd Phariſees, that valued themſelves upon being thought holier than their neighbours, and better skill'd in the law. Alexandra, who was bigotted in her religion, even to the degree of ſuperſtition, had a mighty reverence for theſe holy men, upon the pure account of their pretenſions; and they play'd their game ſo well on the other hand too, by fair appearances and inſinuations, that the powers and privileges of the government were effectually engroſs'd into their hands. If any body was to be put in, or put out; laid in chains, or ſet at liberty; it was to be all as they pleas'd. The honoorable and the profitable commiſſions of the government, they reſerved to themſelves; but the cares, the expences, and the difficulties were left to Alexandra. No creature better underſtood the art of publick management and adminiſtration than herſelf; ſhe made it her buſineſs to advance the militia of the nation to the height; ſhe kept two armies, and a great number of foreign auxiliaries, in pay; which made her ſtrong at home, and formidable abroad. But ſtill, as ſhe had all this while the command of others, ſhe herſelf was yet under the dominion of the Phariſees.

The character of the Phariſees.

Alexandra govern'd the people, and the Phariſees Alexandra.

THERE was one Diogenes, a man of quality, and a moſt particular friend to the late king. The Phariſees caus'd him to be put to death, upon ſuggeſtion that he had a hand in the crucifying the eight hundred priſoners before mention'd, who were put to death by the king's command. Nay, they preſſed the queen further yet, not to let any one man eſcape that was an adviſer in that horrible action. The queen was ſo captivated, that ſhe had not the power to deny them any thing: ſo that under that colour they deſtroy'd whom they pleas'd, and carry'd it on ſo far that no good man was ſafe: inſomuch that ſeveral perſons of condition were forced to fly for ſanctuary to Ariſtobulus; who preſently mov'd his mother on the behalf of thoſe perſons, for their dignity's ſake, and for the future to turn thoſe out of the town that she should suspect to be guilty. This being granted, instead of being put to death, they were only banish'd. Alexandra, about this time, sent an army to Damascus, upon a pretext that Ptolemy press'd very hard upon the town: She took the place, without any thing remarkable that pass'd at the taking of it.

Cleopatra besieg'd by Tigranes in Ptolemais.

Cleopatra was now besieg'd in Ptolemais, by Tigranes the king of Armenia, and Alexandra, at the same time, plying him with presents and propositions. But Lucullus being already enter'd into Armenia with the Roman army, Tigranes march'd presently away, to prevent mischief that threatned his affairs at home.

Alexandra falls sick. Aristobulus takes the government upon him.

SOME short time after this, Alexandra fell dangerously ill; whereupon her younger son Aristobulus, with a train of his servants, (as he had a great many, and all in the flower of their youth, faithful and brave) got possession of the castles, took what money he could find, engag'd a body of auxiliary troops, and declar'd himself king. Hyrcanus, upon this turn, made complaints to his mother, who so far commiserated his case, that she caus'd the wife and sons of Aristobulus to be shut up in the castle, on the north-side of the temple, formerly call'd Baris, (as I said before) and afterwards Antonia in the government of Anthony; as Sebaste and Agrippias drew their names from Augustus and Agrippa. Alexandra, after a nine years reign, was taken off by this sickness, before she could revenge herself upon Aristobulus, for endeavouring to depose his brother.

The wife and sons of Aristobulus made prisoners in Antonia.

Sebaste and Agrippias.

The death of Alexandra.

She leaves the command to Hyrcanus.

ALEXANDRA left Hyrcanus all she had in the world, and transmitted the government into his hands, while she was yet living; but Aristobulus was much his superior yet, both in force and credit. The dispute betwixt the two brothers came to a battle near Jericho; where the greater part of Hyrcanus's men went over to Aristobulus; Hyrcanus, and the wretched remainder of his people, escaping with much difficulty into Antonia, where they had good hostages for their security; the wife and sons of Aristobulus (as we have said before) being there in custody. These brothers, before matters proceeded to farther extremities, came to this agreement; That Hyrcanus should yield up the kingdom to Aristobulus, and content himself with such honours and privileges as properly belong to the dignity of the king's brother. The reconciliation being interchangeably declared in the temple, and in the sight of the people, with mutual embraces, the two brothers changed houses; Aristobulus went to the palace, and Hyrcanus to the house of Aristobulus.

The two brothers came to a battle, and Aristobulus carries it.

They compound and agree.

CHAP. V.

Hyrcanus, by the advice of Antipater, makes a friend of Aretas the king of Arabia, against Aristobulus. Aretas enters Judea with fifty thousand men; forces Aristobulus into Jerusalem, and besieges him there. Scaurus takes a bribe, and raises the siege. The two brothers implore Pompey's assistance one against another. The vanity of Aristobulus, and Pompey's contempt of him. Aristobulus takes sanctuary in Alexandrion. The two brothers plead their cause before Pompey. Aristobulus makes his way for Jerusalem; humbles himself, and Pompey makes him a prisoner. Jerusalem besieg'd, and the temple taken by assault. Twelve thousand Jews slain. Pompey's piety and moderation. Aristobulus and his family carry'd away prisoners: But Aristobulus makes his escape upon the way.

THIS unexpected advancement of Aristobulus to the crown, was a terrible mortification to all his enemies, but especially to Antipater, upon the score of an old grudge betwixt them. Now this Antipater was by extraction an Idumean; and, for his birth and estate, one of the first rank of the country. Hyrcanus being now depos'd, and driven out of his dominions, Antipater advis'd him by all means to apply himself to Aretas, the king of Arabia, for assistance towards the recovery of his kingdom; employing his own interest also with Aretas, towards the gaining of his point, and reflecting all the while upon Aristobulus, as a very ill man; and at the same time elevating Hyrcanus up to the skies. He made use also of arguments drawn from the honour of the undertaking, and the generosity of the office; minding him that it was a thing worthy of himself, and well becoming the character of a great prince, for one crowned head to vindicate another: And more especially in the case of an injurious oppression and distress. When they were both thus instructed and prepar'd (Hyrcanus to be gone, and Aretas to receive him) Antipater convey'd Hyrcanus out of the city by night, and posting away with him, brought him safe to Petra, the royal palace of Arabia; and there, with fair words and presents, he deliver'd him up to the care and goodness of Aretas, who promis'd him he would use his utmost efforts toward the restoring him to his crown. Aretas, upon this, enter'd Judea with an army of fifty thousand men, horse and foot; but Aristobulus, not being in a condition to oppose him, was broken all to pieces at the first charge, and forc'd to take sanctuary in Jerusalem; where he was besieg'd by Aretas, and had certainly been taken, if Scaurus, the Roman general, had not at this juncture deliver'd him. Pompey the Great, who was then in war with Tigranes, sent Scaurus with an army out of Armenia into Syria: But coming to Damascus, he found the place taken by Metellus and Lollius, and their troops drawn off. Scaurus, coming by this time to understand how matters went in Judea, could not do better, he thought, than to bend his course that way.

See Ant. b. 14. c. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

Antipater advises Hyrcanus to seek to Aretas for succour.

They steal out of Jerusalem by night, and post away to Petra.

Aretas enters Judea with fifty thousand men.

Aristobulus beaten, and besieg'd in Jerusalem.

HE was no sooner upon the borders, but he was there met upon the way by embassadors from the two brothers, to the same purpose. Their instructions were to implore the assistance of the Romans for each of the two, one against the other. But Aristobulus's three * hundred talents (for that was the sum) weigh'd down the justice of Hyrcanus's pretensions; as appear'd by Scaurus's sending away embassadors to the Arabians and Hyrcanus, in the name of Pompey the Great and the senate of Rome, charging them immediately to quit the siege, and be gone at their uttermost peril. Aretas presently withdraws in a fright, out of Judea to Philadelphia, and Scaurus returns to Damascus. Now Aristobulus did not think it enough to escape being taken, but got all the force together he was able to make, and closely pursued the enemy. He came up with them at last at a place call'd Papyron; where he fought and cut off betwixt six and seven thousand of their men, in which number was Cephalon the brother of Antipater.

Aristobulus falls upon the Arabians rear.

Hyrcanus and Antipater, being now disappointed of the succour they expected from the Arabians, applied themselves for relief to their very enemies; and upon Pompey's entring Syria, and coming to Damascus, they cast themselves upon his honour for protection, with an introduction of large presents, and the same arguments over again that had been us'd to Aretas; desiring Pompey upon the main, to consider the violence of Aristobulus, and the right of Hyrcanus, as well in respect of his age, as of his manners. But Aristobulus depended so much upon his interest in Scaurus, that he dress'd himself in his royal robes, and, with the train and equipage of a king, went and made his compliment to Pompey. When he had waited a while; that is to say, so long as he thought consistent with his honour, (for he look'd upon it as a thing below his dignity to subject himself to an attendance) he returned back again to Diospolis.

The vanity of Aristobulus, and Pompey's contempt of him.

This behaviour of Aristobulus gave Pompey great offence, which was but what Hyrcanus and his companions wish'd for. He draws out presently his Roman troops, and some Syrian auxiliaries, and marches after him. When he was pass'd Pella and Scythopolis, coming to Corede, upon the borders of Judea, in the Mediterranean, he was inform'd that Aristobulus had taken sanctuary in Alexandrion, (a stately castle upon a very high mountain) thither he sent messengers, commanding Aristobulus to come down to him. This was so imperious a message, that he resolved to run any hazard rather than comply with it; but, what with the murmuring of the people, and the advice of his friends, to consider the strength of the Romans, and the necessity of the case, he was prevail'd upon in the conclusion to go down to Pompey; which he did; and after many things said there, in defence of his pretensions to the crown, he went up again. After this, at the instance of Hyrcanus, he came down the second time; and, when the two brothers had disputed a while who had the justest title, Aristobulus return'd as before, without any let or interruption from Pompey. He was so divided within himself, betwixt hope and fear, that one while he was in a mind to humble himself, and to do whatever Pompey would have him: but when he was gone half way sometimes in that resolution, he repented, and so return'd up to the castle again, for fear of doing any thing derogatory to his royal state. Pompey had now a good mind to get possession of the castles; but being told that Aristobulus had charg'd all the governors, to take no notice of any orders but under his own hand, he appointed Aristobulus to write to the several respective commanders, immediately upon the sight of those letters, to deliver them up. Aristobulus did as he was commanded; but went away immediately to Jerusalem in wrath and indignation, meditating all the way he went a war with Pompey.

Aristobulus takes sanctuary in Alexandrion.

The two brothers plead their cause before Pompey.

Aristobulus makes away for Jerusalem.

Pompey follows him.

Pompey gave him no time to provide himself, but hasten'd after him immediately; and he went on the more cheerfully for the news he met with about Jericho, of the death of Mithridates. This is the fruitfullest province of all Judea; there is a plenty of palm-trees in it, and much of the famous balsam that drops from that plant, upon cutting the bark with a sharp stone. He staid there that night, and dispatch'd away the next morning for Jerusalem. Aristobulus was so surpriz'd at this expedition, that he went and cast himself at Pompey's feet, with supplications and tears, promises of money, and proposals of giving up both the city and his person into Pompey's hands. This soften'd him a little for the present; but Aristobulus, it seems, could not make good what he had offer'd; for when Gabinius was sent to receive the money, the friends and companions of Aristobulus, who kept the town for him in his name, would not so much as let him in.

Aristobulus humbles himself to Pompey.

This affronted Pompey to such a degree, that he kept Aristobulus a prisoner, and so advanc'd to the city, to take a view of the fortifications and defences, and to consider upon what quarter to attack it. The walls were strong and impregnable, a hideous precipice at the foot of them, and the temple so invincibly secure, that if the city itself were taken, the work were but half done.

Pompey makes Aristobulus a prisoner, and takes a view of the place.

While Pompey was upon this deliberation, and casting within himself where to begin, and what to do, there broke out a violent sedition in the town, betwixt the two parties of Aristobulus and Hyrcanus; the former were for pushing it to a war, and rescuing their king by arms, upon a point of honour and duty; the other, for taking Pompey into the town, without any opposition. This was the sense of the majority, out of a dread they had for the Romans. The friends of Aristobulus, upon this, retir'd into the temple, and cut down the bridge of communication betwixt that and the city, in a final resolution of maintaining it to the last. Others there were that took several Romans into the town, and put them into the palace royal; whereupon Pompey sent Piso (one of his general officers) with a strong detachment to take possession of it. When Pompey saw the obstinacy of the Jews in the temple, and that there was now no longer any hope of an accommodation, he posted his guards, and put all things in order for an attack; Hyrcanus and his people contributing the best they could, both in action and counsel, to his assistance.

A violent sedition in the town, betwixt the parties of the two brothers.

Pompey prepares for an attack.

Their first business was to fill up that monstrous ditch and valley upon the northside of the wall; and this they attempted with what rubbish and materials the soldiers could get together, toward the bringing of it up to a level: a work of infinite difficulty, both in regard of the prodigious depth, and the advantage the Jews had of galling them from above: a work, in fine, insuperable, if it had not been for a remark of Pompey's, upon the Jews superstitious observance of their seventh day, or sabbath. This great man understanding that the Jews made a conſcience of doing any manner of work upon that day, but what was of abſolute neceſſity, either for the ſupport of life, or the defence of it, in caſe of immediate danger; he commanded his ſoldiers only to ply their entrenchments upon that day, without doing any other act of hoſtility. When the ground was now levell'd, the bulwarks advanc'd with ſtrong and large turrets planted upon them and mann'd, the Romans, with certain Tyrian engines they had got, began the battery: the ſoldiers at the ſame time, out of the towers above, beating the defendants with ſtones from the walls, 'till in the end they were quite tir'd out with the labour.

POMPEY could not but admire the conſtancy and reſolution of the Jews, and more eſpecially in this particular; that in the middle of all extremities and dangers, they never diſcontinued the worſhip and ceremonies of their religion, but offer'd up their daily prayers and ſacrifices, as orderly, as if it had been in a profound peace: and in this temper of ſoul they continued to the very laſt, even when they came to be finally deſtroy'd, and to have their throats cut at the very altar. In ſhort, after a three months ſiege, and the loſs only of one tower, the temple was taken by aſſault. The firſt that enter'd the breach was Fauſtus Cornelius, the ſon of Sylla, and, after him, Furius and Fabius, two centurions with their companies; who beſet the temple, and put to the ſword all who offer'd to fly, or make reſiſtance. There were ſeveral prieſts at that time in the very exerciſe of their holy function, that, with the ſword's point at their breaſts, continued in their oblations and incenſe, without any regard to the ſafety of their lives, out of a veneration they had for the duties of their profeſſion. The Pompeian Jews preſs'd ſo hard upon their fellow tribes-men of the other party, that they forc'd ſome of them down precipices: others, in a rage of deſperation, ſet fire to what they could come at about the walls, and then caſt themſelves into the flames. There periſh'd in this outrage twelve thouſand Jews, not many Romans, but more wounded.

The temple taken by aſſault.

Twelve thouſand Jews ſlain.

THIS was a diſmal deſolation and calamity in ſeveral reſpects; but nothing ſo ſenſibly afflicted the Jews, as to ſee the holy of holies expos'd to prophane eyes: a thing that never happen'd before. Pompey, with a train of his people, entring into this place, where only the high-prieſt was to be admitted, * ſaw within it the candleſticks, lamps and tables for incenſe, with other veſſels all of gold; a maſs of perfumes, and of ſacred treaſure to the value of † thouſand talents: but would not ſuffer any thing of all this to be touch'd that was conſecrated to the ſervice of God. On the next day after this deſtruction of the temple, he commanded the proper officers to take care for the purification of it, and to go on with the celebration of their holy worſhip as before. He did alſo declare Hyrcanus high-prieſt, as a conſideration for the good offices he had render'd him, both in the ſiege and otherwiſe, in drawing off great numbers of the faction from Ariſtobulus. By this way of proceeding, like a wiſe and good man, he ſecur'd himſelf the affections of the people. Among the priſoners, there was the father-in-law, and uncle of Ariſtobulus, both in one. Pompey ſtruck off the heads of all the principal authors of the revolt; but for Fauſtus, and other brave men who acted along with him, he conferr'd upon them ſignal marks of his eſteem, and glorious rewards. He impos'd a tribute upon Jeruſalem and Judea. He took away from the Jews the cities they had poſſeſſed themſelves of in Cele-Syria; and annexing them to the juriſdiction of the preſent Roman governor, he reduced the Jews to their own bounds. He rebuilt Gadara, which they had deſtroy'd, in favour of Demetrius one of his freemen, and a native of the place. As for the inland cities of Hippion, Scythopolis, Pella, Samaria and Mariſſa, Azotus, Jamnia and Arethuſa; and ſo for the coaſt-towns of Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and that which paſs'd formerly by the name of Straton's tower, and was afterwards call'd Ceſarea by Herod, who beautify'd it with illuſtrious buildings; he took them all from the Jews, to reſtore them to their native inhabitants, and ſo join'd them to the province of Syria. After the paſſing of theſe orders, and the ſettling Scaurus in the government of Judea and Cele-Syria, and of all the country of Egypt to the borders of Euphrates, with the command of two legions, Pompey haſten'd to Rome by the way of Cilicia, carrying Ariſtobulus priſoner with him and his family: that is to ſay, two daughters and two ſons, Alexander and Antigonus; the former of them made his eſcape in his paſſage, the other was carry'd to Rome, with his ſiſters.

Scaurus, well knowing that there was a good underſtanding betwixt Antipater and Aretas, (the king of Arabia) dealt with Antipater to go to him in a way of friendſhip, and try if he could work him to compound the war for a ſum of money. Antipater undertook the commiſſion, and manag'd the matter ſo dexterouſly, that the Arabian was content to give three * hundred talents for his peace; and ſo Scaurus withdrew his army.

Now Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, who had given Pompey the ſlip, was by this time at the head of a conſiderable body of men ravaging Judea, and preſſing upon Hyrcanus, to the degree of endangering Jeruſalem itſelf, upon a preſumption, that the walls which Pompey had beaten down, were not as yet repair'd. But Gabinius the ſucceſſor of Scaurus, and a perſon of eminent courage and conduct, being ſent into Syria, and marching againſt him, it concern'd Alexander to look about him, having ſo conſiderable an enemy to deal withal, and to put himſelf into the beſt poſture he could to receive him. He had now a marching body of ten thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe, beſide ſeveral ſtrong holds and defenſible places, that he had fortify'd; as Alexandrion, Hyrcanion and Macherus near the mountains of Arabia.

Gabinius, in the mean time, ſends Mark Anthony before him with a detachment of ſome choice troops of Antipater's, and a great number of Jews under Malichus and Pitholaus to join him: Gabinius himſelf following with the main body, and advancing toward Alexander: who, finding himſelf ſo much inferior in numbers, was forc'd to retire: But Gabinius preſſing upon him in his retreat, came up with him, and engag'd him not far from Jeruſalem, where he loſt ſix thouſand men: one half kill'd upon the ſpot, and the other half taken alive: himſelf eſcaping with the remainder to Alexandrion, cloſely purſued by the enemy. When Gabinius came up to the caſtle, he offer'd an act of indemnity to all deſerters that would come over to him, and join him before the battle: but their ſtomachs were too big to accept of it; ſo that he fell upon them, and cutting off a great many of them, ſhut up the reſt in the fort. Mark Anthony ſignaliz'd himſelf to a high degree in this action; and tho' he never fail'd of doing bravely at any time or place, he ſeemed in a manner yet even to outdo himſelf upon this occaſion. Gabinius now leaving a ſufficient ſtrength before the caſtle, took a view of all the towns and cities of the province, making it his buſineſs to ſettle the minds of the people in thoſe places that were intire and untouch'd, and to repair others that were laid in rubbiſh and ruin. He gave peremptory orders for there peopling of Scythopolis, Samaria, Anthedon, Apollonia, Jamnia, Raphia, Mariſſa, Dora, Gadara, Azotus, and ſeveral other places, where the citizens came thronging in with all poſſible joy to reſume their ancient habitations.

Mark Anthony ſignaliz'd himſelf.

When every thing here was put into good order, Gabinius went back to the ſiege of Alexandrion, and puſh'd it forward with more vigour than before. Alexander was ſo affrighten'd at the deſperate ſtate of his affairs, that he ſent his embaſſadors with an abſolute reſignation of himſelf, to acknowledge the ill things he had done, and to beg pardon; with a tender, not only of Macherus and Hyrcanion, but of Alexandrion itſelf alſo at his devotion. This being done, and accepted, Gabinius levell'd Alexandrion with the ground, at the inſtance of Alexander's mother, for fear it ſhould prove the occaſion of another war: ſuch was the tenderneſs, in fine, ſhe had for her husband and children that were carry'd priſoners to Rome, that ſhe omitted nothing of application and addreſs that might ingratiate her with the general.

Macherus, Hyrcanion and Alexandrion deliver'd up; and the laſt level'd with the ground.

Gabinius after this, carry'd Hyrcanus to Jeruſalem; committed the temple to his care and charge, appointed officers for the civil adminiſtration, and divided the whole province of Judea into five juriſdictions: the firſt Jeruſalem, the ſecond, † Gadara the third, Amathus the fourth, Jericho and the fifth Sepphoris, a city of Galilee; the people all this while overjoy'd to ſee themſelves deliver'd from a monarchy to an ariſtocracy.

Gabinus gives Hyrcanus the charge of the temple, and ſettles the government.

It was not long after this, that Ariſtobulus made his eſcape from Rome; which prov'd an occaſion of new troubles. He got together a great body of Jews, partly for the love of change, and partly for the ſake of an old kindneſs they had for him. His firſt attempt was the repairing of Alexandrion; but upon information that Siſenna, Anthony and Servilius were marching toward him with an army from Gabinius, he withdrew to Macherus; where he diſcharg'd himſelf of the burden of a looſe and an unprofitable multitude, and took only a body of eight thouſand men well arm'd along with him; reckoning a thouſand fugitive Jews that Pitholaus had brought out of Jeruſalem into the number.

The Romans follow'd them cloſe, and brought it to an encouragement. Ariſtobulus and his people did all that was poſſible for gallant men to do; but in the end, when they were tir'd out, and run down with numbers, the Romans had a clear victory of it; five thouſand being kill'd, two thouſand withdrew to a hill, and made a little ſtand, and the other thouſand, with Ariſtobulus himſelf, cut their way quite thro' the Roman army, and ſo gain'd Macherus. They got thither about evening, and found it all in ruins; but Ariſtobulus would not yet deſpair of gaining time enough by a truce, to repair the caſtle, and reinforce his army. The Romans in the mean while ply'd the attack, but at the end of two days, and after a very brave reſiſtance, they took the place, with Ariſtobulus, and his ſon Antigonus that fled from Rome with him; who were both bound and ſent to Gabinius, and ſo to Rome again. The ſenate made the father a priſoner, but ſent the ſon back to Judea, at the inſtance of Gabinius; who had promis'd as much to the wife of Ariſtobulus upon the delivery of the caſtles.

ted the Euphrates, and being on his return from Egypt, gave him a diverſion. Hyrcanus and Antipater were his friends to all manner of purpoſes; for they ſupplied him with men, money, arms, corn, and, in fine, all proviſions and neceſſaries for a war; prevailing with the Jews alſo that guarded the ways to Peluſium, to let Gabinius paſs over at his return. This departure of Gabinius occaſioned great commotions in the other parts of Syria, and created ſuch a revolt among the Jews, that Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, having gotten a vaſt multitude of the people together, he took up a reſolution to put every Roman to death that he could lay his hand on in that quarter. Gabinius was not inſenſible of the danger; and the ſedition increaſing, he made uſe of his intereſt with Antipater to bring matters to a better underſtanding. But Alexander being a warlike prince, and having an army of thirty thouſand men to truſt to, nothing would ſerve him but the bringing of it to a battle, which was ſought near the mountain of Itabyr. There fell ten thouſand upon the place, and the reſt ſhifted every man for himſelf, and ſo diſpers'd. Gabinius, after this defeat, returned to Jeruſalem by the advice of Antipater, to ſettle the people there under the form of a republic. He march'd from hence after the Nabatheans, ſecretly diſcharging two Parthian deſerters that came over to him, Mithridates and Orſanes, pretending that they had made their eſcapes.

Craſſus ſucceeds Gabinius, rifles the temple, and loſes both life and army.

CRASSUS ſucceeded Gabinius in the government of Syria, and rifled the temple, not only of the two * thouſand talents which Pompey refrain'd from meddling with; but of all the gold that was there beſides, toward the charge of the Parthian war. Upon this he paſs'd the Euphrates, where he himſelf and his army were both loſt; but of this in another place.

AFTER Craſſus came Caſſius into Syria, who put a ſtop to the Parthians when they were juſt ready to break into the country. He was no ſooner in poſſeſſion of his government, but he march'd into Judea; took Tarichea, and carried off near three thouſand Jews into bondage. Pitholaus, one of the number, Caſſius put to death, at the inſtigation of Antipater, for tampering the faction of Ariſtobulus into a ſedition. † Cypris, the wife of Antipater, was a noble Arabian, by whom he had four ſons, Phaſael, king Herod, Joſeph, and Pheroras; and one daughter, whoſe name was Salome. He was a perſon belov'd for his generoſity and conduct, by all men of honour and quality; but the moſt particular friend he had in the world, was the king of the Arabians, to whom he recommended the care of his children, when he undertook the war againſt Ariſtobulus. But Caſſius having made a truce with Alexander, returned to his poſt at Euphrates, to take poſſeſſion of the paſs, and hinder the inroad of the Parthians; of which more hereafter.

Cypris had four ſons by Antipater; Phaſael, Herod, Joſeph, and Pheroras.

Antipater aſſiſts Mithaidates, and takes Peluſium. Memphis deliver'd up to Mithridates. Antipater upon a pinch, reſcues Mithridates, and routs the Egyptians. Hyrcanus confirm'd in the pontificate.*

IT ſo happen'd a while after, upon Pompey's and the ſenate's quitting Rome, and croſſing the Ionian ſea in a fright, that Ceſar being left abſolute maſter of the place, and all that was in it, he order'd Ariſtobulus immediately to be ſet at liberty, and diſpatch'd him out of hand into Syria with two companies; taking for granted that the country would quickly be his own, if he did but ſhew himſelf upon the borders. But that conjecture was too good to be true; for the hopes of Ceſar, and the confidence of Ariſtobulus, were both diſappointed, the latter being taken off by poiſon by ſome of Pompey's people. The body was embalm'd, and lay for ſome time unburied, till Anthony tranſported it to Judea, to be there depoſited in the royal ſepulchres. Neither did Alexander, the ſon, eſcape any better than his father; for Scipio cut off his head at Antioch, according to Pompey's direction, who had paſs'd ſentence himſelf againſt him upon the bench, for ſeditious practices againſt the Romans. But Ptolemy, the ſon of Minneus, and the prince of Chalcis, upon mount Libanus, ſent his ſon Philippion to Aſkalon, to the widow of Ariſtobulus, and order'd the bringing home of his ſon Antigonus and his daughters to their father. Philippion fell in love with the younger, whoſe name was Alexandra, and married her, which his father put him to death for afterwards, and took her to wife himſelf. This alliance created in him a greater tenderneſs for his brother Antigonus, and for his ſiſters.

ANTIPATER, after the death of Pompey, made his court to Ceſar; and Mithridates, a Pergamenian, finding a ſtop put to his expedition into Egypt, by prohibiting a paſſage to his ſhips at Peluſium, he ſtay'd with his army at Askalon, and did not only prevail with the Arabians for aſſiſtance, though a ſtranger, but rais'd a body of about three thouſand Jews, well-arm'd, upon his own account. He brought alſo ſeveral of the leading men of Syria into the party; as ‡ Ptolemy of Libanus, Jambli-chus, and another Ptolemy, men of ſuch reputation, that their intereſt and example drew the whole country after them. Mithridates finding himſelf now in condition, by the help of Antipater, to enter upon action, advances to Peluſium; and the inhabitants oppoſing his paſſage, he lays ſiege to the city. Antipater at this ſiege diſtinguiſh'd himſelf in a very ſignal manner; for at the firſt onſet, preſſing from his quarter, he himſelf was the firſt man who broke down the walls, mounted the breach, and enter'd the town with his people after him.

Thus was Peluſium taken, but the Egyptian Jews (of the province of Onias) would not ſuffer them to go any further; and yet Antipater prevail'd with them, not only to be quiet without making any reſiſtance, but over and above to furniſh neceſſaries for the ſoldiers. This example wrought ſo far upon the people of Memphis, that of their own accord, they deliver'd themſelves up to Mithridates. Upon the arrival of Mithridates at Delta, they gave battle to a body of other Egyptians, at a place called the camp of the Jews, where Mithridates, with the whole right wing, was in extream danger of being totally cut off; but Antipater, having already broken the enemy's other wing, where he was engag'd, fetch'd a compaſs along the bank of the river, and came up ſo ſeaſonably to the reſcue of Mithridates, that he fell upon his purſuers, deſtroy'd ſeveral of them, and follow'd the chace up to the enemy's camp, where he made himſelf maſter of the pillage; and all this with the loſs only of fourſcore men on his ſide. There were near eight hundred of Mithridates's men ſlain upon the purſuit, but he himſelf preſerv'd at laſt beyond all expectation. Mithridates, after this, did him all imaginable right to Ceſar, in the report he made of ſo ſignal a ſervice; and the emperor was ſo frank and generous in his profeſſions and acknowledgments to this great man, that he became more and more zealous and ambitious of any occaſion to lay down his life for ſo illuſtrious a maſter. He needed no other proofs, in fine, of his faith and courage, than the wounds he bore upon his body as the marks of his virtue. So ſoon as the war was over in Egypt, Ceſar return'd into Syria, and made Antipater a free citizen of Rome, conferring alſo other honours upon him, enough to render him envied, and, in token of a ſingular reſpect and eſteem, confirming Hyrcanus in the pontificate for his ſake.

See Ant. b. xiv. c. 15, 16, 17

AT this very time, Antigonus, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, addreſs'd himſelf to Ceſar; and ſo order'd the matter, that he did Antipater a far greater ſervice than he intended him. His buſineſs was to complain of the death of his father, to tell Ceſar the ſtory of his being poiſon'd by Pompey's inſtruments, (as it was generally preſum'd) and to charge Scipio with cruelty to his brother, &c. But, inſtead of keeping within this compaſs, he laſh'd out into extravagant invectives againſt Hyrcanus and Antipater, for driving himſelf and his brethren moſt injuriouſly out of their native country, and for oppreſſing the public, only to gratify their own private paſſions. As for the aids they ſent Ceſar into Egypt, there was more of fear in it than good-will, in hope to attone, in ſome meaſure, for the ſervices they had formerly render'd to Pompey. Antipater, upon theſe reproaches, only uncover'd ſome parts of his body, and expos'd his wounds as teſtimonies of his loyalty to Ceſar, and ſo left it to his body to do the office of his tongue. "But, "(ſays he) I cannot ſufficiently admire the "confidence of Antigonus, the ſon of an ene- "my to the Romans, and a fugitive, and, "at laſt, as ſeditious an incendiary as ever "his father was. Now for this man to exhi- "bit accuſations to Ceſar, againſt the moſt "faithful and dutiful of his ſubjects, and to "inſiſt upon pretenſions of merit, when he "ought rather to be thankful that he is ſuf- "fer'd to live; what an unaccountable con- "fidence is this! Neither does he deſire any "thing becauſe he wants it, but with a deſign "rather to employ it to the ruin of his bene- "factor."

Antigonus charges the Pompeians with the death of Ariſtobulus.

Hyrcanus and Antipater wrongfully accuſed.

Antipater ſhews his ſcars in his juſtification.

He reproaches Antigonus.

CESAR, immediately upon this, created Hyrcanus high-prieſt, as a man perfectly well qualified for the function. He gave Antipater, at the ſame time alſo, the choice of any commiſſion he would deſire, who remitted himſelf dutifully to his maſter's good pleaſure; whereupon he was pleaſed to pronounce him governor of Judea; and he obtained likewiſe this further grace, that he might repair the walls of his country, which Pompey had thrown down. Theſe decrees he order'd to be engraven in braſs, and the tables to be hung up in the capitol, as a memorial of Antipater's ſervices, and of Ceſar's juſtice.

Ceſar makes Hyrcanus high-prieſt, Antipater governor of Judea, and gives him leave to rebuild the walls Pompey had thrown down.

Theſe decrees depoſited in the capitol.

WHEN Antipater had brought Ceſar to the borders of Syria, he returned to Judea, where the firſt thing he did was to rebuild the walls that Pompey had broken down; and then to inſpect the province, and, either by menaces, or perſuaſions, to prevent diſorder, and keep the country quiet; giving the people to underſtand, that if they behav'd themſelves as they ought to do toward Hyrcanus, they ſhould live happily and eaſily in peace and plenty; but if they ſhould ever think of fiſhing in troubled waters, and of advancing their own fortunes upon the ruin of the public, they ſhould find Antipater, inſtead of a gentle governor, a ſevere maſter, Hyrcanus an unmerciful tyrant, inſtead of a gracious prince, and Ceſar and the Romans, inſtead of friends, the worſt of enemies, who would be ſure to puniſh any injuries and inſults, that ſhould be offer'd againſt the authority of that prince, whom they had conſtituted.

Antipater rebuilds the walls, and commands obedience to Hyrcanus.

THIS deference to Hyrcanus did not yet hinder but that Antipater ſettled the ſtate of the province himſelf, to ſupply the defects and incapacities of Hyrcanus for the offices of a political adminiſtration. He gave Phaſael, his eldeſt ſon and the captain of the guards, the government of Jeruſalem, and all that province; that of Galilee, to Herod, his ſecond ſon, though though very young, with the ſame powers; who being naturally bold and active, was not long without an honourable occaſion of ſhewing the greatneſs of his mind. Syria was terribly infeſted, and over-run with troops of robbers, till he took Ezekias, the head of them, and put to death the captain himſelf, and ſeveral of his followers. This exploit was ſo acceptable a ſervice to the Syrians, that all the towns and villages were full of panegyrics and acclamations, to the honour of Herod, as the reſtorer of them to their liberties and poſſeſſions. The glory of this atchievement made Herod known to Sextus Ceſar, the kinſman of Ceſar the Great, who was then governor of Syria. The fame of this action inſpir'd Phaſael with an honeſt and a generous emulation to out-do his brother, and to gain more and more upon the hearts of the people of Jeruſalem, where he exerciſed his power with ſuch a tenderneſs of moderation and juſtice, that no perſon had reaſon to complain. The wiſdom and conduct of this adminiſtration gave the people as great a reverence for Antipater, as if he had been their abſolute ſovereign; and he behav'd himſelf all this while with a great exactneſs of faith and kindneſs toward Hyrcanus.

He prefers Phaſael and Herod.

Herod takes Ezekias, the captain of the robbers.

BUT to ſhew now that it is a thing utterly impoſſible to ſecure great men and glorious actions from the ſtroke of envy, we find it evidently in this inſtance of Hyrcanus. He had borne a kind of a ſecret grudge for ſome time already, toward theſe illuſtrious young men (and to Herod eſpecially) for the honour they had acquir'd in the world, all mouths being full of the hiſtory of their virtues and adventures. Now this envious diſpoſition was further wrought upon by a parcel of invidious paraſites, and court-earwigs, to whom the exemplary integrity of Antipater's ſons was an eye-ſore. "What! (ſaid they) is the authority of the government to be divided betwixt "Antipater and his ſons, and Hyrcanus to "ſtand like a property, with only the empty name of it? How long will you go on "at this rate, of ſetting up kings againſt your-"ſelf? It is now come to that paſs, that they "do not ſo much as pretend to act any longer as "deputies or ſubjects; but, in one word, bare-"fac'd as ſovereigns; witneſs Herod's putting "ſo many men to death, in a flat contradic-"tion to the Jewiſh law, and without any "mandate or direction of yours. Is Herod a "private man, or a king? If the former, why "is he not call'd to an account for this, and "to anſwer both to the king himſelf, and to "the law, which does not allow of any man's "being put to death without a formal con-"demnation?"

Hyrcanus bears a ſecret grudge to the two brothers.

Hyrcanus irritated by evil counſel.

HYRCANUS was mov'd at this by little and little, till at laſt he broke out into a fit of wrath and indignation, commanding Herod to be ſummon'd to make his appearance. Herod thought himſelf ſo ſafe in his own innocency, that with the advice of his father, he ſecured his gariſons in galilee, and without any more ado went forthwith to the king, taking only ſuch a guard along with him, out of a reſpect to Hyrcanus, as might be competent for the ſecuring of his perſon, without an affront to the prince. Sextus Ceſar had ſo great a kindneſs for the young man, that for fear of miſchief when they had him among them, he ſent to Hyrcanus to acquit him of the charge, who ſeemed willing enough to do it, out of an inclination he had to oblige him. But Herod was yet a little doubtful how far he might depend upon fair words, and ſo repair'd to Sextus at Damaſcus, with a reſolution not to appear any more in caſe of a ſecond ſummons. Hyrcanus was ply'd over and over to the ſame purpoſe, as before, and by the ſame ſort of people. They told him that Herod was gone away in a rage, and with a deſign of ſome deſperate attempt. Hyrcanus was eaſily impos'd upon, and which way to turn himſelf he knew not; for he found his enemy too hard for him. But when Sextus came afterwards to declare Herod general of all his troops in Syria and Samaria, it ſtruck ſuch a terror into Hyrcanus, betwixt the conſideration of his own ſtrength, and the affections of the people, that he fancied him marching at the head of an army againſt him already.

Herod declared general in Syria and Samaria.

NOR was he at all miſtaken; for Herod in a tranſport of indignation to ſee himſelf treated as a criminal, gathered an army together, and march'd toward Jeruſalem, with a full determination to depoſe Hyrcanus from the government, which he had certainly done, if his father and his brother had not put a ſtop to the violence of his paſſion; "Deſiring him to con-"fine his revenge to menaces and hard words, "rather than offer any indignity to the king, "under whoſe countenance he had advanced "himſelf to this dignity. If it troubled him, "they ſaid, that he was arraign'd, it might "paſs for ſome ſort of attonement that he was "acquitted; and then it was but ſetting the "conſervation of his life againſt the hazard "of it. Julius Cesar murder'd in the capitol

THERE fell out at the same time among the Romans, a more violent war than the former. Cesar being now murder'd by the treachery of Cassius and Brutus, after he had govern'd three years and seven months, his death was follow'd with a horrible confusion of factions in the empire. The great men were all divided into parties, every man acting as his humour and interest led him, without any regard to the publick. Cassius took his way into Syria to get possession of the troops that were then before Apamia; where he made † Marcus and Bassus, with some malecontented cohorts, friends, raising the siege of Apamia at the same time. He laid the cities under the most unreasonable and excessive contributions; a tax of seven  hundred talents upon the Jews, which Antipater provided for in time by an equal distribution of the charge, and appointing his sons and his friends to take a seasonable care of the levy; reckoning Malichus, his profess'd enemy, into the number of his friends, upon that pinch. The first that wrought himself into the good graces of Cassius was Herod; who presented him with an hundred †† talents for the quota of Galilee; and for that reason was esteemed one of his best friends. But for the rest that were not so ready with their proportions, Cassius was so transported at the delay, that he raz'd Gophna, Ammaus, and two other cities of less note, to the ground: And when this was done, he took up a resolution of killing Malichus for being so dilatory. But Antipater having first appeased Cassius with an hundred talents, prevented the execution of his displeasure upon other places.

Cassius in a rage at Malichus, but pacify'd by Antipater

BUT so soon as Cassius was gone, all Malichus's obligations to Antipater were not only forgotten, but on the contrary, he enter'd into a practice upon the life of that man, whom he had so often over and over own'd for his saviour, who was to be remov'd out of the way as an obstruction to his designs. Antipater kept an eye upon him, as a man both of power and cunning; and so pass'd the Jordan to put himself in condition to stand upon his own guard, and take his revenge. Malichus finding himself suspected, had no way to come off but by wheedling, and out-facing the sons of Antipater into a better opinion of him. Phasael being governor of Jerusalem, and Herod captain of the guards, he deceiv'd them so artfully with excuses, oaths, and protestations of his plain-dealing and integrity, that he engag'd the sons themselves in a mediation to the father for a reconciliation; and by the same instrument he made his peace also with Marcus the governor of Syria, who was otherwise resolv'd to put him to death as a mutineer. Cesar and Anthony being now in war with Brutus and Cassius, Marcus and Cassius having had ample proofs of the bravery of Herod, made him governor of the whole province of Syria, with a considerable body of horse and foot for his guard; nay, Cassius went so far as to promise him the kingdom of the Jews at the end of the war. But it so fell out, that the hope and bravery of the son occasioned the death of the father; for Malichus was in such a dread of him, that he could never think himself safe while the other was living; and so he corrupted Hyrcanus's butler to poison Antipater in his drink. This was the requital that great man receiv'd from this ungrateful wretch. He was indeed a person of wisdom and courage; and one, in fine, to whom Hyrcanus stood indebted for the possession of his kingdom. The people were so enrag'd at Malichus, upon a suspicion of this execrable practice, that they were ready to tear him to pieces; but upon his renouncing and abjuring any knowledge of the matter, the multitude soften'd a little, and suspended their rage; and Malichus in the mean time, by way of prevention, put himself into a condition and posture of defence; for it could not be expected that this horrid murther should ever go off thus. He knew Herod was absolutely for taking his revenge at the head of an army; but his brother Phasael dissuaded him by all means from making any publick disturbance about it, for fear of raising a tumult. The brothers, upon this, gave him the hearing with a semblance of allowing his defence, and a countenance, as if they thought him innocent, and then proceeded to the funeral rites and duties for their father; which were very splendid and magnificent.

SAMARIA being at this time torn with factions, Herod went down to quiet them; but so as to return upon all solemn days, to keep his festival still at Jerusalem, accompany'd with his guards backwards and forwards. Malichus did not like this face of things, and therefore put Hyrcanus upon telling Herod plainly, "That it was a profanation of the "sacredness of the holy religion and profession, "to intermix strangers with natives." Hyrcanus did as he was directed; but Herod in contempt both of the cause itself, and of the authority, enter'd by night into the city. Malichus went presently to him all in tears, lamenting and condoling the death of Antipater; and Herod, tho' ready to burst with rage and indignation, to outward appearance carried it as if he believed his grief real, and every word he said to be true. But yet at the same time he wrote to Cassius for justice upon Malichus, for the death of his father, which was easily obtain'd upon several accounts, Malichus be-

LAODICEA was juſt now taken, and men of quality came thronging in from all parts to Herod, with their gratulations and preſents. He look'd upon this as the faireſt opportunity in the world for the execution of his purpoſe; but Malichus, ſuſpecting a deſign againſt himſelf, contriv'd to give him the ſlip, by getting away his ſon from Tyre, who was then a hoſtage there; and ſo ſteal away with him into Judea. But then, well conſidering the deſperate ſtate of his affairs, he was afraid that would not ſecure him neither; and ſo he ſet his wits to work upon a nobler exploit; which was to ſtir up the whole nation of the Jews againſt the Romans, while Caſſius was employ'd in a war againſt Anthony; in which caſe he flatter'd himſelf that it would be no hard matter to depoſe Hyrcanus, and take poſſeſſion of the government. But the Fates had otherwiſe determin'd, it ſeems; for Herod, having a jealouſy of ſome great miſchief projecting, invited both Malichus and Hyrcanus to ſupper with him; ſending a ſervant out under pretence of having every thing put in order for the entertainment; but in truth, with ſecret inſtructions to the tribunes to attend, and act according to the agreement betwixt Caſſius and Herod before-mentioned. They march'd out with their arms toward the ſea-ſide of the city; where they met Malichus upon the way, ſurrounded him, and cut him to pieces. The ſurprize put Hyrcanus into ſo dangerous a ſwoon, that he could hardly be brought to life again; but ſo ſoon as ever he was come to himſelf, he call'd out to Herod to know who it was that had kill'd Malichus? One of the tribunes made anſwer, That it was Caſſius's order. Why then, ſays Hyrcanus, Caſſius has ſav'd me and my country at once, in the deſtruction of ſo dangerous a traitor to both. Whether this was ſpoken from his heart or out of fear, no body knows; but this was Herod's revenge, and this the end of Malichus.

Felix makes war upon Phaſael and Herod.

WHEN Caſſius had quitted Syria, there happen'd new troubles in Jeruſalem, upon the occaſion of Felix's making war againſt Phaſael and Herod, to revenge the death of Malichus upon the brothers. It ſo fell out that Herod being then at Damaſcus with Fabius the governor, he was taken ſo ill that it put him out of condition to march to the relief of his brother. But as it happen'd, Phaſael had no need of help; for he routed Felix with his own troops, and did his buſineſs without it: but exclaiming bitterly againſt Hyrcanus for his ingratitude in ſiding with Felix, and in putting ſeveral caſtles into the hands of the brother of Malichus: as there were many of them, and Maſſada among the reſt, one of the ſtrongeſt holds in the country. But this avail'd them little againſt the power of Herod; who was no ſooner got abroad again, but he retook all he had loſt, and brought Hyrcanus to his knees, even in Maſſada itſelf: diſmiſſing him however upon his humiliation. He drove Marion, the king of the Tyrians, out of Galilee, and recover'd from him three caſtles that he had gotten; not only ſparing the lives of the Tyrians that he took, but gratifying divers of them over and above with donatives and bounties: by which means the people became Herod's friends, and Marion's enemies both at once. This Marion was a fit inſtrument for Caſſius, who had ſet ſo many tyrants over Syria already; and marching againſt Herod, he took Antigonus, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, along with him; and Fabius alſo, who was in effect no more than Antigonus's mercenary; and all this becauſe they were enemies to Herod; Ptolemy, the father-in-law of Antigonus, ſupplying them with all neceſſaries.

HEROD made ready for the engagement, and it came to a battle upon the borders of Judea; Antigonus was routed, Herod carry'd the day, and return'd to Jeruſalem, where he was receiv'd with all tenderneſſes of honour and reſpect, even by thoſe that had deſpis'd him before: but this was out of a particular regard to the relation he had to Hyrcanus; for this Herod was formerly marry'd to a woman of his own country; ſhe was nobly born, and her name Doris. By this woman he had Antipater, but he was afterward married to Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, and of Alexandra the daughter of Hyrcanus. This was the relation he had to the king. But upon Ceſar's coming into Italy, and Anthony into Aſia, after the death of Caſſius at the battle of Philippi, embaſſadors were diſpatched from ſeveral places to Anthony in Bithynia, and the heads of the Jews appear'd alſo, with heavy complaints againſt Phaſael and Herod for uſurping arbitrary power to themſelves, and allowing Hyrcanus only the bare name of ſovereignty. Herod being within diſtance of over-hearing the accuſation, manag'd ſo well with Anthony, by the mediation of a ſum of money, that the complainants were all diſcharg'd without a hearing.

ANTHONY being after this at Daphnis in the ſuburbs of Antioch, (about the beginning of his intrigue with Cleopatra) there came to him a hundred of the principal men of the Jews all in a body; ſelect men for quality and ability: and their buſineſs was the ſame complaint over again againſt the two brothers. They had made choice of the beſt ſpeakers they had, for the advantage of the plea; and Meſſala ſtood up for the brothers, Hyrcanus, for kindred-ſake, putting in to ſecond him. Upon the hearing of both parties, Anthony asked Hyrcanus, whom he look'd upon as the fitteſt man for a character in the government. Hyrcanus reply'd, that for his own part, part, he knew not any other comparable to the two brothers. Anthony was overjoy'd at this declaration, having been ſo highly oblig'd to Antipater of old, for a generous reception and entertainment upon his coming into Judea with Gabinius. So he pronounced them both tetrarchs of Judea, and committed the whole adminiſtration to their conduct.

Anthony makes them tetrarchs of Judea.

THE deputies diſcover'd ſuch diſpleaſure and diſguſt at this proceeding, that Anthony committed fifteen of the hundred to priſon; and they eſcap'd narrowly with their lives too. The reſt he treated coarſly, and ſo let them go. This did but inflame the mutineers at Jeruſalem to a higher degree, ſo that inſtead of a hundred, they ſent now a thouſand deputies to Anthony at Tyre; who was at that time making ready to fall upon Jeruſalem. They were ſo clamorous, that the magiſtrates of Tyre were order'd to diſperſe them; and in caſe of reſiſtance, to put all to death that they took: Anthony giving them further in charge to maintain the authority of the tetrarchs which he had ſet up. Herod and Hyrcanus, being inform'd of this diſorder, went out to the deputies as they were walking before the port, and adviſ'd them civilly to have a care how they engag'd themſelves and their country, by ſuch intemperances, in one common ruin. But the better they were us'd, the worſe they were: inſomuch, that Anthony was fain to bring them to reaſon by armed troops, whereby a great many of them were kill'd and wounded. Hyrcanus was pleas'd however to take care of the wounded, and to provide for the burying of the dead. But all this wrought nothing at all upon thoſe that eſcap'd; for they ſtill went on embroiling the city, and irritating Anthony, till they provok'd him to put all his priſoners to death.

The deputies ſeditious and inſolent.

Anthony treats them severely.

ABOUT two years after this, when Barzapharnes, a noble Parthian, held the government of Syria, with Pacorus the king's ſon; Lyſanias the ſucceſſor of Ptolemy, the ſon of Minneus, ſtruck up an agreement, and confirm'd it with articles, to deliver up to them a thouſand * talents, and five hundred women, upon the dethroning of Hyrcanus, and ſettling Antigonus in his place. They fell to work upon the project immediately; Pacorus took the way of the ſea-coaſt, and Barzapharnes was to march over the Midland: Ptolemais and Sidon open'd their gates to Pacorus, but the Tyrians abſolutely refus'd him entrance. THE Jews of mount Carmel offer'd their ſervice to Antigonus of their own accord, who order'd them forthwith to advance, and poſſeſs themſelves of that quarter of the country they call Drymos. They brought it to a battle, and got the better of it; and when the enemy was routed and diſpers'd, their numbers encreaſing, they march'd directly to Jeruſalem; where Hyrcanus and Phaſael made a very brave reſiſtance, and after a ſharp diſpute in the market-place, forc'd them to retire into the temple. Herod, upon this, clapt a guard of ſixty men into the adjoining houſes; but the people ſet fire to them out of a mortal hatred they had for the two brothers. Theſe practices tranſported Herod to ſuch a degree of indignation, that he fell upon the enemy, cutting off great numbers of them; and there paſs'd not a day without bloodſhed and ſlaughter. The feaſt of Pentecoſt being now at hand, and the city crouding full from one end of it to the other, up to the very temple itſelf, of people that came up to the ſolemnity from all quarters, and moſt of them with their arms, Phaſael took charge of the walls, and Herod, with a ſmall party, of the palace. The latter made ſo unexpected a ſally into the ſuburbs, that he kill'd ſeveral, and routed the whole multitude: ſome fled into the city, others into the temple, and ſome again ſhelter'd themſelves behind the rampart.

WHEN things were brought to this paſs, Antigonus propos'd a treaty of peace, and offer'd Pacorus (the king's officer before mention'd) for an umpire. Phaſael entertain'd the motion, and took the Parthian with five hundred horſe, into the city: his pretence was only the compoſing of a ſedition, but the plain truth of his intention was the aſſiſting of Antigonus. opinion of Herod, who advis'd him to kill him, and caution'd him by all means to have a care how he truſted him; for he was falſe, and it was but natural for a Barbarian ſo to be. He was a traitor, he ſaid, and deſerv'd to be treated as one. Pocorus, for the better colour of the buſineſs, went out with Hyrcanus, and ſo with the reſt of the company follow'd Phaſael, leaving with Herod ſome of thoſe cavaliers that the Barbarians call'd freemen.

Barzapharnes falſe and perfidious.

WHEN they came to Galilee, they found the people divided, and in arms; but the governors of places however came out to meet them. Barzapharnes had the wit to cover the falſeneſs of his heart with external civilities, ſuch as ſoft words and preſents; but ſo ſoon as they were parted, he had an ambuſh in readineſs to ſurprize them on their return. They were conducted to a place near the ſea, call'd Ecdipon; and there they had the whole ſtory of the treachery, a thouſand talents promis'd, and five hundred women to be deliver'd up to the Parthians, and ſeveral of their own part of the number; that the Parthians were always falſe, and they were told farther, that this horrid perfidy had not been put off ſo long, but that they waited for Herod's coming up to Jeruſalem, for fear the plot ſhould take air, and be diſappointed. And to ſhew now that this was more than talk, the ambuſh was juſt now at hand to ſeize them.

The whole ſtory of the treachery.

OPHELIUS was the man to whom Saramalla (a Syrian, and the richeſt man of the country) had communicated the minutes of the whole deſign. This Ophelius uſed a thouſand importunities to perſuade Phaſael to ſhift for himſelf; but Phaſael's reſolution was, whatever he ſuffer'd, not to abandon Hyrcanus; ſo that he choſe rather to lay it home to Barzapharnes, and to tell him to his teeth what a mercenary perfidious wretch he was. "If "money be your buſineſs (ſays he) I can give "you more for my life than Antigonus has "promis'd you for the kingdom." This put the Parthian upon a violent denial of the whole matter, with execrable oaths and imprecations; and ſo he went his way to Pacorus. No ſooner was he gone, but Phaſael and Hyrcanus were taken into cuſtody by the Parthians that ſtay'd behind, according to their order, and had only the liberty left them of exclaiming againſt ſo horrid a perjury and treaſon.

Ophelius preſſes Phaſael to look to himſelf.

Phaſael charges Barzapharnes to his face.

Phaſael and Hyrcanus ſeized by the Parthians.

THE Parthian, all this while, had his leſſon given him, to try if he could decoy Herod out of the town, and take him. This he attempted, but Herod was ſo well acquainted with the treacherous practices of thoſe Barbarians, that he would not ſo much as ſtir out of the walls. He made no doubt but Phaſael had written him the whole ſtory at length of the treachery, and that the Parthians had intercepted thoſe letters; but all that Pacorus could do, would not draw him out of his hold, though he was preſs'd with a pretence plauſible enough; which was, that he ſhould meet his letters upon the way; for he'd find no ſuch thing in them as impriſonment or treachery, nor any thing more than the common buſineſs of familiar letters. Herod kept himſelf ſtill upon his guard; for he had been told by others, that his brother Phaſael was under durance; beſide, that Mariamne, the daughter of Hyrcanus, and one of the wiſeſt of women, begg'd of him, upon any terms, not to ſtir abroad, nor expoſe himſelf to the manifeſt deſigns of thoſe Barbarians.

Pacorus attempts to decoy Herod.

HEROD was too wiſe and wary to be impos'd upon bare-fac'd; ſo that Pacorus was put to his ſhifts to contrive how he might trick him out of his life ſome other way. While this was in agitation, Herod ſtole away by night, with ſome of his neareſt relations (and when his enemies leaſt thought on it) toward Idumea. The Parthians had no ſooner notice of his departure, but they got up and follow'd him. He ſent his mother, brother, Mariamne (to whom he was contracted) and Mariamne's younger brother before him; while he and his retinue retarded the purſuit of the Barbarians, and got the better of them in ſeveral encounters, retiring at laſt to the caſtle of Maſſada. The Jews were harder upon him in his flight than the Parthians, (though ever ſo troubleſome) and fell upon him about * ſixty furlongs from Jeruſalem, where they puſh'd it to a down-right battle. Herod got the victory with a ſlaughter of men, and for the eternal honour of the action, he erected a moſt magnificent palace upon the place, with a ſtrong caſtle in it, which he call'd Herodion, after his own name.

Herod ſlips out of the town by night.

He withdraws to Maſſada.

The Jews preſs him harder than the Parthians.

Herodion erected in memory of this action.

A GREAT many people came in to him in his retreat; and at † Threſſa in Idumea, his brother Joſeph adviſed him by all means to leſſen his train, which he took to be upward of nine thouſand men, a number too large for the caſtle of Maſſada to hold. Herod took his counſel, and diſcharg'd all the unprofitable mouths with a viaticum to Idumea, diſpoſing of his kindred, and the moſt neceſſary perſons for his ſervice into the caſtle, with a body of eight hundred men over and above for the guard of the women, and proviſions ſufficient to hold out a ſiege, if there ſhould be occaſion. This he did, and ſo went forward to Petra, a city of Arabia.

Herod leſſens his train.

And advances to Petra.

THE hearts of the Parthians at Jeruſalem were altogether ſet upon booty; breaking into the houſes of thoſe that were gone, and rifling the royal palace itſelf, but without ſo much as touching Hyrcanus's treaſure, which was not above three  hundred talents. But they poſſeſs'd themſelves of other riches, though not ſo much as they expected: For Herod had the providence, for fear of the lewd Barbarians, to take out what was moſt precious, and to tranſport it long before to Idumea, his companions alſo taking the ſame courſe. But after the Parthians had made themſelves maſters of the ſpoil of the town, they were not content with that ravage, but infeſted the countries alſo with a bloody and an implacable war. They laid waſte the city of Mariſſa, and not only conſtituted Antigonus king, but deliver'd up Phaſael and Hyrcanus in chains into his hands. Phaſael daſhes out his own brains.

But the cruelty of Antigonus was fruſtrated by the courage of Phaſael, who without either the help of a ſword, or his hands at liberty, daſh'd out his brains againſt a ſtone, ſhewing himſelf the true brother of Herod, and Hyrcanus a degenerate. He dy'd like a man of honour, and his end was ſuitable to the glory of his life. There goes yet another report of him, that he repented after that violence upon himſelf, but that a phyſician was ſent him from Antigonus, who poiſon'd the wound, and ſo diſpatch'd him: But whether the one or the other, we ſhall not contend. There paſſes another ſtory, that, before he dy'd, he was told by a woman that Herod had made his eſcape. "Well! Antigonus could not keep touch with the Parthians.

This was the end of Phaſael, and it was now a great mortification to the Parthians, that Antigonus could not make good his promiſe of the five hundred women to them: but the buſineſs was made up at Jeruſalem, and Hyrcanus ſent bound into Parthia. Herod knew nothing as yet of the death of his brother; but was ſo ſenſible of the covetous humour of the Barbarians, that he concluded there was no redeeming of him but by a ſum of money; and on that account he reſolv'd upon a journey into Arabia, in hope of ſupplying himſelf from the king upon that occaſion, either as a bounty upon the ſcore of an old friendſhip betwixt the Arabian and Antipater, or as a loan upon the pawn of his nephew the ſon of Phaſael, a youth of ſeven years of age, whom he had at that time with him for his ſecurity. The ſum he propoſed to give, was three * hundred talents, the Tyrians joining with him in the requeſt.

* See the note in the foregoing page.

Herod order'd by Malichus to depart Arabia

But his generous intentions were moſt unhappily prevented by this fatality in the death of Phaſael; ſo that Herod could do him no good, over and above that he durſt not truſt himſelf among the Arabians. For Malichus, their king, ordered him to depart immediately out of his territories; pretending that the Parthians had demanded, by their embaſſadors, that Herod might be driven out of Arabia; but the true reaſon was his ingratitude to Antipater, and the narrowneſs of his ſoul, that he would not ſhew any reſpect to the ſons (being then in diſtreſs) for the obligations he had to the father. He had, in fine, impudent adviſers about him, without either faith or honour; and theſe were the perſons that were moſt in credit with him.

When Herod came to find the Arabians to be his enemies, and for thoſe very reaſons that he thought would have made them his friends, he diſpatch'd the meſſengers back again, with ſuch aa anſwer as he was prompted to by the paſſion of a troubled mind, and ſo march'd toward Egypt. He came in the evening to a certain temple, where he had left ſeveral of his company in his paſſage. He got next day to Rinocolura; and that was the place where he receiv'd the firſt news of his brother's death. This ſurprize undoubtedly tranſported him; but ſo ſoon as ever the firſt heat of his paſſion was over, and that he had done juſtice to the ſoftneſſes of humanity and natural affection, he proceeded on his journey. The Arabian repented himſelf by this, of what he had done, and with all ſpeed ſent after the perſon he had ſo barbarouſly abus'd, to invite him back again, but was now too late; for he was gotten to Peluſium, where the officers made a difficulty of letting him paſs, till upon application to the magiſtrates he was left at liberty to go whether he pleas'd, out of the veneration they had for the fame and worth of the man. He took his paſſage for Alexandria, where he was receiv'd by Cleopatra, upon his entrance into the city, with all pompous formalities of honour and reſpect, in hope that he might be prevail'd with to accept of the command of an army, which ſhe was then providing for ſome great deſign. But Herod's heart was ſo ſet upon his voyage for Rome, that neither the queen's entreaties, the extreme cold of the ſeaſon, nor the dangers of the ſeas, could divert him from it. Upon his putting to ſea, he took his courſe by the way of Pamphylia, where there happen'd ſo violent a tempeſt that they were forced to caſt the greateſt part of their goods over-board to ſave the veſſel: But with great difficulty at laſt he got ſafe to Rhodes, at that time terribly harraſs'd by reaſon of a war with Caſſius. He was there receiv'd by two of his friends, Ptolemy and Saphinias; and, notwithſtanding his preſent want of money, he made a ſhift to provide himſelf a ſtout veſſel, that carry'd him and his friends to Brunduſium, and ſo to Rome. The perſon there to whom he made his firſt application, was Anthony upon the ſcore of an antient kindneſs and acquaintance betwixt him and Antipater: and to him he recounted the adventures and misfortunes both of himſelf and his family, with the ſtory of his friends and relations that were at preſent ſhut up and beſieg'd in the caſtle of Maſſada, and how he had made a winter voyage of it, to pay his duty to him, and to implore his aid.

Herod nobly receiv'd by Cleopatra at Alexandria.

Herod paſſes to Brunduſium, and ſo to Rome.

Anthony was ſo affectionately mov'd with a generous compaſſion for Herod's diſtreſs, and an honourable deference to the memory of Antipater, together with a virtuous ſenſe of what was due to the character of ſo excellent a perſon, that he reſolved in the very inſtant to make Herod now king of the Jews, as he had declar'd him tetrarch before; and this not only out of a reſpect to Herod, but the averſion he bare to Antigonus had likewiſe ſome part in the reſolution, looking upon him as a man of a turbulent and ſeditious temper, and an enemy to the Romans. And now after all theſe gentle diſpoſitions of Anthony in Herod's favour, Auguſtus was yet rather the forwarder friend of the two; for he was never well and eaſy but when he was talking of Antipater's ſervices in Egypt, and what Antipater and Ceſar had ſuffer'd together there; the honour and hoſpitality of the converſation, beſide the worthineſs of Herod's mind and courage.

The generoſity of Auguſtus and Anthony to Herod.

Upon this, there was a ſenate call'd, where Meſſala, and after him, Atratinus (Herod himſelf preſent) enlarg'd upon the merits of Antipater, and his fidelity to the people of Rome; expoſing Antigonus at the ſame time for a publick enemy; not only for falling off ſo ſoon, but for receiving a crown from the hands of the Parthians, in contempt of the Romans. The ſenate was ſo poſſeſs'd with theſe harangues rangues, that they gave their voices unanimouſly for Herod to beking of the Jews, eſpecially Anthony declaring himſelf that it would be for the advantage of the war with the Parthians to have it ſo. Upon the riſing of the ſenate, Anthony and Ceſar went out with Herod betwixt them the conſuls, and other magiſtrates going before, to give order for the killing of ſacrifices, and the depoſiting of this decree of the ſenate in the capitol. ANTIGONUS was at this time before Maſſada, where, tho' they had plenty of every thing elſe, they wanted water to extremity, inſomuch that Joſeph, the brother of Herod, underſtanding that Malichus the king of Arabia had repented of the injuries he had multiply'd upon Herod, enter'd into a reſolution to ſteal out of the caſtle by night, with two hundred of his familiar friends, and to betake himſelf to the Arabians for ſuccour. And he had certainly put his deſign in execution, and left the caſtle, if, upon the preciſe point of time, when he was juſt about to make the ſally, there had not fallen ſo plentiful a ſhower of rain, that their pits, ciſterns, and other veſſels, were all repleniſh'd with it; ſo that there was now no need of ſtirring. After this relief, the gariſon made frequent ſallies; and betwixt ſurprizes and open force, did conſiderable execution upon the enemy; not but that they had the fortune to be ſometimes worſted themſelves.

WHILE this paſt, Ventidius, one of the Roman generals, being ſent to drive the Parthians out of Syria, enter'd Judea, under colour of a deſign to relieve Maſſada, but in effect to make a ſeizure of Antigonus's treaſure. Now when he had advanced almoſt as far as Jeruſalem, and enrich'd himſelf with plunder, he went off again with the greateſt part of the army, but left Silo with a ſmall body behind him, for the better countenance of the cheat; for if he had quite clear'd the country, it would have been ſaid that he came only to ſatisfy his own private avaritious ends. Antigonus, however, made fair with Silo, having ſome hope yet that he might again engage the Parthians to his intereſt; and ſo long as there was hope, he thought the people would be quiet.

Ventidius ſeizes Antigonus's treaſure.

HEROD, being now tranſported out of Italy to Ptolemais, having raiſed a conſiderable army, both of his own nation and ſtrangers, poſted away through Galilee toward Antigonus, with the aſſiſtance of Ventidius and Silo, who were prevail'd upon by the ſolicitation of Dellius, at the inſtance of Anthony, to help Herod into the poſſeſſion of his kingdom. But Ventidius was taken up with compoſing the broils that the Parthians had rais'd in the cities, and Silo was already corrupted by Antigonus in Judea. But Herod wanted no men, for they came in to him every day all the way he march'd; and the Galileans, all but a very few, went along with him entire. The firſt, and the moſt neceſſary thing he had in his thought, was the raiſing of the ſiege of Maſſada, to ſet his friends and his kindred at liberty: But Joppa was a block in his way, and the firſt obſtacle to be remov'd; for there was no meddling with Jeruſalem with that enemy at their backs. Silo took this occaſion to withdraw; and the Jews of Antigonus's party purſuing him, Herod, with a handful of men, fought and defeated them, and brought off Silo ſafe, after a faint and a weak reſiſtance.

Ventidius and Silo join Herod againſt Antigonus.

Silo deſerts.

JOPPA being now taken, Herod haſten'd away to ſet Maſſada free, the country very frankly joining with him; ſome for his father's ſake, ſome for his own, others in gratitude for the obligations they had to both; but the greater part of them for the hope of honour and reward. He was by this time maſter of a conſiderable army; but Antigonus did what he could, however, to obſtruct his paſſage, by planting ambuſhes in his way, tho' with little or no damage to the adverſe party. Herod, in fine, found no great difficulty in raiſing the ſiege, and in withdrawing his friends and his goods out of the caſtle. He advanced from thence to Jeruſalem, where divers of Silo's men and of the inhabitants came over to him, out of an awe they had for his power.

Maſſada reliev'd, and Herod advances to Jeruſalem.

HE pitch'd his camp upon the weſt-ſide of the town, whence the enemy gall'd him with ſhowers of darts and arrows, and the deſendants made ſeveral ſtrong ſallies upon his vanguard. The firſt thing Herod did, was the publiſhing of a proclamation quite round the walls of the city by a herald in form, ſetting forth that he had no other deſign in this expedition than the common good of the people, and the ſafety of the city, with the offer of an univerſal act of oblivion to all his enemies, of what degree ſoever, without exception. Antigonus's party, on the other hand, did all they could, with noiſe and clamour, to keep the people either from hearing the conditions of the declaration, or from being mov'd with the reaſon of it: and ſo he commanded his men to fall on; whereupon the beſiegers were beaten off with ſhot from the towers, and forc'd to a retreat.

Herod begirts the city, and offers an univerſal amneſty.

The beſiegers repuls'd.

THE corruption of Silo was now as clear as the ſun, by the clamours of the ſoldiers, that he had tamper'd and ſuborn'd to put all into a flame. "They were undone, (they cry'd) "for want of neceſſaries: They had neither "meat nor money; and as Antigonus had or-"der'd it, the skirts of the city were all eaten "up, and they were ruin'd for want of con-"venient winter-quarters." At this rate were the people animated to a revolt, and Silo would have gone off for company. This was ſo dangerous a practice, that Herod was glad to apply himſelf not only to Silo's officers, but to the common ſoldiery alſo, to prevent a worſe miſchief.

"FEL-

Herod composes the mutiny

"FELLOW soldiers (says he) you know very well, that I have the commission of Cesar, Anthony, and the senate, for what I do: Do but stay by me one day longer, and all your wants shall be supply'd." Upon this assurance, he went away himself to give orders for provision, and forthwith sent them so prodigious a quantity, that Silo's mouth was stopt, and no room left for any further complaint: And to secure them likewise for the future, he wrote to Samaria (which was then under his protection) to send him all manner of provisions to Jericho: as corn, wine, oil, cattle, &c. When Antigonus heard this, he presently dispatch'd his troops abroad, and laid ambushes to intercept the convoys. They follow'd their orders, and there was now a great army gotten together near Jericho, and parties up and down the mountains to obstruct any relief.

HEROD was not idle all this while, but with ten companies, five of which were Roman, and five Jewish, amongst whom were three hundred mercenaries, and a small body of horse, advanced to Jericho, where he found the city abandon'd, not a soul left in it, and only five hundred of the inhabitants, with their wives and families, fled to the mountains. These he took, and so dismiss'd them. The town had a world of rich pillage in it; which the Romans rifled and carry'd away: And Herod, leaving a garison in the place, went his way back again. The Roman troops had their winter-quarters assign'd them in the cities that came over to Herod; as Idumea, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus also, upon Silo's account, whom he had brib'd, had part of his army quater'd in Lydda, to stand fair with Anthony. The Romans were now easy and quiet, and in a full enjoyment of peace and plenty. But Herod could not yet be at rest; for he sent his brother Joseph, with four hundred horse and two thousand foot, to fortify Idumea, for fear Antigonus should enter upon any new practice; while he went himself, with his mother and the rest of his kindred, to Samaria, whom he had rescu'd at Massada. After the securing of his friends, he advanc'd into Galilee, to reduce certain garisons that Antigonus was possess'd of in that province. He came up to Sepphoris in a deep snow, and took the place without any difficulty, for the garison quitted it before it was invested. When he had staid there a while, and refresh'd his men after a winter's fatigue, (as there was great plenty of provisions) he turn'd his arms against the free-booters, who shelter'd themselves in caves, and by sallies and incursions made a worse ravage in the country than a regular war. He sent away three companies of foot, and a wing of horse before him, to Arbela, and follow'd them himself forty days after with the rest of his army. These robbers were not at all daunted with this incursion; but, on the contrary, advanc'd against them in a body, in the confidence they had of the conduct and courage of their leader. When the armies came afterward to an engagement, the thieves right wing put Herod's left wing to an absolute rout; but Herod wheeling immediately upon them with his right, did not only put a stop to the flight of his own men, but brought them on again with such a fury, that the robbers were not able to stand before him. He had the chace of them as far as the Jordan; a great many of them were cut off in the pursuit, and the rest got over the river. Galilee was now deliver'd from this pest, saying only some stragglers that kept still in their fastnesses, which was the occasion of Herod's staying a little lon- in the country.

Herod advances to Jericho.

An encounter betwixt Herod and the robbers.

HEROD, after this exploit, as the first fruits of his soldiers services, gave the common soldiers a hundred * and fifty drachma's a man, and to their officers so much more in proportion, and then dismiss'd them into their winter-quarters. He gave it in charge to his youngest brother Pheroras to take care for provisions, and likewise to run up a wall about the castle of Alexandrion, which was all done accordingly.

ANTHONY was now at Athens, and Ventidius sent to Silo and Herod, to join him in the war against the Parthians; but writing to them in the first place, to settle the affairs of Judea. Herod was well enough content to send Silo to Ventidius, while he himself advanc'd against the thieves again to ferret them out of their dens. Now these dens or caverns were in the craggs of the rocks, hardly accessable on any side, but by narrow turns and windings, and a direct precipice from top to bottom. The place was so steep and difficult, that it cost the king some time before he could resolve what to do; but he bethought himself at last of an experiment, bold and desperate enough. There were strong chests, with soldiers in them, let down with ropes from the top of the mountain to the mouth of the entrance into the cave. These soldiers destroy'd the theives in their holes, some with their arms, and others that resisted, with fire. When Herod had a mind to save any of them, a cryer summon'd them to come to him: But upon the main, there was not one man that render'd himself upon his own accord; and for those that were forced to it, a great many of them prefer'd death to captivity.

Herod attacks the thieves in their holes. A description of their caves and hiding-places.

THERE was one very remarkable passage: an old man, the father of seven sons, the mother and the children lay begging of him only for leave to get out, and render themselves to the enemy. This old man commanded them to come out one after another, and still as any of them appear'd, he put them to death. This spectacle struck Herod to the heart, who saw it from a place of prospect near at hand, and besought the poor man, with signs, and words at length, to spare his children: But no words or actions of tenderness had the least power to work upon him. The man went forward in his resolution, kill'd the children first, and then the mother, casting their dead bodies down the rock, and last of all himself; reproaching Herod for a man of an abject, mean spirit.

The wonderful resolution of an old man

* According to Calmet's tables, a drachma weighed two pennyweights six grains and three fourths; and its value in silver amounted to six pence three farthings and three eighths; one hundred and fifty silver drachma's therefore must amount to four pounds five shillings and six pence half penny; but this being the lowest valuation put upon it, and other authors valuing it at seven pence three farthings of our money, one hundred and fifty must amount to four pounds fifteen shillings and ten pence halfpenny. This calculation is made from the best authors; and tho' it does not exactly agree with our note at the bottom of pag. 369. the variation is so small, we hope our candid reader will pardon it.

WHEN

The country clear'd of the thieves.

WHEN Herod hunted the thieves out of their dens, he left only such a force behind him, as he thought sufficient to keep the peace. Ptolemy had the command of it; and so he return'd to Samaria; marching against Antigonus with three thousand foot arm'd with bucklers, and six hundred horse. The troublers of Galilee made advantage of Herod's absence, and fell upon Ptolemy by surprize, and kill'd him: they laid the country waste also, and then fled to bogs and defiles for their retreat. Herod had no sooner notice of this disorder, but he was in with them immediately, and cut off great numbers of their people; set all the castles at liberty that they had as good as block'd up, and fin'd the cities a hundred * talents for the riot.

Herod goes back to Samaria, and Ptolemy commands in his absence.

Ptolemy surpriz'd, and slain.

Herod returns, and disperses the thieves.

Ventidius assists Herod against Antigonus.

THE Parthians being now beaten, and Pacorus kill'd, Ventidius, by the order of Anthony, dispatch'd Macheras to Herod with a thousand horse, and two legions, against Antigonus; who sent Macheras a complaining letter of the indignities Herod had put upon him, with the offer of a considerable sum of money to enter into his interest: but Macheras stood off; partly for their sakes to whom he was recommended, and partly because Herod was the franker bidder of the two. But Macheras made fair however with Antigonus, and put on the countenance of a friendly disposition to discourse the matter with him: but his business, in truth, was only to sound him, and learn the state of his affairs, which was a method absolutely against the opinion and advice of Herod. Now Antigonus, suspecting his intention, did not only refuse him entrance upon his approach to the city; but kept him off from the walls with darts and arrows, as an actual enemy. Macheras was so asham'd of himself upon this disappointment, that he returned to Herod at † Ammaus; and in a rage put all the Jews to death that he could meet with, whether friends or foes, and the Herodians as well as the rest: neither did the favourers of Antigonus escape any better than their neighbours.

Macheras goes to Herod to Ammaus, and puts all the Jews there to death without distinction.

HEROD was so transported at this bloody outrage, that he was once thinking to take open revenge upon Macheras, as an open enemy: but upon second thoughts he check'd himself, and chose rather to carry the cause immediately to Anthony. Macheras was so conscious to himself of what he had done, that so soon as ever Herod was gone, he posted, in that instant, after him, and, overtaking him upon the way, after a thousand submissions, protestations, and other humble importunities, with much ado he made his peace. But this did not divert Herod yet from going to Anthony: so he went forward; and hearing upon the way, that Anthony was at that time with a great army before Samosata, (a strong place upon the Euphrates) he made the more haste to be up with him time enough to give some signal proofs of his faith and courage, and at the same time to ingratiate himself with Anthony. The arrival of Herod put a quick end to the siege: he destroy'd a multitude of the Barbarians, and a great part of the booty fell to his share. Anthony, who had always entertain'd a mighty value for Herod, had a greater esteem for him upon this occasion yet than ever; which contributed exceedingly to his honour, and to the hopes he had of establishing himself in the kingdom. Antiochus, in fine, was forc'd to deliver up Samosata.

WHILE these things pass'd, Herod's affairs met with bad success in Judea; which he left in his absence, under the absolute command of his brother Joseph; upon this express condition, not to attempt any thing against Antigonus before his return: his reason was, that he had a strong jealousy of Macheras, upon an old account, and durst not lay any stress upon his honesty. But Joseph, when his brother was at a distance, forgot that article, and march'd towards Jericho with five companies that Macheras had provided him, to carry off the corn that was then ripe upon the ground. The enemy fell upon him from the mountain, and, betwixt the advantages of the place, and the occasion, gave him an utter defeat; cutting all the Romans to pieces, and the general himself, who left behind him the character of a great and valiant man; these being only new-rais'd troops, levy'd in Syria, and no veterans among them, to supply the want of skill and experience in their fellows.

There was a great change in Idumea too; where Macheras repair'd the walls of the castle of Gath. A fore-boding dream of Herod's

While Herod was at Daphne, (the ſuburbs of Antioch) he had a manifeſt preſage of the death of his brother, in a dream. He leapt out of his bed upon't, and the meſſengers that brought the news, came into his chamber at that very inſtant. The ſurprize ſtruck him at firſt; but when his ſorrow had vented itſelf a little, he diſpatch'd away with all poſſible ſpeed, to find out the enemy. Coming to Libanus, he took eight hundred inhabitants of the place, and one Roman cohort to his aſſiſtance. With this body he enter'd Galilee before day, charg'd the enemy, and beat them back into the caſtle whence they came. He ſat down before it, and aſſaulted it day after day; but before he could make himſelf maſter of it, the winter came on ſo faſt, that he was fain to draw off his army into the next village. Anthony, ſome few days after this, ſent him an enforcement of another company; which put the garriſon into ſuch an apprehenſion, that they ſecretly abandon'd the caſtle by night.

Herod's next remove was in all haſte to Jericho, to take his revenge for the death of his brother; where he was preſerv'd by a providence ſo wonderful, that it fell little ſhort of a miracle; but God in his goodneſs had him under his particular care. Herod had had at ſupper with him, that night, ſeveral perſons of the firſt quality, and ſo ſoon as the entertainment was over, the houſe clear'd, and the company gone, the roof of the eating-room fell flat down to the ground. He took this remarkable eſcape for ſo auſpicious a preſage, with a reſpect to the war he was engag'd in, that he decamped next morning early. The enemy, in a body of about ſix thouſand, came down the mountains, and had a skirmiſh with his van-guard; but they did not much preſs to any action with the Romans, only they aſſaulted them with darts and ſtones at a diſtance, and Herod himſelf, as he paſs'd by, receiv'd a wound in his ſide.

A ſtrange eſcape of Herod's upon the fall of a dining-room

Antigonus, valuing himſelf upon being thought Herod's ſuperior, both for number and courage, ſent Pappus, a familiar friend of his, with a body of men into Samaria, to try an encounter with Macheras. Herod, in the mean time, took five towns, and ravaged the enemy's country, deſtroy'd two thouſand of the inhabitants, lay'd their houſes in aſhes, and ſo return'd to the army not far from a village call'd Cana. There came to him every day great numbers of Jews: ſome from Jericho, ſome from other places; ſome out of ſpite to Antigonus, and ſome again in reſpect to Herod: nay, ſome there were ſo ſenſeleſs, that they lov'd change purely for change ſake. Now the thing that Herod's heart was moſt ſet upon, was to puſh it to a battle; and Pappus, with his men on the other hand, was as ready to try the event: ſo that his troops, without any dread, either of force or numbers, march'd fiercely up to the combat. When they came to charge, Pappus's men, upon the main, made a tolerable reſiſtance; but wherever Herod came, he was ſo tranſported with the ſpirit of revenge for his brother's death, that his enemies fled before him. It was his method, wherever he ſaw them in a body, to break them into a diſorder, and by that means he put them all to flight.

A terrible ſlaughter and confuſion

There was a terrible ſlaughter: ſome beaten back into the place whence they came, and ſome running one way ſome another; Herod ſtill preſſing and purſuing them, till at laſt he fell furiouſly in with them into the town. The houſes were preſently crouded with fugitives, and the very roofs cover'd with them. But thoſe were eaſily deſtroy'd; and then, upon beating down the buildings, ſeveral periſh'd under the ruins, and others by the ſword; and they that eſcap'd the one, were deſtroy'd by the other. The ſtreets, in fine, were ſo block'd up with piles of carcaſſes, that the conquerors found ſome difficulty to march over the dead bodies. The ſpectacle was ſo frightful, that the people were not able to ſtand the very ſight of it. In the flush of this ſucceſs, Herod had certainly march'd directly to Jeruſalem, if the extream rigour of the ſeaſon had not made the ways impaſſable. This was the only thing that hinder'd the perfecting of his victory, and the irreparable ruin of Antigonus; who was now diſpoſing of himſelf to quit the city.

A providential deliverance.

Herod, in the evening, having diſcharg'd his friends to refreſh themſelves after the fatigue of the day, went to bathe himſelf, as is uſual in ſuch caſes, being hot and ſweaty, with only one ſervant to attend him. As he was in his way to the bath, one of Antigonus's ſoldiers met him with a ſword drawn; and after him another, and another, and ſtill more. Now theſe were men that fled thither with their arms, out of the battle, for ſanctuary. Upon the ſight of the king, they fell into ſuch a dread and trembling, that they minded nothing but the ſaving of themſelves, and ſo paſs'd by him. It ſo happen'd, that no body being at hand to ſeize them, they all got off; and, as providence would have it, Herod eſcap'd untouch'd. On the day following, he order'd the head of Pappus (Antigonus's general) to be ſtruck off, and ſent it to his brother Pheroras, in revenge for the blood of Joſeph; for it was Pappus that kill'd him.

Pappus's head ſtruck off in revenge for Joſeph.

Herod lays ſiege to Jeruſalem.

When the winter was well over, Herod advanc'd to Jeruſalem, drew his men to the walls, and, for the advantage of the attack, encamp'd before the temple; being the quarter from whence Ptolemy took it formerly. This was the third year after Herod's being declared king at Rome. He aſſign'd all his troops their offices and ſtations, and every man his poſt in the ſuburbs; he order'd the caſting up of three ramparts, and the building of turrets over them: and, when he had given theſe commiſſions in charge, to his friends and officers that he could beſt confide in, he went himſelf to Samaria, to conſummate a mariage with Mariamne, (the daughter of Ariſtobulus the ſon of Alexander) to whom he had been contracted ſome time before: ſo that the ſiege and the match went on together, in contempt of his enemies; as who ſhould ſay, I have time enough for both.

Upon his marriage, he came back to Jeruſalem, with ſeveral additional troops, beſides a ſtrong body of horſe and foot, under Soſius the Roman general, who was ſent to join him: the greater part of them took their march by the way of the midland, and he himſelf by Phenicia. The whole army, upon the muſter, amounted to eleven legions, and ſix thouſand horſe; beſides a ſtrong enforcement of Syrian auxiliaries. They order'd the aſſault upon the north north ſide. Herod founded his right upon the decree of the ſenate that made him king; and Soſius pleaded the commiſſion of Anthony, for the aſſiſtance of Herod with the troops under his command.

THE Jews within the city were now in a very great confuſion and diſtreſs; the meaner ſort of them gathering together about the temple, and paſſing their judgments upon the times, in a kind of an enthuſiaſtical way of fore-boding calamities to come. The bolder part of this rabble paſſed up and down, and pillaged whatever they could come at; eſpecially near the town, where they left no neceſſaries, neither for horſe, nor man. The ſoldiery, all this while, omitted nothing for the defence of the place. They kept the beſiegers off from their walls, and ſtill oppoſed one inſtrument and one ſtratagem to another: but their greateſt excellency lay in mining, and breaking in upon the enemy before they were aware. The king, on the other hand, took care to provide againſt the excurſions of the robbers, and for a ſupply of proviſions, by convoys and tranſportations from abroad, to anſwer the neceſſities of the people. The Jews muſt be allow'd to have been bold and daring in battle, even to the higheſt degree: but yet, when it came to military skill and addreſs, they were conſtantly outdone by the Romans; ſtill maintaining the diſpute, however, tho' they were in a manner ſure to die for't. And in caſe of any ſurprizing attempt of the enemy from their trenches, by ſally, or attack, they found ſome way or other in an inſtant, to make all good: and, in one word, they ſpar'd for neither art nor labour, in the reſolution they had taken to defend it to the laſt. But, after a five months defence againſt ſo vaſt an army, a ſelect party of Herod's men were ſo hardy at laſt as to mount the wall, with ſome of Soſius's centurions to ſecond them; and ſo they brake into the city. The firſt thing they did, after their entrance, was to poſt themſelves round the temple, and as near it as they could get; while the army diſpers'd itſelf, and carry'd death and deſolation along with it, in the moſt hideous forms, wherever it mov'd. The Romans were outrageous, in revenge for the hardſhips they had endur'd in the ſiege, and the cruelty of the Herodian Jews was an inplacable ſpite, for fear any of their adverſaries ſhould eſcape. The narrow paſſages, and the houſes, were all fill'd, and peſter'd with heaps of dead bodies. They ſpar'd neither age nor ſex, and the temple itſelf was no longer a ſanctuary. Nay, tho' the king himſelf commanded them every where upon their allegiance to hold their hands, they nevertheleſs executed their revenge with a moſt mercileſs and inhuman fury.

Jeruſalem taken by aſſault.

ANTIGONUS, in this hurry and confuſion, was ſo mean and heartleſs, that, without any regard to his quality, or to his paſt or preſent fortune, he came down from Baris, and caſt himſelf at the feet of Soſius; who, without any ſort of pity for his calamity, received him with this taunt, that his name ſhould be no longer Antigonus, but Antigona. But tho' he behav'd himſelf like a woman, he was not us'd like one; for he was laid in chains, and kept a priſoner. Herod's enemies were now at his mercy, but his friends were yet ſo troubleſome, that he had much ado to keep his auxiliaries and ſtrangers quiet; for the multitude preſs'd ſo violently into the temple, out of a rude curioſity to ſee the holy furniture and conſecrated veſſels, that Herod had enough to do, by fair means and foul, as menaces, entreaties, nay, and ſometimes with blows, to keep them in order: accounting upon it, that his victory would be worſe than a defeat, if he ſhould ſuffer thoſe ſacred privacies to be expos'd to common eyes, which the law had kept in reſerve.

HE proceeded then to the regulation of the ſoldiery, in the matter of pillage; telling Soſius, that, at that rate of leaving neither men nor money, the Romans would render him a king of a deſart, rather than of a city and people; and that, to gain the whole world, he would not be a governor upon thoſe terms. Soſius made this reply, that he thought the ſoldiers, after what they had done and ſuffer'd, might be allowed ſome ſort of right to the advantage of the booty. You ſpeak reaſon, ſays Herod; take my word and honour for it, that I will ſee juſtice done to every man of them out of my own fortune. By this way of proceeding, Herod preſerv'd the remainder of his country, and afterward made good his promiſe to the army: for there was not a common ſoldier that had not his donative, and the officers were all rewarded in proportion, even to Soſius himſelf; and to ſuch a degree, that every perſon was abundantly ſatisfy'd. Soſius, after this, dedicated a golden crown to God; and, leaving Jeruſalem, carry'd Antigonus away bound to Anthony, flattering himſelf all the way with the hope of life, to the very minute of his execution, when his head was cut off for not deſerving to live.

Antigonus loſes his head

THE multitude of the city were divided, and Herod diſtinguiſh'd party from party accordingly; treating his friends with great honour and kindneſs, to make the ſurer of them; but the Antigonians he put to death. When he fell ſhort of mony, he divided what he had that was precious, betwixt Anthony and thoſe about him whom he had the moſt value for; but all this was not enough to ſecure him yet; for Anthony was at this time beſotted with the love of Cleopatra, and ſo abandon'd to his paſſion, that he could deny her nothing. Now Cleopatra had already fallen ſo bloodily upon her own relations, that when ſhe had not left one near kinſman living, ſhe turn'd the point of her rage againſt ſtrangers; by calumniating men of honour and quality to Anthony, and prevailing with him to have them put to death, as the ready way to make her miſtreſs of their eſtates. Her avarice tranſported her ſo far, after this, againſt the Jews and Arabians, that ſhe enter'd into a ſecret practice againſt the lives of their kings themſelves, Herod and Malichus. Anthony held her in hand upon it, with fair words, and ſeeming compliances: but for taking away the lives of two good men, and two ſuch princes, it was ſo execrable a propoſition, he could not but have a horrour for it. He went ſo far, however, as to break friendſhip with them, and to put her in poſſeſſion of a conſiderable part of their territories: as for inſtance, the lands in Jericho, ſo famous for palm-trees and balſam, and all the cities upon the river Eleutherus, except Tyre and Sidon. When he had gratify'd her with this preſent, ſhe accompany'd him as far as the Euphrates in his expedition againſt againſt the Parthians, and ſo took her away into Judea by Apamia and Damaſcus.

HEROD had already parted with large ſums toward the mollifying of Cleopatra; but her ill-nature was ſo implacable, and ſo inſatiable was her avarice, that all this would not do, without extorting an annuity of two * hundred talents out of the revenue of Judea; and ſo, with great obſequiouſneſs and reſpect, he conducted her to Peluſium. It was not long before Anthony came back from the Parthian war, with † Artabazes the ſon of Tigranes his priſoner, whom he made a preſent of to Cleopatra, with the whole booty.

Anthony goes to the Parthian war, A. M. 3971. A. C. 33.

UPON the breaking out of the war at Actium, Herod was now at liberty, and propoſed to himſelf to accompany Anthony in that expedition; for he had gotten  Hyrcania into his hands, from the ſiſter of Antigonus: and all things were now compos'd and eaſy at home. But Cleopatra, for fear of Herod's being companion in the dangers with Anthony, craftily diverted him from his deſign. This princeſs, having a mortal hatred for both the kings, perſuaded Anthony to commit the Parthian war to Herod; "for, (ſays ſhe to her-"ſelf) if he get the better of it, I ſhall be "queen of Arabia; and if he be worſted, of "of Judea:" propounding only the daſhing of the one againſt the other. This advice happen'd well enough for Herod, who, having gotten together a mighty body of horſe, ſent them againſt the Syrians near Dioſpolis, where he fell upon them; the Syrians made a gallant reſiſtance, for a while, but in the end were beaten out of the field. Upon this defeat, the Arabians drew out a prodigious army, and poſted themſelves at *† Canatha in Cele-Syria, there to expect the coming up of the Jews. Herod was now advancing toward them, but, upon ſight of their numbers and diſpoſition, he found it convenient to keep himſelf upon a more than ordinary guard, and therefore order'd the running of a wall about the camp. But the people were ſo puff'd up with one victory that Herod's precaution would not be comply'd with, they thought, to make them wait for another: ſo that without any more ceremony they fell on, and routed the Arabians at the very firſt puſh; but upon the purſuit, Herod fell into an ambuſcade of a body of Canathenes, that were ſent in by Athenion to the relief of the Arabians, and very narrowly eſcap'd. Now this Athenion was an officer of Cleopatra's, and ever a mortal enemy to Herod. Upon the encouragement of this relief, the Arabians took heart, rally'd, and came on again; ſcatter'd the Herodians, and, following them cloſe through craggs and woods, they kill'd great numbers of them in the chace. They that eſcap'd the battle, fled to a neighbouring village call'd Ormiza, where they were coop'd up and ſurrounded; and the Arabians made themſelves maſters of their camp, and the men that were in it. Immediately after this misfortune, Herod came up with ſuccours; but the miſchief being firſt done, there was no remedy. This diſaſter was all along of the contumacy and diſobedience of his officers: for if they had not been ſo haſty and hot-headed, Athenion could never have had an opportunity to put his plot in execution. But Herod reveng'd himſelf afterwards on the Arabians over and over, by ſurprizes and incurſions into their country, and aton'd by ſeveral little victories for one great defeat.

Herod takes his revenge.

The craft and treachery of Cleopatra

Herod would have aſſiſted Anthony againſt Auguſtus, and ſhe hinder'd him

Herod defeats the Syrians, and is routed himſelf afterwards by the Arabians

WHILE Herod was in the courſe of his ſucceſſes, there befel him a moſt judicial calamity. This was in the ſeventh year of his reign, and in the beginning of the ſpring, when the war at Actium was at the hotteſt. There happen'd at this time ſo dreadful an earthquake, that it ſwallow'd up cattle innumerable, together with thirty thouſand people; but the army that lay in the field ſuffer'd nothing. It was, in truth, a diſmal accident; but report (as it is uſual) making it much greater than in effect it was, the Arabians took it for granted that Judea was totally ſunk and loſt, and flatter'd themſelves with an opinion that they might without difficulty go and make themſelves maſters of the whole province. In this confidence they put certain Jewiſh embaſſadors that were then with them to death, and, without any more ado, advanc'd into the country to take poſſeſſion of it. This formidable inroad of the Arabians ſtruck the Jews with ſuch a terror, (eſpecially conſidering the heart-broken condition they were in at that time, with one calamity upon the neck of another) that Herod was fain to try if he could reaſon a diſtracted, ſpiritleſs people, into their reſolutions and wits again.

A prodigious earthquake in Judea.

Several Jewiſh embaſſadors put to death upon it.

The Jews in a conſternation.

"You are here, in my opinion, (ſays He-"rod) under a moſt unreaſonable apprehen-"ſion. I will allow you (ſays he) to indulge "your ſorrows under the hand of an offended "God; but to ſubject yourſelves to the ſame "deſpondencies and paſſions, for fear of the "power of men, is a meanneſs of ſoul "below the ordinary pitch of your courage. "Nay, ſo far am I from any dread of "an enemy, after this earthquake, that it "looks to me rather as if providence "had order'd the enſnaring of your ad-"verſaries by this temptation, into a ven-"geance for the injuries they have done you: "neither do they lay ſo much ſtreſs upon the "force of their own arms or valour, as upon "the opinion they have of our abjection and "miſery. But thoſe are falſe hopes, when "men ſupport themſelves upon the infirmities "of other people, rather than upon their own

"virtue:

" virtue: nor is there any certainty, either in " prosperous, or adverse fortune; but they " are both unsteddy, and take their turns; " and, for a confirmation of this doctrine, you " need go no farther than to the late battle, " where we were masters one hour, and at " mercy next. This is the very case of our " enemies at present, or I am much deceiv'd: " they think they take, and they are taken. " People that are over-confident are unwary; " but a considerable fear makes men provi- " dent; so that the very ground of your ap- " prehension is the foundation of my assu- " rance. You would needs be charging the " enemy contrary to order, and forwarder than " you should have been, and Athenion (you " see) made advantage of your error. But you " yourselves are now upon the reserve; your " deliberations are sober, and not fantastical, " which is a disposition that I look upon as " an omen of a certain victory. This is the " right temper of a brave man, before he " comes into action: but let him keep his fire " and heat to himself, till he has occasion for " it in the field. And so let it be your busi- " ness now, to convince your wicked enemies " by force of arms, that the Jews will sooner " part with their lives than their reputation, " and stand firm at last under all judgments " and misfortunes, and never own the Arabi- " ans for their masters, who have so often been " their slaves.

" But why this fear at last for things inani- " mate? how comes an earth-quake to be a " portent, or a presage of things to come? is " there any thing more natural than the agi- " tations and disorders of the elements? they " do not foretel calamities, but they actually " bring and create them. 'Tis possible that " there may be some fore-running signs of " plagues, famine, and earth-quakes to come; " but, when they are once come, the greater " they are the sooner will they be over. Or " put the case we should be conquer'd now, " pray which is worse, the war, or the earth- " quake? but here's a destination of these " people to ruin even by their own hands, " without the help of enemies, who could be " so impious and inhuman, as, contrary to the " laws of nature and nations, to dip their hands " in the blood of our embassadors, and dedi- " cate the sacrifice to God for the success of " the war. Can they ever think to escape the " all-seeing eye, and the almighty power of a " vindictive God, whenever we shall but rouze " in us the courage and zeal of our forefathers, " and call these perfidious violators of leagues " and publick faith to a severe and just account? " Wherefore stand up, my brave fellow-sol- " diers, not for your wives, children, or country; " but to revenge the murder of your embassa- " dors, whose very blood will consecrate the " cause, and those heroes, dead as they are, " will do you more good in the head of your " army, than the living commanders of it. " Do you but follow where I'll lead you, and " I'll ask no more. Only one word of caution; " be not over hot and rash, and when it comes " to the push, they will not dare to look you " in the face."

THIS exhortation put the soldiers in such heart, that Herod clos'd with the good humour, and sacrific'd; and so, without any delay, pass'd his army over the river Jordan. He pitch'd his camp at Philadelphia, not far from the enemy, with a castle between them, which look'd as if that castle were to be the subject of the dispute. Herod, at that distance, provok'd the enemy to a battle, desiring nothing more than to bring it to a speedy tryal. The enemy had already sent soldiers before, to take possession of this castle, but the Herodians without much difficulty beat them back, and gain'd the hill. Herod drew out every day in order of battle, to dare the Arabians to a combat; but when he saw they would not answer the challenge, (for they were all in a consternation, and Elthemus their General above the rest) Herod attack'd them in their trenches, and so forc'd them to a battle; but in such a disorder they were, horse and foot marching out together, that it was all hurry and confusion. They did indeed exceed the Jews in number, but fell much short of them in valour, though one would have thought their very desparation should have made them bolder. The slaughter was not great so long as they stood their ground; but when they turn'd their backs once, betwixt those that fell in the pursuit, and those that were trampled to death by their own people, there were five thousand destroy'd, and the rest were driven into their camp, where Herod presently hemm'd them in, and besieg'd them; and this was not all neither, for the extremity they were in for want of water, was a misery equal to all the rest. In this streight they sent embassadors to Herod, with an offer of fifty * talents for a composition; but he treated them with contempt, and would not so much as give them the hearing. They came out after this in troops, in the torment of a raging, burning thirst, and deliver'd themselves up to the Jews at discretion; so that in five days the Jews had four thousand of them in bonds. Upon the sixth day, the remainder of them, in a transport of despair, provok'd the Jews to a battle, where about seven thousand more were kill'd upon the place. This blow finish'd Herod's revenge upon the Arabians; for it humbled them to that degree, that they chose him afterwards for their protector.

The army take heart upon Herod's exhortation. Herod sacrifices.

He forces the Arabians to a battle.

And gives them a total overthrow.

The Arabians surrender at discretion.

And petition Herod to take them into his protection.

HEROD's affairs went well enough at present; but the news of Anthony's defeat at Actium (for whom he had the greatest friendship in the world) gave him great anxiety; tho' his fear was, in some respect, more than needed; for Cesar could never think Anthony absolutely suppress'd, so long as Herod was living. Upon this turn of fortune, Herod bethought himſelf how he might obviate all difficulties, and ſo went to Rhodes where Ceſar was at that time. He preſented himſelf without any enſigns of royalty about him, and in the habit of a private man; but with a mien of majeſty behaving himſelf with great candour, and frankneſs, and this was his declaration.

A generous addreſs of Herod's to Auguſtus at Rhodes.

"I muſt confeſs, mighty Ceſar, (ſays he) "that as Anthony made me a king, I was not "wanting to employ the kingly powers he "gave me to the ſervice of my benefactor, "from whom I receiv'd them; and, if I may "ſpeak freely, you yourſelf, Sir, would have "found the effects of that juſtice, if I had not "been diverted by the Arabian war: but this "did not hinder me yet from ſending him "what ſupplies I could, both of troops and "proviſions; neither hath this laſt fatal blow "at Actium, ſtagger'd me one jot in my gra-"titude and juſtice to my patron. I could "not furniſh him, 'tis true, with men and "arms, nor attend him in perſon; but I gave "him good counſel, that would have been of "more worth to him, if he had follow'd it: "which was to rid his hands of Cleopatra; "for ſo long as ſhe liv'd, he could never be "ſafe; and that being done, I promis'd him "moneys, ſtrong holds, troops, nay, and my-"ſelf too for a party to the war againſt you: "but betwixt the love of Cleopatra that hin-"der'd him on the one ſide, and the ſecret "appointments of providence that gave you "victory on the other, it came all to nothing. "Now ſo it is, great prince, that Anthony's "fate and mine are wrapt up in one. We both "fell on the ſame day, and with his fortune "I have now laid down my crown. I have "no pretence, Sir, to your clemency and fa-"vour, but under the character of an honeſt "man, and a true friend.

"WELL! Herod, (ſays Ceſar) be ſafe and "happy, and a king ſtill; and depend upon "it that your crown ſhall ſit ſurer on your "head than ever. So good a friend cannot "but make a good governor. Pray be as "faithful to the fortunate as you have been "to the contrary; and I cannot but promiſe "myſelf great things from the dignity of ſo "great a mind. As to Anthony's hearkening "to Cleopatra rather than to you, his folly "has made us all gainers; for we had never "had Herod elſe. I muſt not forget the en-"forcements you ſent to * Ventidius againſt "Anthony's gladiators, and that you were "before-hand with me in that obligation. "Wherefore content yourſelf at preſent with "the confirmation of the kingdom to you, and "I ſhall take ſuch further care for the future, "that you may never be ſenſible of the want "of Anthony.

Ceſar's goodneſs and humanity to Herod in return.

CESAR, after this ſpeech, with great humanity adjur'd Herod not to doubt of his friendſhip; and ſo placing the crown upon his head, confirm'd his title to it by an act of ſtate, with glorious expreſſions in it much to his honour. When Herod had prepar'd his way by fair words and large preſents, he made interceſſion to Ceſar on the behalf of one Alexander, a friend of Anthony's, to get his pardon; but Ceſar was too much exaſperated againſt Alexander to grant his requeſt; telling him, that the affronts he ſuffer'd for were wholly unpardonable.

Herod begs Alexander's pardon, but Ceſar refuſes it.

Herod's magnificence entertainment of Ceſar in Syria.

As Ceſar was afterward paſſing thro' Syria into Egypt, Herod receiv'd him upon the way with a moſt incredible magnificence; and while Ceſar was taking a review of his troops, he cauſed Herod to ride about Ptolemais along with him, where he treated Auguſtus, and all his friends and army, with all imaginable ſplendor, order, and plenty. He took care alſo for the ſupply of water, for all that journeyed to and from Peluſium, and other dry places, with all ſorts of utenſils and neceſſaries even for common uſe. This illuſtrious expence gave occaſion to Ceſar and his train, to ſay, that the kingdom of Judea was too little for the mind of ſo great a prince.

Herod confirmed in his government, with large additions.

CLEOPATRA and Anthony being both dead when Ceſar came into Egypt, Ceſar did not only confer new honours upon Herod, but annexed to his kingdom that part of the borders which Cleopatra had taken from him, with Gadara, Hippon, Samaria, and the maritime cities Gaza Anthedon, Joppa, and the tower of Straton: he gave him alſo four hundred Gauls, which had been formerly of the guards to Cleopatra. Now Ceſar proportion'd all his bounties to the merit and virtue of the receiver. After the firſt † Actias, he gave him alſo the province of Trachon, annexing it to his command; and ſo likewiſe Batanea and Auranitis, upon this account.

IT was a common and a conſtant practice of Zenodorus, who liv'd in a houſe he had hir'd of Lyſanias, to ſend thieves out of Trachon to Damaſcus. The inhabitants apply'd themſelves to Varus (at that time governor of Syria) for relief, begging him to acquaint Ceſar with the miſery of their condition. Varus did it accordingly, and Ceſar's anſwer was, that he ſhould utterly ſuppreſs all robbers, and robberies. Varus ſent parties abroad into all ſuſpected places, and ſo clear'd the land of † i. e. In the beginning of the ſecond year after the battle at Actium. This Æra, or reckoning of time, took its riſe from the naval victory, there obtain'd over Marc Anthony, and Cleopatra queen of Egypt, by Ceſar Auguſtus; who, upon this, (ſaith Dion) becoming himſelf monarch of the world, gave command that the empire ſhould begin to compute their acts from this day's atchievement; which, according to Dion, was the ſecond of September. It was in the year of the world 3919, and 4683 of the Julian period; as otherwiſe, and alſo by an eclipſe noted in the Faſti Siculi, 'tis manifeſt: yet, by the decree of the ſenate, this Æra was fixed in the deſtruction of Alexandria, which was taken Auguſt the 29th of the year following; 'twas the 16th Julian year, and the 294th from the death of Alexander.

Till this time the Egyptian account, meaſured by Nabonaſſar's year, conſiſting of three hundred ſixty five days, without any intercalation of the odd hours, had been in uſe; in the place whereof the Julian form ſucceeded. And becauſe the Egyptians called every day in the year by the name of ſome God, which were therefore called ἡμέραι Θεῶν, and every year of their luſtrum's or quadriennals in like manner, which were therefore called ἔτη Θεῶν, Anni Deorum, theſe years were henceforth called in honour of Auguſtus, Anni Auguſtorum Deorum, or Anni Auguſtorum, as 'tis recorded by Cenſorinus, who only mentioneth them by this name.

This Æra Actiaca, or (as Joſephus calls it) Actias, continued in uſe till the time of Diocletian, who having gained himſelf an opinion of wiſdom and fortune among his people, thought himſelf worthy from whom the computation ſhould now begin; which was accordingly done, and this Æra hereupon abrogated, after it had continued upwards of three hundred years.

Herod made governour of all Syria.

AUGUSTUS coming into that province again about ten years after, caution'd the governors in all matters of importance to conſult Herod; and Zenodorus being then dead, he gave Herod likewiſe all the land betwixt Trachon and Galilee. But the thing at laſt that Herod valu'd himſelf upon, above all the reſt, was this; that Herod was belov'd by Ceſar, above all men living, next to Agrippa, and by Agrippa, next to Ceſar. From theſe circumſtances he was advanc'd to the higheſt ſtate of human felicity, and his mind grew more and more illuſtrious with his fortune; for he employ'd the greateſt part of his acquiſitions in works and offices of piety and religion.

Among other eminent buildings, he did likewiſe erect a majeſtick temple, with an Area about it of three † furlongs and a half, and this temple he dedicated to Auguſtus.

Sebaſte in Samaria.

CESAR, after this, gave Herod an additional donative of lands; and Herod, in acknowledgment, built another temple alſo of white poliſh'd marble, near the head of the river Jordan, at a place called  Panium; and this was alſo dedicated to Ceſar. Not far from hence ſtands a mountain of a prodigious height, that looks down among the craggs and rocks into a deep valley; and at the bottom, a dark hideous cavern, that's worn and hollow'd to ſuch a depth, by the conſtant fall of waters upon it from above, that there's no ſounding of it. From the foot of this cavern, there comes bubbling forth an iſſue of ſeveral ſprings; and this by tradition paſſes for the ſource of the river Jordan. But we ſhall ſpeak farther to the matter of fact hereafter.

Ceſar's bounty to Herod

IT was much after the ſame manner alſo at Jericho, where Herod cauſed to be erected, betwixt the caſtle of Cypros and the old palaces, ſome other buildings more commodious; and theſe he call'd by the names of the ſame perſons. Herod, in fine, did not leave one conſiderable place in the whole kingdom, without ſome monumental memorial to the fame of Ceſar. When he had adorn'd his borders with temples, he did the like in the provinces, diſtinguiſhing ſeveral of them by the name of Ceſarea.

AS Herod was in his progreſs along the coaſt, he took notice of one maritime city among the reſt, with all the decays upon it of time and antiquity; 'twas known by the name of Straton's tower, and a place, for the quality and ſituation of it, worthy of Herod's royal care and bounty. This caſtle he did not only repair with beautiful white ſtone, but erected alſo a princely palace there, and never gave a clearer proof of the natural dignity of his mind than upon this inſtance. It lies betwixt Dora and Joppa, where the coaſt is ſo unfit for an harbour for ſhips, and the paſſage ſo dangerous, that whoever takes his courſe that way toward Egypt from Phenicia, runs a great riſk of a miſcarriage; eſpecially with the leaſt breath of a ſouth-weſt-wind, which ſets ſo hard upon the rocks, that it breaks back again in eddies, and makes a troubled ſea for a good while after. But the king's liberality and reſolution, in ſpite of charge and of nature itſelf, ſurmounted all oppoſition, and he built a port there, larger than the Pyreneum itſelf, with ſtations for the faireſt ſhips to ride ſafe in, againſt wind and weather. It was ſo fortify'd, in fine, againſt the impetuous violences of the ſea, and the ornaments of it ſo agreeable to the eye, that nothing could be added, either to the ſtrength, or to the beauty of the contrivance. Upon Herod's taking his meaſures for the dimenſions of the port, he order'd mighty ſtones to be caſt into the ſea, at twenty fathom water; the greater part of them fifty foot in length, nine foot deep, and ten over, and ſome bigger than theſe. When they had fill'd up the ſpace to the ſurface of the water, they carry'd on a wall of two hundred foot; the one half to break the force of the ſea, in the nature of a mole, from whence Straton's tower repair'd.

And a ſtately palace erected.

they

they took the name of Procymea; and the other, for the ſupport of the turrets that were planted upon it, which were great and graceful; and he gave the faireſt of them the name of Druſion, in a compliment to Druſus, Ceſar's kinſman. There were alſo a great number of vaults for ſtores; and before, and about theſe vaults, a paving of large ſtones, that ſerv'd paſſengers both for a landing-place and for a walk. It fronted toward the north, which upon that quarter is the gentleſt wind that blows. On each ſide of the entrance, there ſtood three Coloſſes mounted upon pillars: thoſe on the left hand, at the going in, were ſupported by a ſtrong tower of one entire ſtone; and thoſe on the right were borne up by two large ſtones, column-wiſe, and joined together, over-topping the other. The buildings next the port were all of white ſtone, and the ſtreets that led from the city to the key uniform and anſwering one another. Upon a hill, over againſt the port-gate, ſtood * Ceſar's temple, a piece incomparable, both for majeſty and beauty; and in that temple Ceſar's ſtatue, a work not inferiour, either for curioſity or bulk, to that of the Olympian Jupiter, and made after that model; † as alſo another of Rome, that did not fall ſhort of Juno's at Argos. Herod's deſign in the building of this ſtately town and port, was the advantage of the province, and the ſecurity of travellers that way; but Ceſar all this while was to be reputed the founder of it, and it was called Ceſarea after his name.

A theatre and amphitheatre

Agrippion erected to the honour of Agrippa

Antipatris in the memory of Antipater.

Cypros from Cypris.

THERE were alſo ſeveral famous works and bounties of Herod not to be forgotten; as a famous market-place, a theatre, an amphitheatre, and the inſtitution of the Ludi Quinquennales to be celebrated every fifth year, which he dedicated to the honour of Auguſtus. He was the firſt alſo, who, in the hundred ninety and ſecond Olympiad, propounded honourable rewards, not only to him who ſhould carry the prize in the firſt place, but to the ſecond and the third alſo, in their courſe, one after another. He repair'd Anthedon, that had been ruin'd by the war, and call'd it Agrippion; and, out of a generous exceſs of tenderneſs for his friend, he inſcrib'd Agrippa's name upon the gate of the temple that he had built there.

HE was alſo as dutiful a ſon, as he was a generous friend and patriot; for he erected a city to the honour of his father, in the moſt pleaſant and fruitful part of his dominions, and moſt deliciouſly wooded and water'd, which he called Antipatris. There was a caſtle alſo over Jericho, which, by ſituation, was both ſtrong and delightful. This place he wall'd in, and, in honour to his mother, gave it the name of Cypros. Neither did he forget his brother Phaſael, upon ſeveral occaſions; as in a tower he built at Jeruſalem, which he call'd after his name; (I ſhall ſay ſomewhat of the compaſs, and the glory of it elſewhere) and ſo likewiſe another city in the country, to the north of Jericho, which he call'd alſo by the ſame name.

WHEN he had done honour to his friends and relations, he did not abſolutely forget himſelf; for he built and fortified a caſtle upon a mountain of Arabia, which he call'd by his own name, Herodion. And he gave the ſame name alſo to a hill that he caſt up, in the form of a woman's breaſt, at about ſixty  furlongs from Jeruſalem; which was ſet out with great care and expence: and this mount was encompaſs'd, at the top, with round turrets, the circuit of it fill'd with royal palaces, as rich and ſparkling, both within and without, as art, care, and coſt could make them. He ſupply'd it with water from a very great diſtance, and at a mighty charge. The ſtairs were all of pure white marble, and two hundred ſteps up to the top. This eminence was all the work of art and labour, and of a wonderful height. Now at the foot of it he built a princely palace, and provided for inns alſo, and houſes of entertainment, where he might diſpoſe of his friends and their luggage; inſomuch that, conſidering the proviſion that was made for all manner of conveniencies, it ſeem'd to be a city rather than a caſtle; yet, in the main, it was all no more than the king's houſe.

And Herodion from Herod.

BUT after theſe glorious ſtructures, Herod could not yet be ſatisfy'd, unleſs he made ſtrangers alſo partakers of his generoſity and good will to mankind; for at Tripolis, Damaſcus, and Ptolemais, he caus'd publick baths to be ſet up; ſtrong walls at Biblis, galleries, council-chambers, publick magazines, market-places, and temples, at Berytas and Tyre; theatres at Sidon and Damaſcus, an aqueduct at Laodicea, upon the coaſt, water-works and baths at Askalon, with cloiſters and piazza's, every way admirable both for the work and ſize. In ſome caſes he gave woods and harbours, and upon other cities he beſtow'd lands, as if he had made them ſharers in his kingdom. In ſome places again, (as at Coos) he gave an everlaſting revenue toward the maintaining of baths; and the donative was to perpetuity, that they might never forget the benefit. He gave corn to all that wanted it, and furniſh'd the Rhodians ſeveral times with moneys for the fitting out of a navy, when they had occaſion for it. He repair'd the temple of Apollo (call'd Pythium) out of the very aſhes, at his own coſt, and made it better than it was at firſt. What ſhall I ſay of his liberality to the Lycians and the Samians? his largeſſes all over Ionia, to every one that ask'd him? Are not the Athenians, the Lacedemonians, the Nicopolitans, and thoſe of Pergamus in Lycia; are they not all ſenſible witneſſes of Herod's bounty? in what a condition was Antioch, the capital of Syria, that ſtood in ſuch a bog for twenty *† furlongs together, that there was hardly any coming near it, till Herod caus'd the paſſage to be pav'd all along with white marble, and ſet up contrivances upon the way for a ſhelter againſt foul weather.

Herod provides for the common good of mankind.

BUT it will be ſaid perhaps that theſe were all private caſes, and only concern'd ſome few particulars that were the better for them. What ſhall we ſay then to his obligations upon the Elians, wherein not only Greece, but the whole body of mankind are engag'd; at leaſt ſo many of them as have heard the fame of the olympick games! for when he found, upon his coming to Rome, that theſe games were all that now remain'd of ancient Greece, and that the ſolemnity itſelf was now dwindling away for want of money to maintain it, he did not only take the charge upon himſelf, for that year, of being * Agonotheta, but ſettled an annual allowance toward the upholding of it for ever. It would be an endleſs work to run thro' the debts and tributes, that he remitted; and particularly thoſe of Phaſaelites and Balaneotes; beſide ſeveral towns in Cilicia, where he diſcharg'd their penſions. He did great things, in fine, and would have done greater; but the apprehenſion he had of drawing envy upon himſelf, as if he had ſome farther deſign in his head, kept him in awe: for why ſhould he do more, they cry'd, for other princes ſubjects, than their own maſter would do for them?

THIS prince had a ſtrength of body anſwerable to the greatneſs of his mind. He was a great maſter of the chace, and gain'd his point in it; for no man was better on horſeback than himſelf. He kill'd forty beaſts once in one day. That country breeds a great many boars; but more deer and wild aſſes. He was a ſoldier and a ſword-man not to be reſiſted. He was terrible in his very exerciſes; the ſureſt marks-man living, either with dart, or arrow: and, beſide the excellencies of his body and mind, he was one of fortune's darling favourites; for the fate of the war went very ſeldom againſt him: or, when it did, it was either by treachery ſomewhere or other, or by the raſhneſs of his ſoldiers; and not by his own fault.

A great ſoldier and an excellent ſword-man, and had a ſtrength of body anſwerable to the dignity of his mind.

THE felicity of Herod's reign was mightily diſorder'd by troubles in his family; and the perſon whom he lov'd above all earthly things was the cauſe of it: for being now poſſeſs'd of the kingdom, he turn'd off Doris his firſt wife, who was a Jeweſs, and took Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander the ſon of Ariſtobulus: which cauſed miſerable diviſions in his houſe, eſpecially after his return from Rome.

b. 16. c. 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 16, 17.

Herod turns off his wife Doris, and takes Mariamne; which proves his ruin.

HE did, in the firſt place, baniſh out of the city Antipater, whom he had by Doris, for the ſake of the children he had by Mariamne; allowing him only the liberty of the town upon feſtivals. And then he put to death Hyrcanus, his wife's grandfather, (who was now come back from the Parthians) on ſuſpicion of a plot upon his life. For Barzapharnes having brought him away priſoner to the king of Parthia, after the taking of Syria, the Jews on the other ſide of the Euphrates, out of pure compaſſion, ſet him at liberty, and paid his ranſom: at which time, if he had follow'd their counſel, and not come to Herod, he might have liv'd ſafe and happy: But betwixt the ſnare of his grandaughter's match, and the paſſionate deſire he had to ſee his own country again, he was inveigled to his ruin. The thing all this while that wrought upon Herod, was not that he had any deſign upon the government, but that he had a rightful title to it.

Antipater, Herod's ſon by Doris, expell'd the city.

Hyrcanus, his wife's grandfather, put to death.

MARIAMNE had five children by Herod: two daughters, and three ſons; and the youngeſt of the three dy'd in the courſe of his ſtudies and exerciſes at Rome. The two elder were train'd up in a royal education, in regard both of the nobility of the mother, and that they were born while he was in poſſeſſion of the crown. But nothing mov'd Herod ſo powerfully in their favour, as the wonderful aſcendant that Mariamne had upon the ſpirit of her husband; whoſe fondneſs ſo far encreas'd upon him, that it made him utterly inſenſible of all indignities and affronts; while Mariamne requited this paſſionate fondneſs of his with an equal degree of averſion. She did not want matter of pretence for a diſguſt: and then preſuming upon the extravagant love he had for her, ſhe did not ſtick to charge him point-blank with the murder of Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus, and to load her reproaches with aggravations: the latter an innocent youth, ſhe ſaid, but ſeventeen years of age when he was created high-prieſt, and cut off ſo ſoon as he had receiv'd the order. The firſt time that he appear'd in his holy robes, upon a feſtival day, to officiate at the altar, it was ſo moving a ſpectacle, that the people wept with joy at the ſight of him. But the very ſame night was Ariſtobulus ſent away to Jericho, and there drown'd in a lake, by the Gauls, and by Herod's order.

Mariamne had five children by Herod.

She fell bitterly foul upon Herod.

Ariſtobulus drown'd in a lake at Jericho, by Herod's order.

MARIAMNE did not yet content herſelf with theſe outragious reproaches againſt Herod; but ſhe vilify'd alſo, in a much more opprobrious ſort, his ſiſter, and mother: which he heard without ſpeaking one word; for love had ty'd up his tongue. This incenſed the women to that degree, that they laid their heads together, how they might touch Herod more to the quick; and ſo they let fall ſome words of reflexion upon his wife's honour and virtue: and, among other things plauſible enough, they told him a ſtory of his wife's ſending her picture to Anthony; and Herod's love made him put up all affronts.

The women make Herod jealous of his wife and ſiſter.

what pains she took to make herself known to him, out of the heat of an ungovernable appetite: for Anthony was the greatest libertine and debauchee in nature, and a man that would stick at nothing for the gaining of his ends; tho' it should be the very life of Herod himself. What betwixt the rage of an implacable jealousy, the consideration of Cleopatra's insatiable avarice and cruelty, and the power she had over Anthony, in the instance of Lysanias, and * Malichus the king of Arabia, who were both put to death at her instigation; Herod was, as if he had been thunder-struck; for he found himself in danger of losing not only his wife, but his own life also.

* A. Malchus.

Herod goes to Anthony, and leaves the care of his wife to Joseph the husband of his sister Salome, with a secret instruction.

In this perplexity of thought, Herod resolv'd to go to Anthony, and so recommended the care of his wife during his absence, to Joseph, the husband of his sister Salome; whom he had ever found kind and faithful to him; but with this instruction over and above, that if Anthony kill'd him, he should destroy Mariamne. Now Joseph innocently gave a hint of this to the queen, with an intent to inform her how wonderful a kindness the king had for her, that he could not endure the thought of a separation even in death itself. Herod, upon his return, in the course of his gaieties and love stories, fell to swearing and protesting, that in his whole life he never had a passion for any other woman. No, says Mariamne, that I perceive, by the order you left with Joseph to see me dispatch'd. The disclosing of this privacy made Herod stark mad; for he could not think that Joseph would ever have blabb'd such a secret, but in the confidence of an amour. In this distraction he leap'd off from his bed, and took a walk in the court, where he met his sister Salome, who would not lose so fair an opportunity of calumniating Mariamne; and she did it in such a manner too, that it serv'd to confirm Herod in his suspicion; so that he presently gave order, in a furious fit of jealousy, to have them both put to death. So soon as the word was out, he repented of it; but the execution was done first; his love and his madness governing him by turns. Nay, such was the transport of his extravagance, that he would not believe her to be dead, when he knew she was so; but like a mad-man he went on talking to her, as if she had been yet alive. In a short time the funeral solemnities put that point out of dispute, and Herod's grief for his dead wife was not inferior to the love he had for his living one.

Joseph lets fall a word of this to Mariamne, that cost them both their lives.

The ground of Herod's jealousy.

Joseph and Mariamne put to death upon it.

The passionate violences of the mother were now exercis'd upon the sons; and such was the horrid barbarity of the proceeding, that they look'd no otherwise upon their father than as a common enemy. They had been of the same opinion a long time, even when they were at Rome together; but much more confirm'd in it since their coming back into Judea; for the strength of their minds grew up with that of their bodies. They were now of age to think of marriage; and one of them marry'd the daughter of his aunt Salome, who was a mortal enemy of their mother; the other took the daughter of Archelaus the king of Cappadocia. In the liberty of this condition, they talk'd more at freedom than formerly, and that confidence betray'd them to the malice of informers; insomuch that their enemies made no difficulty of telling the king bare-fac'd, that his sons were in a conspiracy against him, and that the son-in-law of Archelaus had a design to steal away privately to his father-in-law, and thence to Rome, with a complaint against Herod himself to Cesar. When these jealousies were infus'd into Herod's head, he sends for Antipater home to him, whom he had by Doris, proposing to make use of him, as a countermine against the brothers; and so begun with a remarkable preference of Antipater to the rest.

The marriage of Herod's two sons, one of them to the daughter of Salome, the other to the daughter of Archelaus. This match enflames the jealousy.

Herod takes Antipater home to him.

The brothers found this change so intolerable, for men of their blood to be subjected to the son of an obscure private woman, that their stomachs were too big to brook the indignity, without declaring their resentment of it, which they did very frankly upon all occasions; but they sunk in their father's affections by it daily, which turn'd to Antipater's advantage; for he play'd his game so artificially with his father, by the help of flatteries and calumnies, (which calumnies were manag'd, partly by himself, partly by his instruments and friends) that he brought it to this issue at last, that his brothers were not only put out of all hope of the succession, but himself publickly and formally entitled to it by his father's testament. He was sent, after this, to Cesar, in a kind of a royal state and character; for he had the robes and the train of a king, only he wanted the crown. He was so puffed up with the vanity of this pomp, that he got his mother introduc'd into Mariamne's bed-chamber, by the help of insinuations and slanders; which was his way of practice against his brothers; insomuch that he wrought his father by degrees in a design upon their lives.

And formally settles upon him the succession.

The crafty menage of Antipater.

For this reason, Herod took Alexander to Rome with him, and there charg'd him before Cesar as a confederate toward the poisoning of his father. When Alexander was admitted to his defence, and before a judge that was not to be impos'd upon by Antipater and Herod, he soften'd his father's mistakes all that was possible, spake home and substantially to the points charg'd upon himself, acquitted his brother Aristobulus, who was involv'd in the same accusation, and from thence proceeded to lay open the impostures, frauds, and contrivances of Antipater: and all this with so good a grace, that the innocency of his conscience was yet farther illustrated by the force of his eloquence, being a sharp and a ready speaker: concluding, in fine, with this modest resignation, that it is no crime for a father to punish his children if they be guilty. This farewel drew tears from the whole audience, and had also such an effect upon Cesar, that, all disputes and accusations apart, he made them all friends; provided that for the future, the sons should be obedient to their father, and the father at liberty to leave the kingdom to whom he pleas'd.

Herod charges Alexander to Cesar, as a conspirator against the life of his father.

Alexander's defence.

Herod and his sons made friends.

Herod, at his return from Rome, could not but acquit his sons of the crime charg'd upon them, yet the suspicion stuck by him still; for Antipater ply'd him so hard upon that topick, that he kept his jealousies waking; tho' he did not dare to say or do any thing publickly, that might clash with the sense, or the authority of the reconciler. Herod took his passage by Cilicia, and so to Eleusa, where he was receiv'd by Archelaus with great great pomp and reſpect, who gave him a thouſand thanks upon his ſon-in-law's account, wiſhing him much joy of the accommodation. Archelaus in the mean time had not been wanting himſelf, by letters and other inſtances to his friends at Rome, to get voices, and make an intereſt for Alexander. He conducted Herod, in fine, as far as Zephyrium; where he made him a preſent of thirty * talents, and ſo departed.

Herod calls an aſſembly at Jeruſalem,

WHEN Herod came to Jeruſalem, he call'd an aſſembly; and in the preſence and hearing of his three ſons, gave the people an account of his journey and buſineſs, with often repeated thanks to GOD and to Ceſar for compoſing the breaches in his family, and ſettling his ſons in unity and peace: "A bleſſing (ſays "he) which I ſhall ever value incomparably "above the glories of a crown, and which I "ſhall endeavour to preſerve and improve ac-"cordingly. It is to Ceſar that I ſtand indebt-"ed for my dignity and eſtate, and to Ceſar "again, that I owe for the liberty and privi-"lege of appointing my own ſucceſſor. It is "to him alſo, that I am to pay my acknow-"ledgments, with this declaration, that I de-"ſign them all three both for the ſovereign-"ty and ſucceſſion, if it may be agreeable to "the will of God and your good liking. The "eldeſt of them has the title of ſeniority, "the other two may pretend to the dignity "by their extraction, and the command at "laſt is large enough for all three.

and makes a wonderful diſcourſe upon the whole ſtate of the caſe.

"As for thoſe that Ceſar hath united, and "the father ſet up, you muſt be ſure to pay "them all due reſpect; that is to ſay, it muſt "be impartial, equal and juſt, with a regard "to a precedency of birth-right; for the ad-"vancing of one man before his time, will "not be near ſo great an obligation upon him "that is prefer'd, as an heart-breaking to the "other that is poſtpon'd. But now, for fear "of evil counſel or example, (as there's no "danger like that of ill inſtruments under a "man's own roof) it ſhall be my care to place "wiſe and ſober people about them; ſuch as I "can depend upon, and ſuch as ſhall be an-"ſwerable for their order and good agree-"ment.

"Now I do further expect from theſe mi-"niſters, as well as from the officers of my "army, that for the preſent they ſhall own no "other maſter than myſelf; for it is not the "government, but the honorary part of it, "that I have tranſmitted to my ſons; ſo that "they ſhall have the pleaſure of a kind of "regency in the adminiſtration, but the bur-"den of it is to reſt upon my ſhoulders, and "the laſt reſult of matters, in the judgment "and determination of things, muſt be my "province even whether I will or no. If you "conſider my age, the courſe of my life, or "the piety of my manners; I am not yet ſo "far gone upon the firſt point, but, according "to the courſe of nature, I may be allow'd to "live a great many years yet; neither have I "done any thing to ſhorten my life by intem-"perate pleaſures; and then for my duty to "God, I have been ſo true to his holy wor-"ſhip, that I will not deſpair of the bleſſing "of a longer time yet in this world, even in "conſideration of that zeal and devotion. "But if any of you ſhall take upon him to ad-"vance the ſons, while I am yet living, in "contempt of the father, let him expect to be "ſeverely puniſh'd for it: not but that I "ſhould be glad to have my children treated "with all due reſpect in the world; but "young men are hot and pragmatical, and "'tis but throwing a temptation in their way "to make them more meddling than becomes "them. People ſhould do well to conſider, "before they make theſe applications; for it "is my part as men do well or ill, to ſee "them rewarded or puniſh'd, and I will not "be wanting to that article of my duty. The "beſt way will be for ſons and father to be "all of a mind; for it is their intereſt to have "me govern, and it is mine for them to agree "among themſelves.

"And now, my dear children, (ſays Her-"rod) conſult in the firſt place, that natural "affection which providence hath made com-"mon even to beaſts with men, and acquit "yourſelves like dutiful children to your fa-"ther. Bleſs Ceſar in the next place for the "good office of his mediation; and pray take "it kindly from me, in the third place, that I "only deſire what I have a right to command; "that is to ſay, let me entreat you to live a-"micably as brethren. I ſhall now take care "to provide you ſuch a train and equipage, as "may be ſuitable to your quality. Be ſure "you live peaceably one with another, and I "beſeech God to keep me ſteddy in the ſame "mind."

WHEN he had made an end of ſpeaking, he embrac'd his children, and diſcharg'd the meeting. Some malecontents went away muttering, and pretending that they could not hear one word he had ſaid; others were diſcanting upon this and that, and wiſhing, upon the whole, that they might find him as good as his word.

The brothers are ſtill jealous.

THE brothers were ſtill divided among themſelves, and ſo jealous one of another, that they were glad to part for fear of worſe. Alexander and Ariſtobulus took it heinouſly that Antipater ſhould have the preference: Antipater on the other hand, was as much troubled that the other brothers ſhould be allow'd any ſhare at all in the government.

Antipater's character.

Now Antipater being a falſe man, cloſe and malicious, and one that could keep his thoughts to himſelf, had a mortal hatred for the brothers, but made no ſhew of it: whereas the other two, being frank and open, made a point of honour of it to diſguiſe or diſſemble any thing. Their enemies in the mean time had inſtruments every where at work, to make advantage of words and diſcourſes; ſome, by provoking them to bold and dangerous liberties, others, to gain upon them by inſinuations, under the maſk of confidence and friendſhip; inſomuch that not a word came out of Alexander's mouth, but what was preſently carry'd to Antipater, and from him to Herod, with additions and aggravations. There was nothing ſo innocent but by interpretation it was made criminal; and whereſoever there was the leaſt ground for a calumny, the mole-hill was made a mountain.

ANTIPATER all this while was never without his agents about Alexander, to pump things out of him; and one poſſible circumſtance was enough to countenance a thouſand palpable impoſtures; and ſo one truth in a whole maſs of lies, was ſufficient to make all the ſtories invented and alledged againſt him current. It was remarkable again, that Antipater's tools as well as himſelf, were all upon the reſerve: whether this was a natural cloſeneſs, or that their mouths were ſtop'd with money it matters not; but ſo it was, that this man's whole life was but one myſtery of iniquity. Antipater, in ſhort, ſo order'd the matter, that Alexander's friends, ſervants, and acquaintance were all corrupted, either by flatteries or rewards, into the betraying of him in whatſoever he ſaid or did. But Antipater's maſter-piece, after all, was this, inſtead of declaring himſelf an open enemy, he had his confidents at hand to accuſe the brothers; and ſtill as any thing came in againſt Alexander, he ſeem'd to take his part at firſt, and yet, afterward, turn'd all againſt him, with ſuch ſly, glancing intimations, that they made Herod ſtark mad, in a full perſuaſion that the whole ſtory of Alexander's plot upon his life was true: neither did any thing give more credit to the calumny, than Antipater's artificial way of mincing the matter.

HEROD was mortally incens'd againſt the two brothers by theſe practices of Antipater; and juſt as much as they loſt in the good opinion of the king, Antipater got, and thoſe that were for the government fell in with him; ſome of their own accord, others for faſhion ſake; as Ptolemy, the moſt conſiderable of his friends, the king's brothers, and effectually the whole family; for Antipater was all in all, and nothing went ſo near Alexander's heart, as to conſider that this wickedneſs was altogether manag'd by the counſel and conduct of Antipater's mother, who was worſe than a ſtep-mother, in the hatred ſhe bare to the queen's children. Now tho' great court was made to Antipater, with an eye to the credit he had with Herod; the order of the king himſelf went yet a great deal farther, in forbidding all people effectually, upon their peril, to entertain any intercourſe with Alexander or his brother, or to make any ſort of application to either of them. This interdiction ſtruck a dread, not only into the king's houſhold, but to their friends abroad; for Herod had priviledges confer'd upon him by Auguſtus, that he never granted to any other: as the liberty of fetching deſerters out of other princes juriſdictions, where he himſelf had nothing to do. Neither of the brothers at this time knew any thing of their fault; for Herod had not as yet exhibited any publick charge againſt either of them, which made the danger ſo much the greater, for want of precaution how to defend themſelves. They collected the ſtate of their own caſe however, from the cooling of the king's kindneſs towards them, and their troubles conſequently increas'd.

Antipater's mother order'd the plot.

ANTIPATER did his buſineſs the ſame way too, with his brother Pheroras and Salome his aunt, and talk'd as freely to them againſt his brothers, as he could have done to his own wife. The feud was grown very high already, but it was mightily inflam'd by Glaphyra the wife of Alexander; who, upon all occaſions, would be vaunting of the nobility of her extraction, and ſetting up herſelf above all other ladies in the kingdom. She ſaid ſhe was deſcended from Themenus, on the father's ſide, and from Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, on the mother's; reflecting at the ſame time upon Herod's wife and ſiſter as upſtarts, and treating them, in fine, with all imaginable contempt. Herod did not marry for quality, ſhe ſaid, but for beauty. We have taken notice already that Herod had ſeveral wives, and that he was pleas'd with polygamy, being allow'd by the Jewiſh law; and they were all exaſperated againſt Alexander, for the pride and ſtomach of Glaphyra.

Meanneſs of birth among women is a crime.

ARISTOBULUS made Salome his enemy too, though his mother-in-law; and ſhe was ſo, in truth, before, being piqu'd ſufficiently at the outrageous haughtineſs of Glaphyra, who would be ſtill caſting her in the teeth with the meanneſs of her birth, and telling him, that his wife was only a private woman, but his brother Alexander had marry'd a queen. The daughter of Salome carry'd the ſtory preſently to her mother, with tears in her eyes, with another additional one of her contriving; namely, how Alexander and Ariſtobulus had threaten'd all Herod's wives, if ever they came to the crown, that they would make the mothers and the daughters ſpin for their living; and for the boys, they might ſerve well enough, they cry'd, for pariſh-clerks; which was only a jeſt upon them for their love of letters. This diſcourſe put Salome in ſuch a rage, that ſhe immediately went and acquainted the king therewith; and for the credit of the accuſation, it was the evidence of a mother againſt a ſon-in-law. And there was yet another report beſides, that ſtung Herod more than all the reſt. It was given out, that Alexander and Ariſtobulus would be often bemoaning the miſerable condition of their mother, with ſighs and groans, and curſing their father. It was ſuggeſted further, that, upon Herod's dividing Mariamne's wearing-cloaths among the reſt of wives, the brothers would be foreboding ſtill, that in ſhort, inſtead of royal robes, they would be obliged to wear mourning.

Salome does the office of a tale-bearer.

HEROD, upon theſe inſinuations, knowing his ſons to be bold and vigorous young men, was not without ſome apprehenſion of violence from them; but unwilling however to force things beyond recovery: ſo that being upon the very point of going to Rome, he order'd his ſons to be call'd; and betwixt the ſeverity of a king, and the tenderneſs of a father, he gave them good counſel, and advice to agree among themſelves, and to love one another; with the promiſe of an abſolute pardon for what they had done amiſs, upon condition of their repentance and amendment. The anſwer they return'd was a flat denial of what they were charg'd with, which they undertook to prove, not only falſe, but impoſſible, if they might be allow'd the hearing; giving their father to underſtand, that ſo long as his ears were open to tale-bearers, there would be no end of calumnies.

Herod's advice to his ſons.

WHEN the brothers had pacify'd Herod, and ſet their own hearts at reſt from any further apprehenſion of danger, they fell into new anxieties for the future. Pheroras and Salome, Pheroras and Salome deadly enemies of the brothers. Pheroras highly oblig'd to Herod.

lome, they knew very well, were their deadly enemies, and two persons harsh enough, and very considerable: Pheroras especially; for he did as good as share with Herod in all the regalities of the government, saving only the crown itself. His own proper annual revenue amounted to an hundred * talents; besides the profit of all the lands beyond Jordan, which he enjoy'd by the bounty of Herod; at whose request, Cesar was prevail'd with to make him a tetrarch. Herod honour'd him also with a royal match; bestowing upon him his wife's sister in marriage, and after her death, he offer'd him his eldest daughter with three hundred † talents for her portion. But Pheroras was so captivated with a passion for a person of ignoble birth, that he declin'd the proposal. Herod took this in such indignation, that he gave her to the son of his brother; who was afterwards slain by the Parthians. He was highly incens'd for the present; but, upon second thoughts, he imputed the refusal to the violence of his passion, and so pardon'd his folly.

A report that Pheroras had a design to poison his brother. Herod startled at it. Divers seiz'd and put to the question upon it.

THERE had been a rumour, it seems, of a long standing, that Pheroras had a design, even in the life of Mariamne, to poison his brother. This was a time so favourable to spies and informers, that Herod, tho' one of the kindest of brothers, was yet startled at the report; tho' he could not altogether believe it. There were a great many seized upon suspicion, and several put to the question; passing from one to another, till they came at last to the friends of Pheroras. They confess'd nothing of the poison; but Pheroras, they said, had some thoughts of stealing privately away with his mistress into Parthia; and that Costobarus, Salome's second husband, was privy to the purpose and design. It was this Costobarus, to whom Herod had given her in marriage, after her former husband was put to death for adultery. And Salome did not come off without an accusation neither; for her brother Pheroras laid it to her charge, that she had been treating a match with Syllæus, governor of Arabia under king Obodas, the bitterest enemy that Herod had in the world. Salome was found guilty of every article that her brother Pheroras charg'd upon her; but Herod however pardon'd them both.

Pheroras and Salome found guilty, but Herod pardons them both.

THE storm of the faction fell now wholly upon the head of Alexander: as for instance: there were three eunuchs in the house, that were all in the good graces of the king, and well known by the offices they had in the family; that is to say, a cup-bearer, a sewer, and a valet de chambre: one of them to fill his master's wine, the second to provide his supper, and the third to put him to bed, and supply the office of a bed-fellow. Now these were Alexander's creatures, as far as flatteries and rewards could make them. This being suggested to Herod, he caused them immediately to be put to the torture; when out came the whole business, the practice, the promise, and the instrument; together with Alexander's way of imposing upon them. "There was

Three court officers put to the torture, and confess Alexander's part of the story.

"no hope of Herod, (he said) a wicked old "man, that had his hair dy'd like a fop to "make him look young: the respect you pay "to him, (says he) belongs to me, that am "to be his successor to the kingdom, and he "cannot hinder it. I shall have it in my pow-"er then, (says he) to revenge myself of my "enemies, and to reward my friends, your-"selves in the first place." The informers added this further, that the great ministers and officers were all for Alexander in their hearts, and manag'd their matters in their private meetings and cabals.

Herod at his wits end upon it.

THIS was such a thunder-bolt to Herod, that he durst not be too quick in publishing the very discovery; but his tale-bearers and agents were at work night and day, to spy up and down in all families and places what was said and done; and it was certain death to be but so much as suspected. There was nothing to be heard of in this part of Herod's history, but cruelty and injustice. Every disgust made way for a calumny, and that calumny was made a mortal crime; for Herod did but execute the malice that other people put in his head: no witness so infamous, no imposture so gross and ridiculous, but it found credit, and the punishment was so quick, that it scarce waited for the offence, but the accused and the accuser went off together; for Herod reckoned all formalities of law to be but fooleries, where the life of a prince was in danger.

His outrageous cruelty and injustice.

NAY, he was now distemper'd to such a degree of outrage, that it was not enough for a man to be innocent, or to escape an accusation, but his very friends far'd the worst of all others: some he banish'd the kingdom, and where he could not exercise his power, he wreak'd his spite upon them in foul words. But Antipater was the source of all this mischief, and, betwixt himself and his crew of friends, there was nothing omitted to enflame the accusation. Nay, he had so frighted the king with a parcel of idle foolish stories, that he fancy'd Alexander still before him with a sword drawn to destroy him. In this dread he caused him immediately to be taken up, and bound, and so proceeded to the tormenting of his friends. Many of them dy'd mute, and sacrific'd their lives to a good conscience. Others that had not resolution enough to endure the torment, patch'd up a lie, and brought the two brothers into a plot upon the life of the king: that plot to be put in execution one day as they were a hunting, and they themselves in the mean time to fly to Rome. This was a very improbable story; but the invention pass'd upon this pinch, for want of a better; for Herod did not only believe it, but made use of it in his own justification for committing his son to prison.

Antipater the source of all.

Alexander taken up, and his friends tortur'd. Some stand mute, others tell a lie, to save themselves.

HEROD being now under the judgment of so incurable and implacable a jealousy, Alexander troubled his head no longer with the unprofitable way of argument and excuse in his own defence; but bethinking himself of another expedient, he resolv'd for the future to say as they said, and by confessing himself

* An hundred Jewish talents (as has been before observed) weighed eleven thousand four hundred and six pounds and three ounces, and their value in silver amounted to thirty four thousand two hundred and eighteen pounds fifteen shillings, and in gold to five hundred forty seven thousand and five hundred pounds English money.

When denying would do no good, Alexander confesses guilt, and gives Herod four papers of the pretended plot against his life.

guilty, to involve his enemies in the same condemnation. So that he drew up four papers, owning himself a confederate against the life of his father, with the names of divers of the conspirators; but Pheroras and Salome in the first place; charging Salome with the impudence of forcing herself into his bed one night, whether he would or no. These papers being in Herod's hands, and a world of bloody reflections in them upon several of the nobility, it so fell out by providence, that Archelaus in this very nick of time came into Judea, under no small concern for the safety of his son-in-law and daughter, and with a design to serve them all he could. And he did it effectually; for it was his conduct and address, that, in some degree, brought Herod to his wits again.

Archelaus by this means came into favour.

Upon their coming together, Archelaus broke out into an outrage of passionate exclamations, "Why where's this execrable son "of mine? (says he) why does he not shew "his parricidal treacherous head, that I may "tear him to pieces with my own fingers, "and provide a new husband, and a better "man, for my daughter? But alas! she is "tainted with the memory of the relation "she had to this wretch, and consequently "fit for no body, though as innocent as she "was born of his practices and counsels. But "the greatest miracle of all, as it appears to "me here, is your patience, in sparing the life "of a conspirator to the hazard of your own. "Little did I think, when I made such haste "out of Cappadocia, to have found Alexander "yet alive; so that my business was rather to "have had some discourse with you about my "daughter, whom I parted with to this wicked man, only out of a respect to your dignity. But as the case stands at present, "somewhat may be said upon both accounts. "Now you are too much a father, and perhaps too much a man too, to punish a rebellious treacherous son as he deserves; wherefore let us only change hands, and leave it "to me to do right upon your son, as I shall "recommend to your generosity the care of "my daughter."

Archelaus reconciles the cause of Alexander with Herod.

This discourse of Archelaus, as it put Herod in a better humour toward Alexander, so it set him yet more and more against Pheroras; for this was the chief argument of the four papers which Herod gave him to read; and so from beginning to end they perused them quite thorough from one article to another. Archelaus was now master of an opportunity to his own wish, and insinuated himself by little and little into the merits of the cause, laying the blame upon the ringleaders, as they were marked out in the papers, and chiefly upon Pheroras. Archelaus, finding by this time that he had gain'd some credit with the king, made advantage of the occasion, and so took another bias.

Archelaus by this means came into favour.

"In my opinion (says he) your son is in "more danger of being undone by a faction, "than you are in of being destroy'd by a son. "Why Alexander must be a downright mad-"man, to enter into any such vile practices of "his own head. He does in a manner divide "the government already with his father; "and a fair pretence he has likewise to the "succession: and what would he more, if it "were not for the importunity of some vio-"lent spirits at hand to debauch and seduce "him? Youth, alas! is rash and slippery, and "easily impos'd upon by ill company and cor-"rupt counsels, for want of consideration "and experience. Now there are a sort of "instruments, that neither young nor old are "able to resist: such a cabal of makebates and "incendiaries, that, wherever they appear, "men, families, and whole kingdoms, fall "before them."

Herod began now to be of Archelaus's opinion, and to think more favourably of Alexander, and worse of Pheroras than he had done; this being the argument of the four papers. When Pheroras came to find Herod in a more tractable temper than usual, and that Archelaus was the man that he most depended upon, he set a bold face upon it; and with a shameless impudence, to supply all other defects, he quitted Alexander, and betook himself to Archelaus; who told him plainly, how impossible a thing it was for him ever to come off from an accusation so manifestly prov'd against him; for the sun was not clearer than the evidence of his being in a conspiracy against the life of his brother: beside that the ruin of Alexander was also of his contrivance. "Now "(says Archelaus) why cannot you give over "this way of shuffling and outfacing things, "and rather make a frank confession of what "your very soul knows you to be guilty of? "your brother has a natural tenderness for "you, and I am persuaded he might be pre-"vail'd upon for your pardon. If you like "the proposal, make the experiment, and you "may be sure of my help to do you the best "offices I can."

Archelaus gives Pheroras good advice.

Upon second thoughts, Pheroras conceiv'd it most advisable to follow the directions of Archelaus; and so, in a rueful mourning dress, and with a dismal and sad countenance, on purpose to move compassion, he went and cast himself at Herod's feet, made his confession, and begg'd forgiveness; acknowledging all the faults he was charg'd with, but at the same time casting them all upon the transport of a fooliish passion he had for a woman, that had distracted his reason, so that he knew not what he said or did. So soon as Pheroras had given this evidence against himself, Archelaus's next work was to qualify matters with Herod, and to bring him into a more conversable humour. "Well! (says Archelaus) this is a very ill "thing from so near a relation, and yet I my-"self have suffer'd a great deal more from a "brother than this comes to: but in that "case I thought it prudence to sacrifice my "revenge to a natural affection and duty. It "is in kingdoms as it is in bodies; when an "ill humour falls down into any one part, 'tis "more advisable to try remedies, than to cut "it off."

Pheroras humbles himself, confesses, and beggs Herod's pardon.

With these and the like arguments, Archelaus had now sweeten'd Herod toward Pheroras, but he still treated Alexander, in semblance at least, with reproaches and menaces; and, in conclusion, "he would e'en take away his "daughter, (he said) without any more ado." This seeming fierceness of Archelaus wrought so sensibly upon the spirit of Herod, that he became an advocate for his son upon it, and made it his suit to Archelaus not to make void the marriage. His answer was, "That, out of "the reverence he had for the rights of alli-"ance, he was content to leave his daughter

" an act of oblivion: if she goes away, the " case is desperate; for there's nothing puts " relations in better order than the comfort of
" a family conversation." This deliberation was scarce over, but Archelaus went out: he came back again in a trice, and brought in Alexander along with him, whom he presently reconciled to his father. Archelaus was much of opinion for Herod's going to Rome, with an account to Cesar of all the late transactions; for, says he, I have written at large already upon this subject.

Archelaus brings Alexander to his father

THIS was a crafty and a healing counsel of Archelaus's, to deliver his son from danger, and at the same time to celebrate the festival of the reconciliation, with all instances of humanity and respect. Archelaus was now upon his departure, and Herod made him a present of seventy * talents, a throne set with precious stones, with a train of eunuchs, and a concubine call'd Pannychis. All the king's great ministers, friends and relations, were likewise treated by Herod's express order with rich presents, every man in his proportion; Herod himself and his nobility conducting Archelaus on his way as far as Antioch.

Herod's magnificent presents to Archelaus at his departure.

THERE came a person into Judea not long after this, a man of policy, that out-did Archelaus himself, one that did not only overthrow the project of Alexander's reconciliation to his father; but so order'd the matter, that he brought Alexander himself to his end. His name was Eurycles; a native of Lacedemon; corrupted by the love of money into an affectation of power, and so lavish in his expences that the revenue of a prince would not answer his profusions. He made Herod several presents of great value, that look'd like baits to draw on more; for Herod sent him greater presently in return. He set little value upon any bounty that was not the price of royal blood: so that he made his way to Herod's good graces; one while, by crafty ensnaring discourses, and another while, by the grossest of hyperbolical flatteries; till in the end he got so perfect a measure of the king's weak side and humour, that whatever he said or did was all to Herod's liking. By this parasitical way of complaisance, he made himself a very considerable interest at court; beside that being a Spartan, Herod and all his favourites had an honour for his country, as well as for his person.

Eurycles, a false lewd wretch, brings Alexander to his end.

He insinuates himself into Herod's good graces.

WHEN Eurycles came to discover the weaknesses of the family, with the factions and divisions of the children, and to see how Herod stood affected to them in particular, he took up his lodging with Antipater; and pretending a wonderful kindness to Alexander, told him a long tale of his friend Archelaus, and what a greatness had ever been betwixt them; which was as good as a letter of recommendation to Alexander, who not only swallow'd it himself, but possess'd his brother Aristobulus also with the belief of the same story. When Eurycles had sounded all the people he had to do withal, he put on several shapes and forms, and went several ways to work as the case required: his business being upon the main, to get Antipater's money, and to betray Alexander. " 'Tis
" an admirable thing to me (says Eurycles to " Antipater) how you, who are the eldest son,
" and next heir to the crown, can suffer your" self to be impos'd upon by pretenders to " your right!" And then to Alexander.
" How can you (says he) that are both the son
" and the husband of a great princess, endure
" to see the son of a private woman interpose
" betwixt you and the crown; especially ha" ving such a friend to second you as Arche-
" laus?" All this went down now with the young man, as proceeding from a good and faithful intention, upon the credit of his professing a friendship for Archelaus. Alexander was so far from distrusting any thing, that he took Eurycles into a closer confidence, and open'd his very heart to him in the matter of Antipater. " It is no wonder (says he) for
" Herod, that took away the life of the mo" ther, to take away the kingdom from the
" son." Eurycles at the hearing of this, blessed himself at the barbarity of the practice; and, with a countenance of pity, and condoling, he engag'd Aristobulus likewise in the discourse, and consequently hamper'd him in the same snare. When Eurycles had pump'd out matter enough against them both, he carries the story to Antipater, with some additional circumstances to it of his own making; as if the conspiracy were just upon the point of execution, and the king's life every moment more and more in danger. Antipater made Eurycles a present of a vast sum of money for this service, and his good word to his father over and above. And so having laid a plot to effect the death of Alexander and Aristobulus, Eurycles offer'd himself for an evidence against the two brothers.

His main business is to get Antipater's money, and to betray Alexander.

Alexander makes Eurycles his confident.

EURYCLES went now to Herod, with this speech in his mouth:

" I AM here come in gratitude, (says he) to " acknowledge all your favours, and to give " you your very life in requital. It is now a " long time that your death has been resolv'd
" upon; insomuch that Alexander had a
" drawn sword in his hand once, with a full " determination to have done the deed. And " let me tell you, sir, this horrid wickedness
" had been compleated, if I had not put a re-
" spite to the dispatch by seeming to approve
" of the thing, and offering myself to join " in the exploit. What! says Alexander,
" cannot Herod content himself with the u-
" surpation of a kingdom, the death of my " mother, and the tearing of the government
" to pieces, without declaring that pitiful
" wretch Antipater his successor, to the scan" dal of all crowned heads? but it belongs to " me to do justice to the ghosts of Hyrcanus
" and Mariamne; neither would it be congru-
" ous that the government should descend
" from such a father to such a son without

A falſe and ſcandalous ſtory of Alexander.

WHEN Eurycles had finiſh'd this invective againſt Alexander, he turn'd the remainder of his diſcourſe into a panegyrick to the honour of Antipater; the only ſon, he ſaid, that truly lov'd his father, and put a ſeaſonable ſtop to the progreſs of the deſign. The king being ſtill labouring under his former jealouſies, broke out upon this hint into the impatience of a moſt intolerable rage; and it was now Antipater's time and maſterpiece, to inflame his extravagance, by trumping up new matter, and witneſſes againſt the brothers. The evidence was this: That Alexander and Ariſtobulus held a private correſpondence with Jucundus and Tyrannus, two horſe-officers, that for ſome miſdemeanour were diſcharg'd of their command. This information put Herod into ſuch a fury, that he order'd them immediately to the torture. But they knew nothing, they ſaid, of the matter in queſtion; only there was a certain letter, it ſeems, ſent from Alexander, as to the governour of Alexandrion; deſiring him to receive himſelf and Ariſtobulus into the caſtle, in caſe of their father's death; and to furniſh them both with arms and other neceſſaries, if ſuch a thing ſhould happen. Alexander charg'd this letter as a forgery of Diophantus; a bold man, and wonderfully dexterous at counterfeiting hands; and beſide all this, he was the king's ſecretary. And it is to be noted, that he was at laſt put to death for forgery. The governor of the caſtle was alſo tortur'd; and there was nothing gotten out of him neither. The ſons were effectually quitted: but for Eurycles, that peſt of mankind, and the projector of this whole miſchief, how was he celebrated by Herod, for his friend and preſerver, and complimented at laſt with a preſent of fifty * talents for his pains! This abandon'd wretch, before Archelaus could have any certainty of the impriſonment of the two brothers, made a journey to him by ſtealth, and had the face to tell Archelaus, from whom he received an ample reward for his pretended ſervices, that all was well betwixt Herod and Alexander, and that he himſelf had made them friends. From thence he went into Achaia with his treaſure; where he ſpent it as lewdly as he got it. In the end, he was arraign'd by Ceſar, for ſeditious practices, broils, and oppreſſions. He was in the concluſion baniſh'd; and this was the puniſhment he ſuffer'd for his villainous practices againſt Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

IT may do well enough in this place to oppoſe Evaratus of Coos, in the contrary extreme to Eurycles the Spartan. He was much a friend of Alexander's, and in Herod's court at the ſame time when Eurycles was there. The king put him to it very ſtrictly, what credit he gave to that report of the conſpiracy, and to the accuſations that were given out upon it. Evaratus declar'd upon his oath, that he never knew the young men guilty of any thing like it. But the miſerable priſoners were never the better for it; for Herod's ears were only open to the calumnies, and people were more or leſs in his favour, according to the degree of being more or leſs infamous; and there was no other way to pleaſe him but by ſaying, doing, and believing, as he did.

Herod's ears open only to calumnies.

SALOME in the mean time was a terrible incendiary to Herod againſt his ſons, for the ſecuring of herſelf. Ariſtobulus gave her a caution, both as a mother-in-law and as an aunt, to have a care of herſelf; intimating that ſhe was in as much danger from Herod now, as any body elſe, lying under a ſecond charge for the ſame crime ſhe was accuſed of before; that is to ſay, that ſhe had contracted a league with Sylleus the Arabian, with a deſign to marry him, though ſhe knew him to be the king's enemy; and that ſhe gave him a ſecret account, from time to time, of the king's counſels. Ariſtobulus gave her this warning, on purpoſe to involve her in the ſame common fate with his brother and himſelf; but it fell out unhappily, for this was the rock they ſplit upon, and the very tempeſt that ſunk them both. For Salome in that moment went to the king, and told him what Ariſtobulus had done, which tranſported him to that degree of an impetuous rage, that he caus'd the brothers to be immediately taken apart, and laid in chains.

Salome an incendiary to the father againſt the ſons.

Herod in a rage lays the brothers in chains.

HEROD, in this heat, ſent Volumnius, a colonel of horſe, and Olympus, one of his particular friends, to Ceſar, with copies of the proceedings. Upon their arrival at Rome they deliver'd their letters, and Cesar was in great trouble for the young men upon the reading of them; but he was tender however of exerting his civil power, to the prejudice of the natural power of a father over his children; so that he return'd Herod an answer to this effect. "That he was master of himself, and "of those that belong'd to him." But Cesar however thought it advisable for Herod to call an assembly of his friends and relations, and the governors of the province, to enquire into the conspiracy; and so proceed to execute vindictive justice, upon those that should be found guilty of malice prepense: but if upon examination of the case, there appeared no more than a thought of withdrawing, or flying, a less severe punishment than death, he thought, might serve the turn.

Herod calls a council to meet about it at Berytus, according to Cesar's order.

THE emperor had marked out Berytus for the place of meeting; and Herod, in conformity to Cesar's direction, call'd a council there. The presidents were of Cesar's appointment in writing; Saturninus and Pedanius, embassadors, with Volumnius the governor of the province; the friends and relations of Herod, not omitting Salome and Pheroras: and after these, the principal men of Syria, king * Archelaus only excepted; for Herod had a jealousy of him, being the father-in-law of Alexander. The council was against bringing the sons into court, and prudentially enough too; for the very sight of them would have endanger'd the moving of a troublesome compassion; and then if they had been heard to speak for themselves, Alexander would with great ease have baffled all their objections: so that they were rather kept under custody at a distance, in Platane, a village of Sidonia.

* See Antiq. b. 16. c. 16.

But the sons not brought into court for fear of mischief.

The king opens the cause with great partiality and passion.

WHEN the king stood up to speak, he behav'd himself passionately, and vented his displeasure against his sons, as if they had been present. When he was upon the subject of the conspiracy, his voice was low and faint, and he did not care for bearing too hard upon that topick, because his proofs were weak; but when he came to recite malicious expressions, indignities, injuries, and disobediences committed against himself, his voice was heard all over the court; giving the assembly to understand that those reproaches were worse to him than death: and finally, when he saw that all pass'd without contradiction, he only lamented the misery of his condition in the gaining of so ruinous a victory; and upon this, order'd the court to proceed to a sentence.

And meeting with no contradiction, he bids the court proceed to a sentence.

SATURNINUS gave his opinion first, that they deserv'd to be punish'd, but not with death: for it would not look well, having three sons present in the assembly, to pass a sentence upon those that were absent. The two legates were of the same mind, and so were others that came after. The first man that gave sentence of death was Volumnius, and others follow'd him as they were influenc'd by the passions and interest of Herod; but not a man of them out of any ill-will to the prisoners. Judea and Syria was all in dread and suspence, what would be the issue of this tragical affair; though at the same time no body thought that Herod could ever be so cruel and unrelenting, as to murder his own children. But he had yet so little tenderness of nature, as to send his sons to Tyre in chains, and thence by sea to Cesarea; deliberating in the mean time what death to put them to.

A sentence of death past upon them.

IN the mean time, one Tyro, an old soldier of the king's, and a great lover of the young princes, came up: he had a son too that was much in favour with Alexander. This Tyro, in a horror of indignation for what Herod was a doing, went about like a madman, raving and crying out, that justice was trampled upon, truth is lost, and that nothing but villany and iniquity prevail'd in the world; and that there was no such thing as humanity and natural affection upon the face of the earth. At this rate he went on, raging and exclaiming like a man weary of his life. Nay, he had the courage at last to advance to the king himself. "Of all men living (says he to Herod) "you yourself are certainly the most miser-"able; a man given over to the judgment of "believing the falsest and the worst of people, "to the prejudice of the best friends you have. "As for instance: there is Salome and Pheroras, two persons whom you yourself have "several times judg'd worthy of death; and "yet these are the people, upon whose testimony you are about to take away the lives "of your sons. You never consider what an "ease it will be to Antipater, when the right "heirs are removed, and you two left alone; "for their business is to have a king they may "govern as they please. But let him have a "care then of the soldiers too; for if they "come to take fire at this butchery, who "knows how far it may go? for there's not "a soul but pities the brothers, and men of "quality are highly displeas'd to see how "things are manag'd." Tyro, upon this occasion, named several of the malecontents; which in the same minute were taken up by Herod's order, together with Tyro and his son.

The generous bravery of Tyro, a common soldier in favour of the brothers.

THERE was one Tryphon by at that time, a person somewhat disorder'd in his senses, and the king's barber: this man came forth to shew himself to the company, and so set up for a witness. "That same Tyro (says he to Herod) offer'd "me a considerable reward in the name of A-"lexander, if I would but undertake to cut "your throat in the shaving." Upon this information, Tyro and his son, and the barber, were presently order'd to be put to the question. Tyro and his son deny'd all, and the barber was wholly silent; whereupon Herod commanded Tyro's torments to be encreas'd, when his son out of pure tenderness and pity to his father, promis'd the king a discovery of the whole transaction if he might have his pardon. Upon this, he was taken off the torture, and then declar'd that his father was put upon it by Alexander to kill the king. This was taken by some only for a shift in the boy to get his father deliver'd from torture; there were others again that gave more credit to it.

Tryphon the king's barber sets up for an evidence against them.

HEROD, after this, made a bitter speech against some great officers of the army, together with Tyro; which so exasperated the common people, that they fell upon these officers, Tyro and the barber, with stones and cudgels, and put them all to death. As for the sons, that were now at Sebaste, not far from Cesarea, Herod caused them to be strangled, and the dead bodies to be carried afterwards to Alexandrion, and laid there by Alexander, the mother's uncle. This was the end of Aristobulus and Alexander.

The sons strangled at Sebaste.

Ant. b. 17. c. 1, 3, 4.

ANTIPATER by this time reckon'd himſelf ſure of the kingdom; but never was any man ſo univerſally hated by the people; for they well enough underſtood the whole ſcheme of this wickedneſs to be of his contrivance. But he was as uneaſy on the one hand, as he thought himſelf unſafe on the other, for fear the children of the ſlaughter'd brothers ſhould riſe up to revenge the death of their fathers. Alexander had by Glaphyra two ſons; Tigranes and Alexander: Ariſtobulus had likewiſe by Berenice, the daughter of Salome, Herod, Agrippa, and Ariſtobulus; and two daughters, Herodias and Mariamne. Glaphyra was now ſent away with her portion into Cappadocia, after the death of Alexander; and Berenice, the widow of Ariſtobulus, was married to the uncle of Antipater; who bethought himſelf of this match to make friends again with Salome, and put an end to all quarrels. Antipater ply'd Pheroras with compliments and preſents; making court at the ſame time to Ceſar's friends, and ſending vaſt ſums of money to Rome to engage them. Neither was he leſs bountiful to Saturninus and the reſt of his friends in Syria. But for all this he could not yet accompliſh his ends; for the more he gave, the leſs he was reſpected; and ſo far was this expence from any appearance of a generous bounty, that it was look'd upon to be only a profuſeneſs out of fear. So it was, in fine, that he was never the better for what he gave; and where he gave nothing, he made people ſo much the more his enemies. He was the larger in his liberalities, becauſe he ſaw, contrary to all people's expectation, that Herod took ſuch care of the orphans; which gave to underſtand, by the commiſeration he had for the children, the penitent ſenſe and regret he had for the death of his ſons their fathers.

Antipater in a conſpiracy againſt the life of his fathers.

Herod's tenderneſs for the children looks like a regret for the death of the fathers.

HEROD, having now call'd his friends, and kindred together, ſent for the young princes, and ſo addreſs'd himſelf to the company with tears in his eyes upon this occaſion.

A council call'd.

Herod's addreſs to the aſſembly.

" You have here before you (ſays Herod)
" the children of an unfortunate family:
" Their fathers have been taken from me by a
" ſad fate, and I find myſelf bound humanity
" and good-nature to do the beſt I can for the " orphans, in diſcharging the part of a grand-

" poſe, I ſhall make it my care in the firſt
" place to leave theſe children in good hands,
" and under the charge of the beſt friends I ſhall
" leave behind me when I am gone. To begin " with you; Pheroras (ſays he) I would have

" deſt ſon, and to ſupply the place to him of " a father, and a neceſſary guardian. As for " your part, Antipater (ſays he) I would

" will be as good as a parent to the orphan.
" And ſo for my ſon ||Herod, the grandchild
" of Simon the high-prieſt, by the mother's " ſide, let him marry the other ſiſter. This is " my will and deſire, and no perſon who has
" any regard or kindneſs for me will diſpute
" it. Thus I would have it; and I beſeech
" God to proſper theſe alliances to the comfort
" of my kingdom and my family, and grant
" in mercy that the children may be look'd
" upon with a more favourable eye than their " fathers."

His care for the ſettlement of the royal family in convenient matches.

WITH this benediction Herod concluded; and joining the hands of the princes, and weeping over them, he took a particular leave of the whole aſſembly one by one, and ſo diſmiſs'd the council.

Herod concludes with a benediction, and ſo diſmiſſes the court.

ANTIPATER, upon the hearing of this, ſtood like a ſtatue, inſomuch that every body took notice of the ſurpriſe; for he look'd upon all the reſpects his father paid the children, to be no other than a derogation from himſelf. This was a way, he thought, to put all things into confuſion again; at leaſt if Pheroras the tetrarch ſhould join intereſts with Archelaus, in favour of Alexander's ſons. Moreover he reflected within himſelf, the univerſal hatred he had drawn upon his own head; the compaſſion of the people for thoſe fatherleſs children; and, in fine, the concern the whole nation had in the matter, betwixt a tenderneſs for the living children, and a reverence for the memory of the dead: in which caſe, Antipater was look'd upon as neither better nor worſe than the murderer. Theſe things well conſider'd, Antipater had nothing elſe to do, but to make it his buſineſs to diſſolve the contracts: and how to gain that point, was now the queſtion; for Herod being fierce and ſuſpicious, was not to be dealt withal by craft and circumvention: So that he choſe rather to go in a bareſac'd manner, and openly to deſire of him (but with all modeſty and deference) that he would only confirm to him the honour he had thought him worthy of, and beſtow'd upon him: for all the reſt was but the ſhadow of a kingdom without the ſubſtance; which would be certainly the caſe, if Alexander's ſon ſhould not only have Archelaus for his grandfather, but Pheroras alſo for his father-in-law. Antipater preſs'd Herod with violent importunities to change the diſpoſition of the marriages, a thing which, as he ſaid, might eaſily be done, the king having a numerous family.

Herod's ſpeech goes to the heart of Antipater.

Antipater finding no remedy but by diſſolving the contracts, preſs'd it earneſtly to Herod, and after ſome few difficulties carries the point.

HEROD had nine wives, and children by ſeven of them: Antipater by Doris; Herod by Mariamne, the daughter of the high-prieſt;

‡ By the Evangeliſts call'd Philip.

Antipas

Antipas and Archelaus by * Malthace a Samaritan; and a daughter, Olympias, whom † his brother Joseph marry'd; Herod and Philip by Cleopatra of Jerusalem, and Phasael by Pallas. He had also other daughters, Roxane and Salome: the one by Phedra, the other by Elpis; and two wives that had no children; the one was the daughter of his brother, the other his cousin German; and over and above these, he had by Mariamne the two sisters of Alexander and Aristobulus. "So "that here's choice enough, (says Antipater) "for the ordering of the matches some other "way."

THE king perceived by this time what thoughts Antipater had of the children, and what purposes and intentions towards them; and was very much disturbed at it, for fear he should raise accusations against them, as he had done against their fathers, whom he himself had murder'd before. Herod was so very angry with him for this expostulation, that he severely rebuk'd him, and made him quit the room: but afterwards, with flattery and cajoling, he was wrought upon to make some alteration in his project: so that he gave to Antipater himself the daughter of Aristobulus, and to Aristobulus's son the daughter of Pheroras in marriage. This is sufficient to shew what an ascendant the wheedles of Antipater had over the spirit of Herod: which was more than in a like case cou'd be obtain'd by Salome, tho' his own sister, and seconded also with the interest of the empress ‡ Julia in a her favour. Salome had a mind to marry Sylleus the Arabian, and engaged Julia in the request: which Herod did not only oppose in the thing itself, and all intercessions for it, but bound himself with an oath to treat her as the greatest enemy he had in the world, if she did not give over the thoughts of it. After this, he forc'd her against her will upon a match with Alexas, a friend of his, and so to marry one of her daughters to the son of Alexas, and the other to the uncle of Antipater by the mother's side. He gave also one of the daughters of Mariamne to Antipater, the son of his sister, and the other to Phasael, the son of his brother.

The case of Salome and Sylleus.

The insolence of Antipater.

WHEN matters were thus alter'd, and every thing settled to the humour and convenience of Antipater, and consequently to the manifest exclusion of the orphans, his malignity was now bolster'd up with so audacious a confidence, that it made him wholly insupportable. He found that all people hated him, and that he could not be safe unless he made them fear him too: beside that Pheroras treated him as a prince established in his sovereignty.

A court cabal of women.

THERE broke out at the same time new broils at court, upon a faction among the women; for the wife, the mother, and the sister of Pheroras, together with the mother of Antipater, behaved themselves insolently and contemptuously, even toward the king's daughters: which Antipater was well enough pleas'd withal, for he hated them mortally. And for the rest of the women, they stood all in awe of the cabal; save only Salome, who gave the king plainly to understand the truth of the matter, and that their secret meetings and consultations were not for his service. When the women came to understand that the king had notice of these conventicles, and took great offence at them, they gave over that open way of caballing, and on the contrary, to prevent suspicion, wou'd be quarrelling, and thwarting one another in the king's hearing, as if they were rather enemies than conspirators. Antipater, under the cloak of this disguise, made direct sport with Pheroras, and betwixt jest and earnest banter'd and abused him: but then they still kept up their nightly clubs and assemblies, and the more they were observ'd, the more they stuck together. But nothing of all this escap'd Salome, who made continual discoveries of it to the king. This put Herod into a rage, especially against the wife of Pheroras: against whom Salome laid the heaviest charge. Herod, upon this, call'd a council of his friends and relations, and among other foul practices, exhibited a complaint against her for affronting his daughters; engaging the Pharisees against him, and giving his brother a potion to make him hate him. "And now, (says "Herod) turning to Pheroras, which of the "two would you part with, your brother or "your wife, if it were put to your choice? "I would rather part with my life itself (says "Pheroras) than with my dear wife." This answer stagger'd Herod, and thereupon he gave Antipater in charge, that he should never entertain any discourse, or have any thing more to do with either Pheroras or his wife, or any body else that belong'd to them. Antipater made a shew of readiness to comply with his order; but notwithstanding this they spent several whole nights together; however, fearing a discovery from Salome, he so order'd the matter with some friends he had in Italy, that letters were written to Herod, by any means to send Antipater over to Rome, to make his court a-while to Cesar. Upon this invitation, Herod immediately provided him a princely equipage, with money and all necessaries, and so dispatch'd him away for Rome with his will and testament along with him: wherein Herod declar'd Antipater himself his successor, and Herod after Antipater, whom he had by Mariamne, the daughter of the high-priest.

Salome gives the king notice of the faction.

The king highly offended at it. After this they met no more in public. But the night-clubs went on still. Salome a spy upon them, but pressed hardest upon the wife of Pheroras.

Foul practices charg'd upon her.

Antipater not to have any thing to do directly or indirectly with Pheroras or his wife.

Herod sends Antipater to Rome, and his last will along with him, &c.

SYLLEUS the Arabian made at this time another journey to Rome, (without any regard to Cesar's command) to dispute the same cause over again with Antipater, that he had formerly defended against Nicholas. It was a controversy of great moment also, that he had with his sovereign Aretas, having put several of his friends to death, and Sohemus for one, the most eminent person both for power and wealth in the whole city of Petra. He likewise corrupted Tabatus, one of Cesar's governors, with a sum of money to assist him against Herod; but Herod afterward out-bidding him, drew Tabatus off again from Sylleus, and made him receiver of Herod's duties. Now Sylleus finding that he came to no account, gave Augustus to understand by way of complaint, that Tabatus was not Cesar's governor, but Herod's. This provocation transported Tabatus to such a degree, that being as yet in great credit with Herod, he went and betray'd Sylleus to him; telling the king, that he had engag'd Corinthus, one of the guards, with a ſum of money, to join with him in a conſpiracy; adviſing withal, that he might be forthwith taken into cuſtody. The king made no difficulty of doing it at firſt word; for this ſame Corinthus, tho' he had his education in the court, was nevertheleſs by birth an Arabian; ſo that in a ſhort time Corinthus was not only taken up himſelf, but two Arabians more that were found with him; the one of them a friend of Sylleus, and the name of the other was Phylarchus, who being put to the queſtion, confeſs'd upon the torture, that he had prevail'd upon Corinthus for a mighty ſum of money to undertake the killing the king. Being interrogated and examin'd by Saturninus governor of Syria, they were ſent away to Rome.

Ant. b. 17. c. 3. s. 1. Pheroras and his wife baniſh'd the court.

HEROD importun'd Pheroras every day more than other to turn away his wife. He found matter in abundance to hate her for; but no way to puniſh her; till, in a frantick outrage, he baniſh'd both her and her husband the court. Pheroras bore the affliction well enough, and ſo ſtrait withdrew to his tetrarchy, with an oath never to return again while Herod liv'd; and that nothing but his death ſhould put an end to his baniſhment. Herod fell now into a fit of ſickneſs, and ſent ſeveral times for Pheroras to come to him, as having ſomewhat to communicate to him before he dy'd: but Pheroras would not be prevail'd upon to go; and Herod on the other hand, beyond all expectation, recover'd. Pheroras, after this, fell ill himſelf, and Herod upon that occaſion gave a ſingular inſtance of his humanity and patience; for he gave him a viſit, and treated him with all the care and affection imaginable: but the diſeaſe carry'd him off in a few days. It was generally thought that Herod had a very particular kindneſs for Pheroras, to the laſt hour of his life; and yet there goes a report for all this, that he deſtroy'd him by poiſon. The body however, was carried away to Jeruſalem; a publick mourning appointed for him, and a moſt magnificent funeral. This was the end of one of the murderers of Alexander and Ariſtobulus. But the puniſhment of this wickedneſs fell afterwards upon the head of Antipater, the author of it; and his ruin took its riſe from the death of Pheroras; for ſome of his freed men, in the agony of their paſſion for ſo irreparable a loſs, went boldly to the king, and told him that his brother was poiſon'd, for his wife had given him ſomething to eat, that was neither dreſs'd nor ſeaſon'd after the uſual manner; and that, upon the eating of it, he was immediately ſick at heart. It was obſerv'd, that two days before, there was a cunning woman brought out of Arabia, at the inſtance of the mother and ſiſter, to prepare a philtre for Pheroras; but inſtead of a love potion, it prov'd to be a deadly poiſon, and given by the advice of Sylleus, to whom this woman was well known.

Pheroras and his wife baniſh'd the court.

Pheroras vows never to return during Herod's life.

Herod falls deſperately ill, and ſends for Pheroras, who refuſes to come.

Herod recovers, and Pheroras falls ill.

Herod goes to ſee Pheroras, who dies of that ſickneſs ſoon after.

The body buried at Jeruſalem, with pomp and ſolemnity.

Pheroras ſaid to be poiſon'd.

A poiſon inſtead of a love potion adviſed by Sylleus.

HERE were ſo many ſuſpicions ſtarted, and the preſumptions ſo ſtrong, that the king order'd the putting of ſeveral perſons, bond and free, to the queſtion; one of them crying out in the extremity of her torments, "O God "(ſays ſhe) thou that art the ruler of heaven "and earth, avenge thyſelf and us upon the "mother of Antipater, for all the miſeries we ſuffer here for her ſake". When the king had gotten this light, he follow'd it as far as it would lead him; and a woman laid open the whole ſtory of the familiarity betwixt the mother of Antipater, and Pheroras and his women; their clandeſtine meetings; and how Pheroras and Antipater, when they came from court, ſat up and made merry with them all night, and not a ſervant admitted into the chamber. It was one of the free women that gave this evidence.

The witneſſes agree among themſelves, and with one another.

WHEN they came to be examin'd a part, there was ſuch an agreement in their informations, that the truth of the charge was no longer to be doubted. It came now into Herod's head, that Antipater's withdrawing to Rome, and Pheroras's (in effect) procuring his own baniſhment, were only contrivances to get out of the way; for they were often heard to ſay, that Herod's cruelty would never ſtop at Alexander and Ariſtobulus; but that they themſelves and their wives, muſt prepare to take their turns; for why ſhould any body hope to fare better at Herod's hand, after the execrable murder of his wife and children? So that there is no fence againſt this monſter, but getting out of his reach.

Antipater's ordinary way of treating his father.

THE women depoſed further, that Antipater would be often complaining to his mother, this: "When I (ſays he) am grey-head-"ed, my father grows every day younger and "younger; and who knows but I may die be-"fore I come to govern? Or what if my fa-"ther ſhould die before me, (as that may be "a long time firſt) I ſhall have loſt the very "reliſh of the pleaſure of a crown; beſide the "Hydra's heads that are now ſhooting out a-"gain in the children of Alexander and Ari-"ſtobulus: and as for my own children, they "are cut off by my father's will from any "pretence of claiming to the ſucceſſion; for "he has made the ſon of Mariamne his heir; "at leaſt if the will of a dotard may paſs for "any thing. But he'll take care to put a ſtop "to this diſpute, by not leaving one ſoul of "his family alive to pretend to't. He is cer-"tainly of all fathers that ever liv'd, the moſt "unnatural and malicious to his ſons; and yet "worſe, if it be poſſible, to his brothers:

"witneſs

" witneſs the hundred * talents he gave me, " never to have any thing more to do with " Pheroras: and then when Pheroras cry'd " out, what hurt have we done him? Nay, " for that, (ſays Antipater) I wiſh he would " but content himſelf to ſtrip us naked, and " then leave us alive. But what can a body " hope for from ſo very a brute, that makes " the open profeſſion of friendſhip intolerable " and dangerous? But, ſays he, here do we " content ourſelves to meet and enjoy one ano- " ther by ſtealth: whereas if we had but the " hearts and hands of men, we might find " means to aſſert our rights and liberties in " another way".

THIS was the woman's confeſſion; and that Pheroras had ſome thoughts of getting away with them to Petra. It was a clear diſcovery, but the greateſt evidence of all to Herod, was the hundred talents; for he had only menti- on'd that particular to Antipater. So that he began with Doris, Antipater's mother, as the firſt object of his fury; took away all the orna- ments, and precious things he had given her, to the value of many talents: and, after the rifling of her, he baniſh'd her. After this, upon the cooling of his choler, he caus'd Phe- roras's women to be taken off the torture; but trembling all the while, and diſtracted be- twixt jealouſies and fears. Nay, he was ſo ſtrict and cautious in his cruelties, that he put the innocent to the torture without diſtinction, for fear any of the guilty ſhould eſcape.

The diſcove- ry clear and certain.

Herod's mer- cileſs rigour.

THE next that took his turn was Antipater the Samaritan, the deputy of the other Anti- pater: and it appear'd by his evidence, that Antipater ſent for poiſon into Egypt, by a certain friend of Antiphilus, with a deſign upon the king's life; which he receiv'd from Theudion, the uncle of Antipater, and upon his order deliver'd it to Pheroras; who had taken upon him the doing of the deed, while he himſelf ſhould be at Rome, and out of di- ſtance to be ſuſpected: Pheroras committing the care of the poiſon to his wife to lay it up.

The evidence ofAntipater's deputy about the poiſon.

THE king ſent preſently, upon this, for the widow of Pheroras, and commanded her without any delay to ſhew him the ſecret ſhe had receiv'd. She went out in that moment with a pretence to fetch it; but caſt herſelf head long from the top of the houſe, to pre- vent both the torture and the diſcovery: but God's providence would not ſuffer Antipater to eſcape thus; for her fall was not mortal. She was taken up and carry'd to the king, and ſo ſoon as ever ſhe came to herſelf (for the fall had diſordered her ſenſes) the king put her to it, to tell him what made her take that deſ- perate leap; aſſuring her upon his oath, that if ſhe ſpake the truth, ſhe ſhould have no fur- ther puniſhment; but if ſhe falſify'd, ſhe ſhould die upon the torture, without allowing her ſo much as the rites of a burial.

The evidence of Pheroras's widow.

AFTER ſhe had kept ſilence for a ſhort time, ſhe expreſs'd herſelf to this effect: " Am I, " ſays ſhe, to keep ſecrets, now Pheroras is " dead and gone, in favour of Antipater, who " has been the deſtruction of us all? Great " prince! give me the hearing, and I call " that God, who cannot be deceiv'd, to bear " witneſs of the truth of what I ſay. When " you (ſpeaking to Herod) were upon a viſit " to Pheroras in his ſickneſs, and weeping over " him, my husband call'd me to him. See, " my dear wife, ſays he, how much I have " been miſtaken in my opinion of my brother's " kindneſs to me; for in plain terms, I hated " him, and meditated the death of this man, " that ſhews ſo generous a pity for me in my " diſtreſs, (though yet among the living) but " I have the juſt reward of my iniquity. And " now fetch me immediately the remainder of " the poiſon that Antipater gave you to keep, " and burn it before my face: I ſhall carry " the vengeance of a troubled conſcience into " the other world elſe. I brought it as I was " bid, and threw the greateſt part of the poi- " ſon into the fire before his eyes; the reſt I " reſerved for a time of need, in caſe of the " worſt". With theſe words, ſhe produc'd a box, with a little of the poiſon in it. The brother and the mother of Antiphilus were then put to the queſtion: and their informa- tion was that Antiphilus brought that box out of Egypt; and that he receiv'd the poiſon it- ſelf from a brother of his at Alexandrion, that practis'd phyſick. It look'd as if the very ghoſts of Alexander and Ariſtobulus had been every where at work to make diſcoveries, and to draw proofs from the moſt unlucky perſons and circumſtances. It was now evident that Mariamne the daughter of the high-prieſt had a hand in the plot; as was made appear by her brothers upon the queſtion: but Herod puniſh'd the mother in the ſon; for he ſtruck Herod the ſon of Mariamne out of his will, having formerly declared him in his teſtament the ſucceſſor of Antipater.

THE laſt and the moſt ſtabbing witneſs, in confirmation of all the reſt, was Ba- thyllus, one of Antipater's freemen, who was juſt now come back from Rome, and brought with him a ſupplemental poiſon; that is to ſay, the poiſon of an aſp, and of other ſerpents, for Pheroras and his wife to finiſh the work withal, if the other ſhould fail; be- ſide another invention over and above: which was, the counterfeiting of ſeveral letters a-

Antipater counterfeits letters againſt the brothers.

* One hundred Jewiſh talents (as has been before obſerved) weighed elven thouſand four hundred and ſix pounds and ounces, and their value in ſilver amounted to thirty four thouſand two hundred and eighteeu pounds, fifteen ſhillings, and in gold to five hundred forty ſeven thouſand and five hundred pounds Engliſh money.

gainſt the brothers, which were of Antipater's compoſition.

Archelaus and Philip princes of great hope.

ARCHELAUS and Philip were at that time at Rome, in the courſe of their ſtudies. They were now grown up, and young men of great hope and courage; and beſides all that, the ſons of the king, and ſo dangerous an obſtacle in Antipater's way to preferment, that he had little hope of gaining his point, unleſs he could get them removed: and in order to that end, he got letters forg'd againſt them in the name of ſeveral of his friends then living at Rome; ſome of them altogether upon the ſubject of their irreverent diſcourſes upon their father; openly and violently exclaiming againſt the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus; taking it very ill that they ſhould be now ſent for from Rome, for their father had order'd them to return home: and this was the thing that troubled Antipater more than all the reſt. Nay, Antipater was in a practice of forgery, and ſecret intelligence, even before he left Judea, and procur'd letters from Rome to Herod upon the ſame ſubject; while he himſelf, for the avoiding of ſuſpicion, apply'd himſelf to his father as a kind of advocate for his brothers.

Antipater a great dealer in forgery, and falſe intelligence.

Nothing but fraud and hypocriſy.

"He hop'd they were not ſo bad, he ſaid, "ſome things might be falſe, and others "might have more of the heat and raſhneſs of "youth in them than of malice". It was a vaſt expence he was at all this while upon his intelligences, toward the deſtruction of his brothers: and to confound the account, he brought a great many rich garments, carpets, gold and ſilver plate, and ſeveral other curioſities of great price, to the value of two * hundred talents upon the whole; which he plac'd to the account of the ſuit they had with Sylleus, as a blind to the ſubornation.

THUS it went, but the greater evil ſwallow'd up the leſs: for when the whole country rung of the parricide, and all letters and witneſſes agreed in the proof and deteſtation of a repeated deſign upon the lives of the brothers, there was not ſo much as one word mention'd upon the road out of Judea, of the preſent ſtate of Herod's family; though it was now full ſeven months betwixt the proof of the fact and Antipater's return. But all the world hated him, or who knows but it might be a peculiar providence that ſtopp'd people's mouths, that would otherwiſe have been blabbing; in order to the execution of a divine vengeance upon ſo many horrid murders?

ANTIPATER wrote Herod word now, that he was juſt entring upon his journey, and how honourably Ceſar had treated him, and diſmiſs'd him. But the king was ſtill in pain till he had him ſure; ſo that for fear of having him diverted by any precaution, he wrote him the kindeſt letters, in pretence, imaginable; and, in a familiar way, deſir'd him to be with him as ſoon as poſſible; for if he made haſte, he might compound for his mother's fault; whom Antipater knew to be baniſh'd already. The firſt notice he had of the death of Pheroras was by a letter he received at Tarentum; which wounded him to the very heart. Some look'd upon it as a matter of decency and good nature in ſo near a relation, but others again of more diſcernment, imputed this exceſs of ſorrow, not ſo much to his tenderneſs for Pheroras, as for the loſs of ſo wicked and neceſſary an inſtrument, and for the diſappointment of the plot: beſide that he was in ſome apprehenſion too of being detected in what he had done, and for fear the ſtory of the poiſon ſhould come out Upon his coming into Cilicia, he receiv'd his father's letter above-mentioned: and then haſten'd away preſently.

Herod in pain till he had Antipater ſure.

The news of Pheroras's death ſtartled Antipater upon divers accounts.

AT his coming to Celenderis, he had a kind of inward foreboding upon him: and, in particular, his mother's condition fill'd his ſoul with frightful apprehenſions. The wiſer and more cautious part of his friends, were abſolutely againſt going to his father, till he were certainly inform'd upon what pretence his mother was divorced, for fear he himſelf ſhould come to be involved in his mother's crime. But the leſs conſiderate of his friends were altogether for being at home again, without any regard to Antipater's Intereſt: they counſel'd him by all means to make all imaginable haſte, for fear his delay might render him ſuſpected, and ſuggeſt matter for calumny to work upon. For if any thing ſhould be mov'd againſt him, it would be done in his abſence; and no man would dare to open his mouth againſt him, if he were upon the place; beſide that it would be a madneſs to hazzard a certain advantage upon a wild fanſy; whereas he was rather immediately to poſt away to his father, to be within diſtance of receiving a kingdom that could be no body's but his. Antipater was over-rul'd by the fatality of an impulſe, and ſo he proſecuted his voyage to Sebaſte a port of Ceſarea.

Antipater's friends divided, whether he ſhould return to his father or not.

The latter carried it, and ſo he went forward to Sebaſte.

BUT upon his arrival, to his great admiration, the people all avoided him, and not a creature durſt come near him. They hated him as much before, 'tis true; but they were not ſo much at liberty to ſhew it: ſome were afraid of the king, for all the talk was now of Antipater: and Antipater was the only man all this while that knew the leaſt of himſelf. Never was any man more glorious at his ſetting out for Rome, or ſo abject and contemptible as he was upon his return. He was no ſtranger to the broils and confuſions of the family; but he had the wit to keep his fears as much as poſſible to himſelf, and with a chearful countenance to conceal an aking heart. There was no poſſibility of making an eſcape, or of any other way of relieving himſelf in this extremity: he had no certainty of the affairs of the family; for no body durſt come at him to inform him; ſo that he had now and then ſome intervals of hope, either that things were not diſcover'd, or in caſe of the worſt, he did not deſpair of bringing himſelf off by confidence and impoſture, which were the only two friends he had to truſt to.

When Antipater came to the place, to his great admiration, not a creature would own him.

Antipater had nothing left him to truſt to, but confidence and impoſture

BEING thus arm'd and prepar'd, he advanc'd without his friends into the palace; for his train was repuls'd with contempt at the firſt gate. It ſo fell out that Varus the governour of Syria was then preſent. Upon his entrance, he had the impudence to addreſs himſelf to his father, as in a way of duty and reſpect; but as he approached nearer him, Herod put out his hand to ſtop him, and with a down look cry'd out to him. "What! ſays he, ſhall a "parricide preſume to embrace me? A curſe "upon the impious ſoul of thee, for daring to "come near me till thou haſt clear'd thyſelf "of all thy crimes! And you have here your "judge before you, Varus; who ſhall paſs "ſentence upon you according to your deme-

Antipater ſtood mute, and without one word in return, went his way back again. His mother and his wife came to him afterwards, and inform'd him of the whole proceeding. This brought him to himſelf again, and to conſider what he had to ſay in his own juſtification.

The court met the day following. The witneſſes produced. HEROD, having a council next day of his friends and relations, call'd likewiſe the friends of Antipater to be there preſent; himſelf and Varus ſitting preſident. He cauſed all the witneſſes to be brought in; of which number there were certain ſervants of Doris the mother of Antipater, that had been long ſince priſoners. Theſe ſervants brought letters from the mother to the ſon, to this purpoſe: "Your "father knows all, and therefore have a care "of coming near him, unleſs you can depend "upon Ceſar for his protection." After the introducing of the witneſſes, Antipater enter'd the court; and caſting himſelf at the feet of his father: "I beſeech you, Sir, (ſays he) Antipater at enters the court, and his father's feet prays only for an impartial hearing. "grant me an impartial hearing without pre-"judging my cauſe, and I make no doubt of "proving myſelf to be an innocent perſon."

A plauſible diſcourſe of Herod's to Varus. HEROD call'd out to him aloud to hold his tongue, and ſo directed his diſcourſe to Varus. "I do certainly know, ſays he, that you, "Varus, or any other unbiaſs'd judge, will "be fully ſatisfy'd that Antipater deſerves to "die; but I am afraid, in the mean time, "what opinion you may conceive of my in-"vidious fortune; as if this calamity were "juſtly befallen me for being the father of "ſuch children. But I have ſome right how-"ever to your humanity and compaſſion, for "having been ſo indulgent a father to ſuch "profligate wretches: as for the young men "that are now dead and gone, I deſign'd "them for the government, and train'd them "up at Rome in the court and favour of Ce-"ſar, the better to prepare them for the exer-"ciſe of royal dignity; and none at laſt ſo "great enemies of my peace and ſafety, as "thoſe that I had rais'd in the world, even "to be the envy of princes. But Antipater "made his profit of their ruin; for he found "his account in it, as a ſecurity to himſelf in "the ſucceſſion. And what is the requital "now that this monſter deſigns me for all theſe "tenderneſſes, but the entering into a practice "againſt the life of his father? I was likely to "live too long he thought: nay, I had liv'd "too long already, and that was his grie-"vance. The crown alone would not content "him, it ſeems, unleſs he made his way to it "through the blood of his father. And in this "truly he ſeem'd to have ſome colour of rea-"ſon, for my bringing him back to court out "of a private condition, to the excluſion of "the ſons I had by the queen, in declaring "him my ſucceſſor.

"Now to confeſs myſelf to you, Varus, I "am convinc'd of my error. I did not do well "to provoke my ſons by cutting off the ſuc-"ceſſion to their wrong, and in favour of An-"tipater; for what did I ever do for them "comparable to what I did for him? He had "a great part of the adminiſtration in his hands "while I was living; and the ſucceſſion ac-"tually ſettled upon him after my death; and "beſide other gratifications, a ſeparate re-"venue of fifty * talents, and his expences "every where upon my charge; three hund-"red † talents upon his voyage to Rome, and "the only perſon of my whole family that I "recommended to Ceſar, as my preſerver. Take "them all together, they had not half the wick-"edneſs in them of Antipater, and the proofs "againſt them were infinitely ſhort of what I "have againſt him; and yet this bloody "wretch has the face to plead innocent, and "does not deſpair I perceive of baffling the "truth with a trick. Varus, look to yourſelf, "for he will make a defence plauſible enough; "but I know the beaſt thorough all his diſ-"guiſes and impoſtures, and that he is falſe "at the bottom.

"THIS is the man that was ſo earneſt with "me, time paſt, to have a care of Alexander, "and how I expos'd my perſon. How often "would he come into my bed-chamber, and "look about and ſearch for fear of treachery? "This man was my guardian, and my ſecu-"rity while I ſlept; my comforter in my "mourning for the dead brothers; and one "that would undertake for the duty of thoſe "that were living: my champion, in fine, and "my guard. When I call to mind, and con-"ſider the addreſs, and the hypocriſy of this "man, how artificially he laid his ſnares, and "cover'd his deſigns; I can hardly think my-"ſelf alive at this day, or how it was poſſi-"ble for me to eſcape the nooſe. But ſince "my fate will have it ſo, and that my great-"eſt enemies are to be thoſe of my own fa-"mily, and thoſe I have been the kindeſt to; "I ſhall only deplore the hardſhip of my in-"evitable deſtiny, and keep my ſorrows to "myſelf; but with this reſolution, that not "one man comes off that ſhall be found guil-"ty of thirſting after my blood, though all "my ſons ſhould fall in the condemnation."

Nicolaus enters upon the proofs. HEROD brake off upon this period, in a confuſion of thought, and gave order to Nicolaus, one of his friends, to enter upon the proofs. Antipater, who had lain proſtrate all this while at Herod's feet, now rais'd his head, and with a little exclamation addreſs'd himſelf to his father. "You have had the "goodneſs, Sir, ſays he, to plead my cauſe; "for how can I be a parricide, whom you "yourſelf have ſo often own'd to have been "your preſerver? If my piety be only impo-

" it is, how came I to be ſo crafty in one caſe,
" and ſo beſotted in another, as not to under-
" ſtand, that though men may be impos'd up-
" on, yet the all-ſearching and the all-ſeeing
" eye of God, that knows our hearts, will not
" ſuffer ſo great a wickedneſs to paſs un-
" puniſh'd? God's vengeance overtook my " brothers, becauſe of their undutifulneſs to " you. But what temptation had I now to " practiſe upon your life? The hope of a king" dom? Why, I did as good as reign already.
" Or was it that I thought you hated me?
" That was impoſſible, after ſo many demon-
" ſtrations to the contrary. Was I afraid of " you? when quite on the other hand, others
" ſtood in awe of me, in conſideration of the " zeal I had for your ſafety. Or was it that I " wanted any thing? So far from it, that all
" my profuſions were ſupply'd out of your
" treaſure: ſo that certainly I muſt be the " worſt, even of men, and of brutes, to be " wanting in good offices toward ſo kind a fa" ther; being a perſon that you yourſelf, as
" you ſay, receiv'd into your favour, prefer'd
" to ſo many of your other ſons, and whom " you declar'd king while you yourſelf were
" yet living; beſide other benefits, in pro" portion, to make me the envy of other " men.

" WRETCH that I am! and this fatal jour" ney of mine to give ſo much time and mat" ter for envy and treachery to work upon! But " it was, Sir, for the ſervice of yourſelf, and
" of your affairs, that I undertook this voy-
" age; and to keep Sylleus from putting af-
" fronts upon your old age. Rome is the wit-
" neſs of my loyalty, and ſo is the prince of " Rome, and of the world, Ceſar himſelf,
" that has ſo often celebrated me for my re-
" verence to my father. Be pleaſed, I beſeech
" you, to receive theſe letters that have more
" truth in them than all the forgeries that " have been trump'd up againſt me: theſe let" ters are my juſtification, and the infallible
" arguments of a ſincere affection for you.
" You may remember, Sir, how unwillingly I " took that journey to lay myſelf at the mer" cy of all the enemies I left behind me. It
" was your command, Sir, that ruin'd me,
" how unwillingly ſoever, in forcing me to
" give my adverſaries time for concerting their " malice againſt me.

" IF I had been a parricide, divine juſtice,
" either by ſea or land would have found me
" out. But I ſhall not lay the ſtreſs of my in" nocence upon that argument; for I know
" very well that with God's permiſſion you
" have condemn'd me in your heart already.
" All that I beg even in this ſtate, is only that " I may not ſuffer upon the credit of proofs
" extorted by torment: but let me rather be " put to the teſt, either of fire, ſcrews, or
" what other inſtruments of cruelty you ſhall
" think fit; without any mercy to a miſera-
" ble carcaſs: for if I am a parricide, no pain
" can be too much for me." Antipater deliver'd theſe words with ſuch a paſſion of tears and outcries, that the whole court, Varus and all, were ſoften'd at it. Herod alone was ſo tranſported with rage at the ſenſe of the wickedneſs, and the clearneſs of the evidence, that all Antipater's tears and ejulations paſs'd with him only for matters of courſe.

THIS declamation of Antipater's was followed by Nicolaus; who prefac'd what he had to ſay, with a diſcourſe upon the craft of Antipater, as the king had order'd; which upon the main, amounted to a mortal accuſation, without leaving any hope of mercy. For all the iniquities of the kingdom were imputed to Antipater; eſpecially the deſtruction of the brothers, which was manifeſtly the effect of his calumnies; beſides his practices upon the ſurvivors, as ſtanding in the way of his preferment. And it could not be expected, that he that could think of poiſoning his father, would ever ſpare his brothers. When he came to the proof of the poiſon, the evidences were produc'd in order; with aggravations upon the crime of Pheroras, who by Antipater's means had been induced to practice upon his brother;
the king's beſt friends corrupted, and the whole palace fill'd with lewdneſs. This he ſaid, with a great deal more to the ſame purpoſe, and ſo concluded.

Nicolaus very ſevere upon Antipater.

The evidences of the poiſon produc'd in order.

IN the next place, Varus call'd upon Antipater to anſwer for himſelf; who ſaid no more than that God was witneſs of his innocence, and ſo held his peace. Varus then call'd for the poiſon, and gave a draught of it to a condemn'd perſon, who dy'd immediately. He had afterward ſome private diſcourſe with Herod, tranſmitted the proceeding to Ceſar, and ſo departed the next day. The king kept Antipater in chains, and gave Ceſar an account of the proſecution.

ANTIPATER was charg'd, after this, with a treacherous deſign upon Salome: for a ſervant of Antiphilus, at his return from Rome, brought the king a letter from one Acme, who waited upon the empreſs; wherein ſhe gave him to underſtand, that finding ſeveral letters from Salome to Julia, among her miſtreſs's papers, ſhe thought it might be a good office privately to ſend him the papers. Now theſe letters were ſtuffed with the moſt virulent ſcan-dals and reproaches upon the king that could be invented, and all of Antipater's contrivance; and Acme only employ'd as an inſtrument, for a ſum of money to convey them to Herod. And the thing was made yet more evident by another letter to Antipater from the ſame woman, in theſe very words. " I have " written to your father, according to your " direction; and I have likewiſe ſent him o" ther letters. You may depend upon it that " the king will never forgive his ſiſter after
" the reading of them. Pray take care when " your ends are accompliſh'd, that you do not " forget your promiſe."

Antipater in a plot with Acme againſt Salome

UPON the detecting of this forgery, and other ſubornations againſt Salome, Herod grew extremely ſad and penſive, when he conſider'd how narrowly Salome had eſcap'd the ſnare of Antipater: and he could not forbear thinking but that Alexander himſelf, might be taken off too by ſuch another impoſture: ſo that he took up a peremptory reſolution, without any more delay, to do juſtice upon Antipater in the name of the whole family. But in this very nick of time, Herod was diverted by a ſudden fit of ſickneſs from the execution of it.
He ſent Ceſar however an account of Acme's part in the intrigue, and the treacherous practices againſt Salome. He alter'd his will upon it, ſtruck Antipater out of it, and ſubſtituted Antipas in his place, taking no notice of

He gave alſo to his ſiſter Salome legacies to a mighty value. This was all ſettled accordingly by his laſt will.

The miſery of Herod, both in body and mind.

HEROD, betwixt age, ſickneſs, and grief, grew every day weaker and weaker. He was now threeſcore and ten, and ſo inconſolably afflicted about the death of his ſons, that in his beſt health he had no joy even in life itſelf. He was at this time very ill; but the thought of Antipater's being ſtill alive, was yet the moſt ſenſible part of his trouble; for his thoughts were intent upon nothing ſo much as the appointment of Antipater's execution, ſo ſoon as ever he ſhould find himſelf in condition to order it. And,

An outrageous tumult.

UPON the neck of theſe calamities, there happen'd a new broil upon a popular tumult; and the two heads of it were Judas the ſon of * Sephoreus, and Matthias the ſon of † Margalus; two ſophiſts, famous for their skill in the laws, and conſequently of great reputation among the people. They were mightily follow'd by the younger ſort, and their lectures daily throng'd and crowded with numerous congregations. When theſe rabbies found the king languiſhing, betwixt anguiſh of thought and diſtemper, they declared among their acquaintance, how fit a time that might be to vindicate the honour of God, in the demoliſhing of all works whatſoever erected contrary to his holy laws; averring that the ſetting up of images in the temple, or the likeneſs of any living creature, was abſolutely forbidden. Now this was underſtood to point at the golden eagle that Herod had plac'd upon the great gate; and ſo ſet the multitude at work preſently to pluck it down, as the moſt glorious hazard they could run, for their laws and their country, even if they ſhould die in the attempt; for ſuch an end would be follow'd with everlaſting life and happineſs, and with immortal honour; whereas none but narrow grovelling ſouls, and unthinking wretches, would rather chuſe to die in their beds of a diſeaſe, than fall a ſacrifice to religion and virtue. While this humour was a working, came the ſurprizing news all on a ſudden that the king was juſt upon the point of death: this made the rabble bolder, and more outrageous than before; inſomuch that they mounted the temple at noon-day, and letting down themſelves with ſtrong ropes, with axes they hew'd the golden eagle to pieces, a great multitude of people in the temple looking on. The captain of the guards had no ſooner notice of this uproar, but he fell in among them preſently with a party, ſeiz'd about forty of the || forwardeſt, and carry'd them away to the king. Are you ſo inſolent (ſays Herod) as to break the golden eagle? They told him Yes, they had done it. By what order? (ſays Herod again) By the laws of our country, they cry'd. Well! ſays he, and what makes you ſo chearful now when you are ſure to die? We are chearful, ſaid they, in the aſſurance of a better life after this. The king was ſo mov'd at this behaviour, that his anger put new life into him, and made him in ſome meaſure forget his diſeaſe. He call'd them over and over ſacrilegious and ſeditious miſcreants, under a colour of law to attempt the over-turning of the government: but, ſays he, like a company of wicked creatures you have behav'd yourſelves, and like ſuch you ſhall be puniſh'd. The people were afraid the ſeverity might go too far, and therefore made it their requeſt to Herod, that he would content himſelf with juſtice upon the ring-leaders and the priſoners, and ſhew mercy to the reſt. The king was at laſt prevail'd upon, and order'd thoſe that came down by the ropes, and the  two heads of the faction to be burnt alive; and thoſe that were taken together, to have their heads ſtruck off by the common hangman.

In this inſtant comes news that Herod was given over.

The rabble grows bolder upon it, and cuts the golden eagle to pieces.

The guards maſter the faction, and carry their priſoners to the king.

The people reaſon the matter with Herod.

The two rabbies and the ring-leaders are put to death.

A ſtrange complication of diſeaſes.

HEROD by this time was all over in pain from head to foot; a violent fever; an intolerable itching all over his body; gripes of the cholick; dropſical humours; windy pains in his ſtomach; his privy parts putrify'd, and crawling with worms; difficulty of breathing; broken ſighs; contraction of the nerves, and convulſions all over. Some were ſuperſtitious enough to make this calamity a judgment upon him, in revenge for the two rabbies: but yet notwithſtanding all the torments and diſeaſes he had to ſtruggle with, he was ſtill ſo deſirous of life, that in this very extremity he ſought for new remedies, and cheriſh'd ſome hope yet of his recovery. He croſs'd the Jordan, and try'd the warm baths of Callirrhoe that run into the lake Aſphaltitis; a water not only medicinal, but pleaſant to the taſte. His phyſicians then adviſ'd him to a bath of warm oil; but upon dipping into the veſſel he loſt his ſenſes, and his eyes were ſet in his head. This laſt fit was ſo ghaſtly, that his keepers broke all out into a clamour at the fright; ſo that the very outcry brought him a little to himſelf again. But at laſt when he found himſelf paſt all poſſibility of recovery, he order'd the ſoldiers fifty *† drachms a man, and money to a great value to be divided betwixt his governors and his friends.

WHEN he came back to Jericho, and found his caſe deſperate, he did in a manner threaten death itſelf, by one of the moſt dreadful reſolutions that ever was heard of; the raging violence of his choler having put him directly into a flame. He ſent out an order quite thro' Judea, for the ſeizing of all the nobility, and ſhutting them up in the Circus || or Hippodrome. Upon this, he ſpoke to Salome, and her husband Alexas: "I know very well (ſays "he) that the Jews will make holiday of the "day of my death; but I ſhall take care not "to want mourners, or a ſplendid pomp of "funeral ſolemnities, if you two will but fol- Herod leaves orders with Salome and Alexas

Now "this will be a certain way to make the "whole province of Judea, and every parti- "cular family in it, true mourners at my "death."

JUST upon the diſpatch of this order, Herod's deputies brought letters from Rome, that Ceſar had order'd Acme, the ſervant of Julia, to be put to death; and that Antipater was alſo condemn'd to die: but the letters ſaid withal, that if his father ſhould think fit to content himſelf with baniſhment, Ceſar would not be againſt it. Herod, for the preſent, was ſomewhat reliev'd by this meſſage; but then relapſing into his pains (as he was at that time afflicted with a violent cough) he had ſome thought of laying violent hands upon himſelf: and ſo took an apple, and call'd for a knife, as if it had been only to cut or to pare it. After he had look'd a little about him, for fear of being taken notice of, he rais'd his hand with the action of a man about to ſtab himſelf; but his nephew Achiab, perceiving it, ran up to him, and catching hold of him, prevented the miſchief. Letters from Rome of Acme's being put to death, and Antipater condemn'd to die. Herod, in the horror of his pains, attempts to kill himself.

THERE was preſently, upon this, a frightful outcry rais'd in the palace, on a report that the king was dead. Antipater was over-joy'd at the hearing of it, and had the confidence to treat with his keepers for a ſum of money to let him go; but the head officer did not only refuſe to comply with the propoſal, but went in that inſtant to the king and inform'd him thereof; who, upon the hearing of it, burſt out into an exclamation ſtronger than one would have expected from a man in his condition; and thereupon order'd his guards to go that moment, and diſpatch him, and to ſee his body depoſited in the caſtle of Hyrcanion. Upon this he alter'd his teſtament once more, and declar'd the eldeſt brother Archelaus his ſucceſſor, in the place of Antipas, and made Antipas a tetrarch. A report in the palace that Herod was dead. Antipater treats with his keepers. The king orders his guards to diſpatch him immediately, And makes Archelaus his ſucceſſor inſtead of Antipas.

HEROD dy'd five days after the execution of Antipater, thirty four years from the death of Antigonus, and thirty ſeven years after he was declared king by the Romans. He was as fortunate a man as ever liv'd, ſaving the troubles in his own family, wherein he was the moſt unfortunate. He was advanced to the crown out of a private ſtate. He kept it a long time, and at laſt left it to his ſons. The death of Herod.

THE ſoldiers knew nothing as yet of the king's death; ſo that Salome went out beforehand with her husband to the Hippodrome, and order'd all the people to be ſet at liberty that were ſhut up there (though appointed for death) and every man diſmiſs'd to his own home. This was upon a pretence that Herod had chang'd his mind. So ſoon as the company was gone, publication was made of the king's death to the ſoldiery; who being then drawn together into a body, at the amphitheatre of Jericho, Ptolemy, the keeper of the royal ſignet, entertain'd them with a ſpeech in honour of the deceas'd, whom he celebrated for a fortunate prince, condoling at the ſame time with the people for ſo ſenſible a loſs. After this, he read over a letter to them, that Herod had left for the ſoldiers, being a paſſionate recommendation of his ſucceſſor to the good-will and affection of the people. After this letter, he read the will; wherein Philip was declar'd heir of Trachon, and the neighbourhood to it; Antipas tetrarch, (as I ſaid before) and Archelaus to inherit the kingdom. Herod gave order for the delivery of his ring alſo to Ceſar; and to preſent him with the knowledge of the whole matter: for there was nothing to be done, diſpos'd of, or confirm'd, but by Ceſar's authority and direction: and for the reſt, the former teſtament to ſtand as it was. Salome and Alexas diſappointed Herod's cruel order. Herod's will read.

THIS was follow'd by an unanimous ſhout of gratulations and acclamations, with a Long live Archelaus; both ſoldiers and people preſſing in with their good wiſhes and prayers. The next work was to be the interring of the body; wherein Archelaus ſpar'd neither for coſt nor care, and all the enſigns of royalty were made uſe of for the pomp and ornament of the funeral. The herſe was cover'd all over with an embroidery of gold and precious ſtones, and an intermixture of purple; and upon this was the body laid, and cover'd with purple too: a diadem upon the head; a crown of gold over that; a ſcepter in his right hand, and his children and near relations round about him: the guards and the Thracian troops, Germans and Gauls, march'd at the head of this ſolemnity, in a form and order of battle; all the reſt of the troops following their leaders alſo in very good order. And now to cloſe up the pomp, five hundred officers, domeſticks, and freemen, brought up the train. The body was carry'd two * hundred furlongs to the caſtle of Herodion; where it was bury'd according to the king's mandate. And this was the end of Herod. Ant. b. 17. c. 10. The ceremony of mourning and feasting in the case of Archelaus.

THE necessity of Archelaus's going to Rome upon the death of Herod, prov'd the occasion of new troubles. For after the ceremony of the seven days mourning was over, and the people magnificently feasted, a custom among the Jews that ruins many a man with the expence, for fear of being thought impious in the neglect; Archelaus, I say, after this solemnity, advanced all in white up to the temple, where the people received him with large expressions of reverence and respect: and he himself from a stately tribunal, and his throne of gold, shew'd as much grace and humanity to them.

His gracious declaration in favour of the people.

He gave them thanks for the care they had taken of his father's funeral, and for the royal honours they had now paid to himself, as to an anointed king. "But yet (says he) till Cesar, the declared lord and master of all, shall "have confirm'd the succession, I shall not "entitle myself so much as to the name, and "much less to the power and authority of a "king. This was it, that when the army "would have set the crown upon my head at "Jericho, made me refuse it at their hands: "though, says he, I shall never forget the "kindness and the hearty good will, both of "the soldiers and of the people, whenever "I shall come to be possess'd of regal power "from him that hath a right to confer it: "and let them depend upon it, says he, that "they shall find me upon all occasions readier "to oblige them than ever they found my "father."

The multitude brake out into unreasonable demands. Archelaus sacrifices, and treats his friends.

The multitude was mightily pleas'd with this declaration, and in the same instant put him to some sort of trial how far he would be as good as his word. They ply'd him with several petitions; some to have their taxes eas'd, others to have them wholly taken off; and some again for a discharge of prisoners; but upon the whole matter, Archelaus deny'd them nothing. This being over, he sacrific'd and feasted with his friends.

The common people began upon the subject of grievances.

About Noon, there assembled a rabble of male-contents; and no sooner was the common mourning for the death of the king over, but they began now to lament the people's grievances. "It was hard, they said, "for Herod to put people to death for cut-"ting down the golden eagle from the gate of "the temple": and this was not a discontent in secret neither; but what with tears, beating of breasts, and impetuous outcries for the loss of so many good men that effectually dy'd martyrs for the religion and laws of their country, the whole city rang with lamentations and and mourning. "We demand justice, they "cry'd, upon Herod's mercenaries, the ac- "cursed instruments that executed this wick- "edness. Wherefore, in the first place, let "Herod's high-priest be turn'd out, and a man "of more piety and integrity put in his place".

Archelaus is unwilling there were to deal with them by force, sends his officers to quiet them by fair words.

ARCHELAUS was transported at this to the uttermost degree of indignation; but being in haste upon his journey, he was not at leisure then to wait for a revenge: so that for fear of losing his opportunity one way, and leaving a tumult behind him the other, he thought it more advisable to deal with them by admonition and fair words, than by violence. Upon this, he sent his master of the horse to desire them to be quiet; but the heads of the sedition, so soon as ever he came up to the temple, fell to pelting him with stones, without hearing him speak one word. Archelaus sent after him several other messengers upon the same errand, and they all far'd alike; insomuch that they wanted but number to make it a downright rebellion.

And a roar little short of a rebellion.

The feast of the passover. A great violent multitude upon that occasion.

THE feast of unleavened bread was now at hand; the Jews call it their passover. This festival gave an occasion for sacrifices in abundance, and brought a great multitude of people up to the city upon the account of religion: divers of the faction of the two sophists among the rest, who came thither to lament the death of those pretended patriots, took up their residence in the temple, from whence they would not remove; waiting for matter to inflame their party to a sedition.

The multitude worried the guards.

ARCHELAUS had the foresight to send a band of soldiers and a tribune, with orders to seize their principals, if they should be troublesome: and this he did to obviate the danger of a general tumult. The multitude made head against this party: some they kill'd with stones, and the tribune himself came off sorely wounded; the mutineers going as innocently back again to their devotions, as if nothing had been done. Archelaus finding to his cost that this tumult was not to be appeased without blood, drew up his whole army upon them; the foot in the city, and the horse before the walls. The foot fell upon them, even in the act of sacrificing, and kill'd near three thousand of their men at the very altar. The remainder fled to the mountains; and Archelaus causing proclamation to be made for all people to depart to their own homes, put an end to the festival.

Till the army fell in and routed the whole body.

Archelaus, upon this, takes shipping for Rome. And leaves Philip to act in his stead.

THIS sedition being suppress'd, Archelaus with his mother and his three particular friends, Poplas, Ptolemy and Nicolaus, took shipping together for Rome; leaving Philip behind him, both as his viceroy, and as a trustee to manage his particular estate. Salome with her children went along with him, together with the sons of the king's brothers, and others of the kindred, under a pretext of assisting Archelaus toward the gaining of the succession: but, in reality, their business was to call him to an account for the violation of the holy temple.

Sabinus was now at Cesarea on his way for Judea

But Varus put a stop to his business, at his journey's

As they were upon the way, they met with Sabinus the governour of Syria, at Cesarea; who was then going into Judea, to take possession of the monies that Herod had left behind him; but Varus, at the instance of Archelaus, and upon the mediation of Ptolemy, put a stop to his journey: so that Sabinus, for Varus's sake, neither meddled with the castles, nor with the money, to the prejudice of Archelaus; and pass'd his promise, that he would do nothing in it, but with Cesar's approbation; and upon that account stay'd at Cesarea. But yet so soon as Varus was gone for Antioch, and Archelaus for Rome, Sabinus upon the removing of these obstacles, took his opportunity to go to Jerusalem, where he lodg'd himself in the palace, and sent from thence to the governours of the castles, and the officers of the treasury, to put the one into his hands, and to give him an account of the other. But the officers were so just to the orders and instructions of Archelaus, as to observe them to a tittle; wherefore they put off Sabinus with this answer, that they were Cesar's officers, not Archelaus's. Antipas, at the same time, put in for the kingdom too; insisting upon it, that the former testament was the better will of the two; and the succession in that testament was settled upon Antipas: and he was sure to have the interest of Salome and others of their relations that sail'd with Archelaus, toward the supporting of that pretence. He carry'd his mother with him, and Ptolemy, the brother of Nicolaus, and a try'd friend of Herod's; which went a great way in that case; for there were no two men dearer than they: but the person that he chiefly depended upon was Ireneus, a sharp man, and an excellent orator. Antipas reckon'd himself so sure in the strength of these advocates, that whoever advis'd him to any sort of deference, either to the seniority of Archelaus, or to the authority of his father in his second testament, he would scarce afford him the hearing. When they came to Rome, all the enemies of Archelaus were sure to join with Antipas: those especially who had a mind to shake off the yoke of government, or at least to be under a Roman magistracy; and in case they could not obtain that, they would have Antipas for their king.

Upon the departure of Archelaus and Varus, Sabinus goes his way to Jerusalem. Where he formally demands possession of some castles, and Herod's money. The officers put him off with a civil refusal. Antipas sets up for the succession against Archelaus. The counsel of Ireneus Antipas chiefly depends upon.

Sabinus's charge against Archelaus.

ANTIPAS laid a great stress also upon the help of Sabinus; who had already exhibited an accusation against Archelaus, by letters to Cesar; with a character on the other hand, much to the advantage of Antipas. Salome and her companions stated the very case of the charge against Archelaus, and presented it to Cesar; while Archelaus did as much on the other side for himself, in a memorial under several heads for his own justification; beside his father's seal-ring, and an account of what treasure he left behind him; which was all transmitted to Cesar by the hand of Ptolemy. Cesar, computing with himself what he had heard on both sides; considering also the greatness of the kingdom, and the variety of large revenues; the numerous family of Herod, together with the letters of Varus and Sabinus, he call'd the Roman nobility to meet in council; where Caius Cesar, the son of Agrippa and his daughter Julia, was the first time commanded to take his place at the board; and so they proceeded to the trial.

Salome's charge against him. Archelaus's defence.

Cesar hears both sides, and proceeds to a trial.

ANTIPATER, the son of Salome, an eloquent orator, and a bitter enemy to Archelaus, open'd the cause; suggesting, in the first place, "That Archelaus had long since exercis'd so- "vereign authority in effect, and that it was "now but matter of form to contend about "the name. For what signifies a hearing be- "fore Cesar, to him that has already refus'd him

Antipater opens the cause against Archelaus.

" him for a judge? for Herod was no sooner dead, but people were immediately engag'd, and suborn'd to set the crown upon his head; while he himself did not only sit like a king in a royal state, and upon a golden throne, but act like one also; as in changing the order of the militia, disposing of charges, receiving and granting petitions; exercising the power of life and death in publick crimes; setting his father's prisoners at liberty, &c. which are all regal privileges. Now for this person that has already engross'd to himself the powers and ensigns of royalty, to come to Cesar only for the title of it, makes Augustus but a shadow of a prince, and a king in sound, not in effect.

" AND then further, (says Antipater) what's all the solemnity of Archelaus's mourning for his dead father, more than an empty piece of formality? He affects sorrow all day, and then sits up feasting and carousing all night. And what was it at last, but the detestation the people had for his hypocrisy, that rais'd the late sedition?" But the main stress of the charge was yet to come; which was, " a horrible slaughter about the temple. It was a festival day; the people gather'd together to worship, and pay their devotions, and they themselves were made the sacrifice. Their throats, in short, were cut, and such heaps of dead bodies pil'd up in the temple, as in the most implacable and merciless of foreign wars was hardly ever heard of. Now Herod was so well acquainted with the cruelty of this man's nature, that it was almost impossible for him ever to give him the least hope of a crown, so long as he was in his right senses. And that, alas! was not the king's case in the latter testament: his mind was more out of order than his body; and he did not know what he did. Beside that after all this, there was no disability or defect charg'd upon Antipas the successor by the former will; but people gave him the character of a prince very well qualify'd for the royal function. Or what if it should be supposed now, that Herod was, in truth, sound and in his right senses? Archelaus has as good as abdicated the royal dignity by acting against the laws of the constitution. What havock would this young man make now, if he had Cesar's authority to cover him in his cruelties, that does all this upon his own account without any power at all?"

ANTIPATER spoke abudantly to this effect, and a great many near relations of Archelaus gave evidence against him to the several points. When Antipater had now finish'd his plea for the plaintiff, Nicolaus rose up for the defendant; who, in the first place, made it appear, " That the slaughter committed in the temple was not only of absolute necessity, but the people that were kill'd were Cesar's enemies." He shew'd likewise, " That for the other pretended crimes, the present opposers of Archelaus were themselves the advisers of them." As to the validity of the second testament, he argu'd, " That it ought to stand, in regard that Herod had at that time the consideration and respect to refer the confirmation of it to Cesar. Now he that had the judgment to know the right lord and master, had certainly sense enough to appoint the right heir."

Nicolaus for the defendant.

WITH these words Nicolaus concluded his argument, and Archelaus then stepp'd out on a sudden and cast himself at Cesar's feet; who took him presently up again with so singular a a grace of benignity and respect, that he gave to understand by it, he thought him worthy to succeed his father; but gave no positive determination at that time.

Archelaus casts himself at Cesar's feet, who receives him graciously.

THIS being done, Cesar dismiss'd the council for that day, and enter'd into a deliberation with his friends what was to be done in the case: whether to chuse any of those that were in the will, for a successor, or to make an equal partition of the principality among the whole family; for they were numerous, and it would require a great expence to maintain them all with honour.

And so adjourns the court.

Ant. b. 17. c. 15.

BEFORE Cesar came to any resolution upon the succession, Malthace the mother of Archelaus fell sick and dy'd. At this time there came letters from Varus, out of Syria, of a revolt among the Jews; which Varus foreseeing, went up to Jerusalem upon Archelaus's journey to Rome, to restrain the incendiaries, and to keep things quiet. When he found this would not do, and that the multitude was still unruly, he quarter'd one of the three legions he brought out of Syria, in the city; and so went back again to Antioch.

The death of Malthace the mother of Archelaus.

The Jews in an uproar.

BUT when Sabinus came afterward to Jerusalem, he furnished the Jews with new matter to work upon. For finding himself enforc'd with Varus's troops, beside a band of his domesticks, that were all arm'd, and within call, to serve the turn of his violence and avarice; his design was to get the castles, and Herod's monies into his hands, by force and menace upon the governors and other officers that had them in charge. It was now the feast of pentecost, or the fiftieth day; so call'd from the term of the revolution after seven times seven days. The people gather'd together in prodigious numbers, not so much for religion, as for spite and indignation; a world out of Galilee, Idumea, Jericho, and the country beyond Jordan, with the inhabitants of Judea; that for number and courage were more considerable than the rest. They divided into three bodies, and pitch'd their tents in three quarters: one upon the north of the temple, another upon the south, toward the Hippodrome; and the third to the westward

Sabinus preſſes Varus for relief, and takes ſanctuary in the tower of Phaſael

SABINUS's heart began to fail him, betwixt the courage and the number of the enemies; ſo that he preſs'd Varus, by frequent expreſſes, to bring him relief immediately, or all would be loſt elſe. He took care of himſelf, however, and got into the tower of the caſtle that commanded all the reſt, which took its name from Phaſael the brother of Herod, that was ſlain by the Parthians. Sabinus, from this tower, gave a ſignal to the legionaries to break in upon the enemy; but he had not the heart himſelf to lead on the very men that he was to command. The Romans, according to their order, made a deſperate attempt upon the temple, and it came to a very bloody fight; but ſo long as the Jews had no help from above, either with darts or arrows, the Romans, being the better ſoldiers, had the advantage of them. But when the Jews afterward came to get poſſeſſion of the galleries, and to gall the Romans from over head, there were abundance of them kill'd, and at the ſame time out of diſtance to take their revenge; but hand to hand they would have been much too hard for them.

An aſſault given to the temple, and a bloody fight upon it.

The Jews gall the Romans from the galleries above.

UPON this pinch the Romans ſet fire to the galleries, which, for the workmanſhip, proportions, and ornament, were every way incomparable. There were abundance of the Jews that periſh'd in the fire; ſome cut off by the enemy upon their fall, others puſh'd off from the battlements, and ſome again, in deſpair, choſe rather to die by the ſword than by the fire, and laid violent hands upon themſelves. Thoſe that made any attempt upon the Romans from the walls, were deſtroy'd without any difficulty; till at laſt, all of them being either kill'd or ſcatter'd, the ſoldiers made a booty of the holy treaſure, carrying off four * hundred talents. and leaving the remainder to Sabinus, all but what was carried away by ſtealth.

The Romans ſet fire to the galleries, with a great ſlaughter.

The ſoldiers pillage the holy treaſure.

THIS loſs of men and treaſure brought on an inforcement of a more dangerous body of Jews upon the Romans than the other, both for valour and number. They ſummon'd the palace, and ſet down before it, with a menace of giving no quarter, unleſs they immediately quitted it, and offering Sabinus liberty to depart with his legion, and what other troops he had about him, if he thought fit, as there were a great many court-volunteers, and three thouſand men of Sebaſte, (the braveſt fellows Herod had in his army.) Theſe were commanded by Rufus and Gratus; Rufus an officer of the horſe, and Gratus of the foot, both of them men of courage and conduct, and a conſiderable advantage to the parties they ſided with, even in their ſingle perſons. The Jews ſtill preſs'd the ſiege, and attempted the walls of the caſtle, calling out to Sabinus all the while to quit the place and be gone, without oppoſing himſelf any longer to the reſolution they had taken of recovering their liberties. Sabinus would willingly have gone off, if he durſt have truſted them; but their civility look'd ſo like a ſnare, that he ſuſpected it; and therefore, in the hope of relief from Varus, he ſtood the ſiege.

The Jews ſummon the palace, and ſit down before it.

They offer Sabinus conditions, which he refuſes, for fear of a ſnare.

Rufus and Gratus, two eminent officers.

JUDEA was at that time all over in tumults, and pretenders of all ſorts waiting for an opportunity to break in upon the government; as there were gotten together a band of two thouſand veterans in Idumea, that had formerly ſerv'd under Herod. They were well arm'd and appointed, and had ſeveral encounters with the king's troops, particularly with Achiab, Herod's kinſman, who had often to do with them upon ſallies out of wall'd towns, but in the plain field he was not able to deal with them.

Judea all over in factions and broils.

IN Sepphoris of Galilee there was one Judas, the ſon of Hezekias, (the famous captain of the robbers, formerly taken by Herod.) This Judas had at that time gather'd together a conſiderable body of men, forcing the king's magazines, and arming himſelf and his companions out of thoſe ſtores, ſetting himſelf againſt all oppoſers, and extremely haraſſing the country.

The perſon and exploits of Judas the ſon of Hezekias, the great robber.

THERE was then alſo on the other ſide of the river, one Simon, formerly a domeſtick of Herod's. He was a man of a prodigious ſize and ſtature, a robuſt body, and of ſo exact a ſymmetry, that nothing could be more graceful in the proportions of one part to another. He conducted a parcel of thieves, and went up and down roving with a crown upon his head, burning and laying waſte wherever he came as at Jericho; he ſet fire to the king's palace there, and laid ſeveral glorious buildings in aſhes round about it; where, with much eaſe, he made himſelf maſter of a very rich booty. He was in a fair way to have gone through with his work, and made a clear country of it, if Gratus, who commanded the king's foot, had not brought his archers from Trachon, and a brave body of Sebaſtens, ſeaſonably in to their relief. In ſhort, they fought, and Simon was worſted, a great part of his foot cut off, and himſelf put to the rout; but as he was upon his flight a-croſs a ſteep bottom, Gratus gaincop'd him, and with a blow athwart the neck and ſhoulders cut him down. This was the end of Simon. But there was another gang yet of the ſame ſort of people that were gotten together about † Amathus and the borders of Jordan, which laid all the palaces in rubbiſh thereabouts.

Simon formerly a ſervant of Herod's.

THERE was alſo at that time a certain ſhepherd, whoſe name was ‡ Athronges, who had the confidence to ſet up for a king. He had a body to execute any thing, and ſo daring a reſolution, that he feared neither danger nor death itſelf; ſo that in the ſtrength of this impulſe he would run all hazards. He had for his ſeconds four brothers like himſelf, who ſerv'd him for his officers, both of war and council. They had every man his troop, and with theſe parties he made his incurſions. When he was upon any buſineſs of moment, he ſat mounted on his throne, with a crown upon his head, pronouncing judgment, and giving his orders like a very king indeed. At this rate the five brothers went on for ſome time, ſpoiling the country, and deſtroying whatever

There was a convoy one day with corn and arms that the Romans were carrying to one of their legions. Theſe free-booters met them by * Emmaus, and fought them; they kill'd Arius the centurion, and about forty of his beſt men, and they had been all loſt, if Gratus with his Sebaſtens had not come in the nick of time to bring them off. Theſe ravagers went on a conſiderable while, committing great ſpoil and havock; and nothing came amiſs to them, either natives or ſtrangers. But in the end, three of the brothers were taken; the eldeſt by Archelaus, and the two next by Gratus and Ptolemy; a fourth render'd himſelf to Archelaus upon conditions. This was the end of the adventure of theſe five men; but Judea was at this time all overrun with a pillaging plundering war.

Ant. lib. xvii. c. 16. Varus joins with the Romans againſt the Jews.

VARUS being given to underſtand from Sabinus and the chief officers at Jeruſalem, that the legion there was in danger to be loſt, he haſten'd with all poſſible expedition to their ſuccour, and ſo march'd with the two other legions he had under his command, and four wings of horſe, to Ptolemais, ordering the king's and the prince's auxiliaries to join him there at the rendezvous. The people of Berytus brought him an enforcement of fifteen hundred men well arm'd, in his paſſage. Upon his coming to Ptolemais, Aretas the king of Arabia (being a bitter enemy of Herod's) join'd him with a conſiderable body of horſe and foot. When he had drawn up his troops near Ptolemais, he ſent part of his army into Galilee, under the † command of his friend Gallus, who ſoon after encounter'd a party, and gave them a total rout, enter'd the city of Sepphoris, burnt it to the ground, and made all the inhabitants ſlaves.

Sepphoris burnt to the ground.

VARUS carried his army after this into Samaria, but ſpar'd the city, becauſe they had not intermeddled in the revolt. He encamped at ‡ Arus, a village belonging to Ptolemy, which the Arabians deſtroy'd for no other reaſon, but that he was a friend to Herod. The army advanc'd next to ‖ Sappho, a ſtrong place, which they took, rifled and pillag'd. The Arabians carried all before them with fire and ſword;  Emmaus was abandon'd, and that they burnt by the command of Varus, in revenge for the death of Arius and his companions.

Sappho taken and pillaged.

Emmaus laid in aſhes.

HE advanced from hence with his army to Jeruſalem, where the Jews quitted the ſiege upon the very ſight of his approach. Some ſhifted away into the fields and the woods; but the citizens, on the contrary, carried it fair, and welcom'd him into the town. They had nothing to do, they ſaid, in the ſedition, but laid the blame upon others; and they were ſo far from joining with the mutineers, that they were as much block'd up in the town themſelves as the Romans. But it was an high day, and they could not hinder people from coming into the city. Joſeph the nephew of Archelaus, with Rufus and Gratus the king's generals, the Sebaſtens, and the Roman ſoldiers alſo in the military habit; theſe, in the firſt place, march'd all out of the town to meet him. Sabinus durſt not look Varus in the face, and had ſtole away ſome time before out of the town to the ſea-ſide. Varus in the mean time diſpers'd his troops up and down all over the country, in ſearch of the principal authors of this tumult. They took up great numbers of them, and for thoſe ſticklers that Varus found to be leaſt malicious, he order'd them to be kept in cuſtody, and for the reſt that were more criminal, he cauſed near two thouſand of them to be crucfied.

Upon the approach of Varus the Jews quit the ſiege in a confuſion.

The citizens waſh their hands of the ſedition, and compliment Varus into the town.

Near two thouſand of the ringleaders crucified.

VARUS had intelligence yet once again of ten thouſand Jews in arms about Idumea; ſo that he immediately diſcharg'd the Arabians, and ſent them home; for they did not act as men of honour and ſoldiers, but gave themſelves wholly up to ſpoil and rapine, laying the country waſte wherever they came, which was much againſt his liking. Upon the receiving of this news, he put himſelf at the head of his own troops, and march'd directly againſt the enemy; but before it came to blows, by the advice of Achiab, they ſurrender'd themſelves, and laid down their arms. Varus was eaſy to the multitude, but ſent the officers to anſwer for themſelves to Ceſar; ſome of whom Ceſar pardoned; but finding ſome kinſmen of Herod's in the number, he proceeded againſt them as traitors, for taking up arms againſt their king. By this means Varus accommodated matters at Jeruſalem, and leaving the ſame legion again in the city that he made uſe of before for their guard, he return'd to Antioch.

The Jews petition Cesar for a free exercise of religion. Cesar calls a Council of noble men and friends, to advise upon't. The Jews and their deputies on the one hand; Archelaus and his friends on the other. A bloody invective of the Jews against Herod and his sons. Nicolaus stands up in the defence of Archelaus. Cesar hears the cause; and soon after settles the government, and sees Herod's will executed.

Ant. b. 17. c. 11.

WHILE this pass'd in Judea, there happen'd another dispute with the Jews at Rome, that put a further delay to the pretensions of Archelaus. There were fifty deputies, that had been sent to Rome from their principals at Jerusalem, before this confusion broke out, (and it was with Varus's license too.) Their business was to petition Cesar in the name of the rest, for a free liberty and exercise of their profession; and there were eight thousand Jews, inhabitants of Rome, who join'd with them in the request. Cesar called a council of the Roman nobility, and of his own particular friends, to meet in the temple of Apollo upon the Mount-Palatine; a structure of his own erecting, and as rich and curious as cost and ornament could make it. The council being assembled, there was a multitude of Jews and their embassadors ranged on the one hand, and Archelaus with his friends on the other. The kindred kept themselves upon the guard, standing a part as neuters; the envy and hatred they had for Archelaus would not suffer them to side with him, and then they were asham'd on the other hand to take part with the ememies of a prince of the blood. Among others, there was Philip the brother of Archelaus, whom Varus sent before, upon two friendly accounts; the one, that he might be within distance of assisting his brother upon occasion; the other, that in case Augustus should think fit to divide the government among the children of Herod, he himself might come in for his share.

The Jews petition Cesar for a free exercise of their religion.

Cesar calls a council of noblemen and friends to advise upon it.

The Jews and their deputies on the one hand, Archelaus and his friends on the other.

THE accusers were now to be heard; and the first point in question was this: "What "had Herod done contrary to the law? It "was then urg'd, that he never demean'd "himself like a king; but on the contrary, "as the most intolerable tyrant upon the face "of the earth. And his cruelty did not stop "neither at the profusion of innocent blood, "and the violence of justice; but he made "the very living wish themselves dead. And "he did not only tear the bodies of his sub-"jects to pieces with torments; but stript his "towns and cities of all that was choice and "precious, and gave it away in ostentation to "foreigners; sacrificing the very lives also of "the Jews to strangers. Instead of the bles-"sings of our ancient laws and liberties, he "hath left his people nothing but beggary and "iniquity in exchange; insomuch that they "have suffer'd more plagues since his coming "to the crown, than their forefathers ever "felt since their deliverance from Xerxes, out "of the captivity of Babylon.

A bloody invective of the Jews against Herod and his sons.

"BUT the Jews have been now so wonted "to slavery, that they are grown modest and pa-"tient under the yoke, even to the degree of "entailing a voluntary servitude upon their "posterity, in the person of Archelaus, the "son of the late tyrant; whom they saluted "as king immediately upon the death of his "father. They mourn'd for Herod, and offer'd "up their joint vows for the long and prospe-"rous reign of his successor at the same time. "And then, to put it out of doubt that he was the "true son of his bloody father, he made his "auspicious entrance upon the government, with "the slaughter of three thousand citizens; and "the better to entitle himself to the succes-"on, this butchery was his oblation to God "of three thousand victims; and all this up-"on a holy day, and the carcasses pil'd up in "the holy temple.

"WHAT wonder is it now for men that have "outliv'd so many miseries, and escap'd so "dangerous a rock, to own their aversion to "this man, and to fall (if perish they must) "like men of honour with their faces to the "enemy! All that the Jews desire at the hands "of the Romans, is only that Cesar will "judge the wretched remainder of them so "far worthy of pity, as not to expose them "to the rigour of their mercileſs oppressors; "but rather to annex Judea to Syria, and "range them under the laws and rules of the "Roman government. It will then be seen "whether the Jews are in truth so turbulent "and seditious a sort of people as they are gi-"ven out to be; when they fall once into the "hands of human and temperate governours. "With this petition the deputies clos'd their "charge.

Nicolaus stands up in the defense of Archelaus.

NICOLAUS, in his reply, clear'd the kings in the first place of the crimes suggested against them, and so proceeded to a character of the very nation of the Jews; setting them forth to be a people uneasy under any government, but naturally averse to kingship; concluding his discourse with some remarks upon the relations of Archelaus, who join'd with his accusers.

Cesar hears the cause, and soon after settles the government, and sees Herod's will executed.

WHEN Cesar had heard both sides, he dissolv'd the court, and after some few days bestow'd upon Archelaus one half of the kingdom under the name of an Ethnarchy, and with a promise to make him king in a short time, if he found he behav'd himself so as to deserve it. The other half he divided into two tetrarchies, which he gave to two other sons of Herod: one to Philip, the other to Antipas; who had a dispute with Archelaus about the sovereignty. There fell to his share the country beyond the river, and Galilee; of two hundred * talents yearly value. But Batanea, Trachon, and Auranitis, and some part of the land of † Zeno about Jamnia: this was assign'd to Philip, and yielded a revenue of an hundred ‡ talents. There fell into Archela-

Straton's tower, Sebaſte, Joppa, and † Jeruſalem, were all caſt into Archelaus's lot: but Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon (Greek cities) were detach'd from the kingdom, and annexed to Syria. The income upon the whole, to Archelaus, amounted to four ‡ hundred talents. Ceſar beſtow'd upon Salome, beſide what was left her by the king's will, Jamnia, Aſotus, and Phaſaelis: he gave her a palace alſo at Askalon; all which were valu'd at ſixty  talents; but her palace was ſubjected to the juriſdiction of the ethnarchy. When Ceſar had diſcharg'd all Herod's legacies to his kindred, he gave to his two virgin daughters five hundred thouſand pieces of minted money over and above, and marry'd them to the ſons of Pheroras. But, in the end, upon the diviſion of Herod's patrimony, Ceſar made a generous diſtribution of a thouſand †† talents more, that were bequeathed to himſelf; reſerving only ſome particular things of little value, to keep by him in memory of the deceas'd.

A counterfeit Alexander. The manner of the contrivance. The method and management of the cheat. The impoſtor detected, and condemn'd to the galleys. The firſt projector put to death.

Ant. b. 17. c. 17.

AT this time there ſtarted up a certain young man, by nation a Jew, and educated in Sidon, with the free man of a Roman citizen. This man took upon him to perſonate Alexander, whom Herod put to death; and went to Rome on purpoſe to ſet up the impoſture. He had with him, for countenance and counſel, another Jew, that was perfectly well inform'd in the train and intrigues of Herod's court. This Jew gave his companion his leſſon; which was, that the people employ'd by his father to put himſelf and Ariſtobulus to death, had ſo great a compaſſion for them, that they ſubſtituted two other perſons in their places, and convey'd the brothers out of the way. This paſs'd for current with many Jews in Crete; who furniſh'd the pretender there with plentiful ſupplies. He went from thence to Melos; where he was receiv'd again with ſtill more honour and bounty. Nay, and he carry'd the matter ſo fair too, that he took ſeveral of his friends along with him to Rome. Upon his arrival at Puteoli, the Jews of the place made him magnificent preſents; and Herod's friends treated him all the while as a ſovereign prince. The wonderful likeneſs, in fine, had got him ſuch credit, that as many as had ſeen Alexander would not ſtick to ſwear that this was the man. The ſtory made ſuch a noiſe in the world, that the Jews at Rome came all flocking in to ſee him: nay the very ſtreets and ways were throng'd where he was to paſs. In ſhort, the deluſion had ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed them, that they carry'd him up and down in a chair of ſtate, and ſpar'd for nothing either of coſt or reſpect that might ſort with his pretence.

A counterfeit Alexander.

Now Ceſar calling to mind the lineaments and air of Alexander's face, (whom he remember'd ever ſince he was before him upon Herod's accuſation) he bethought himſelf of ſending one Celadus (who knew him as well as any man) to fetch the young man to him; not but that Ceſar believed him to be a cheat all along; but however, for the humour's ſake, ſomething was to be done in form. Celadus found him out; and upon the firſt ſight of him, concluded him to be a counterfeit; but when he came to conſider the coarſneſs of his skin, ſhape, and manner of addreſs, his ſuſpicion was confirm'd beyond all peradventure. The thing indeed that mov'd Celadus the moſt, was his bold way of out-facing people. Asking about Ariſtobulus; "He was very well, "he ſaid, but liv'd on purpoſe at Cyprus, to "be out of harm's way; for if they kept to-"gether, there would be more danger of miſ-"chief by a ſurprize". When Celadus had kept his countenance thus far, he took him aſide, and told him plainly, this is all a juggle, ſays he; do you but diſcover the author of this contrivance, and Ceſar will give you your own life for your pains. He promiſed him that he would, and ſo follow'd him to Ceſar; where he diſcover'd the Jew that had put him upon it, to get money by it: and in particular, the exact ſums that he had rais'd from the ſeveral cities impos'd upon by the deluſion, which were more than Alexander himſelf could have procur'd, if he had been alive. The impoſture was ſo comically acted, that Ceſar could not but ſmile at it: and yet, however, in the end, he condemn'd the falſe Alexander to a galley, (as a ſervice that his body was made for) and commanded the adviſer to be put to death; but for the fooliſh people of Melos, they had pay'd dear enough for their madneſs, he thought, in the expence; and ſo that charge was their puniſhment.

Ant. b. 17. c. 12.

WHEN Archelaus came to be ſettled in his ethnarchy, he did not forget old grudges, but ſeverely oppreſs'd both Jews and Samarians; and upon an embaſſy from both to Ceſar againſt him, in the ninth year of his government, he was baniſh'd to Vienne, a city of Gaul, and his eſtate confiſcated.

Archelaus baniſh'd for his oppreſſion, and his goods ſeiz'd.

THERE goes a ſtory of a ſtrange dream Archelaus had before his ſummons to attend Ceſar. He dream'd he ſaw nine large full ears of corn, and oxen eating them. Upon this he apply'd himſelf to ſeveral of the magicians and Chaldeans to unriddle this dream: ſome ſaid one thing, ſome another; but Simon, an Eſſene, gave it this interpretation. "Theſe ears of corn, ſays he, are years; by "oxen, is to be underſtood changes, and over-"turning of things; as the earth is overturn'd "with the plough. So many years as there "were ears of corn you are to reign; and after "many ſtrange revolutions, to die." THERE was another memorable dream alſo of the princeſs Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus the king of Cappadocia, and the wife of this Archelaus; whoſe firſt husband was Alexander, the brother of him we are now ſpeaking of, and the ſon of Herod; by whom he was afterwards put to death. This princeſs, fater his death, marry'd Juba the king of Libya; and upon his deceaſe went home again, and liv'd with her father in her widowhood. Archelaus the ethnarch fell ſo deſperately in love with her at firſt ſight, that he preſently put away Mariamne, and took her to his wife. In ſome ſhort time after this ſhe went back into Judea, and had there a viſion of her firſt husband Alexander, appearing to her. "Audacious creature! ſays he, was not one "husband enough for thee after me? but haſt "thou the face now to take a third, and this "under my own roof? And which is yet "worſt of all, my own brother? Theſe are "injuries not to be put up, But this will not "do: for I will have you again in ſpite of "your heart." She told this dream to her friends, and dy'd within two days.

Three ſorts of Jews: Phariſees, Sadducees and Eſſenes. Of the Eſſenes; their temperance, and opinion of marriage; their goods in common; their apparel, charity, and way of living; their ſcruples of conſcience. Men of peace and good faith; and againſt all oaths. The method of entring into the ſociety. Their way of puniſhing offenders. The juſteſt people alive. They have a veneration for antiquity. Strict obſervers of the ſabbath. They are commonly long liv'd; and firm in the contempt of death itſelf. Their opinion of the ſoul. Some of them pretend to the ſpirit of prophecy. Another ſort of Eſſenes. Of the Phariſees. Of the Sadducees. They are ſevere, even to one another; but inhuman to ſtrangers.

Ant. b. 17. c. 12.

THE eſtate of Archelaus being now reduced into a province, Ceſar ſent down Coponius, a Roman knight, with a full commiſſion to govern it. In his days, one * Judas a Galilean ſtirr'd up the people to a revolt; upon a ſuggeſtion, that in owning the Romans for their maſters, and in paying them tribute, they ſerv'd God and man both alike. Now this man was of a ſect by himſelf, and in truth without a fellow. There are among the Jews three ſects of † religion; as Phariſees, Sadducees and Eſſenes; the laſt is the faireſt of the three for the exerciſe of ‡ holineſs and ſeverity.

Three ſorts of Jews; Phariſees, Sadducees and Eſſenes.

THESE Eſſenes are by nation Jews; the moſt united and friendly people one with another under the ſun. They have the ſame averſion to pleaſure that they have to vice, and reckon upon continence, and the command of the paſſions, as a virtue of the firſt rate. They have no great reverence for marriage; but for other people's children, that they take under their care while they are young and tender, they value them as their own fleſh and blood, and train them up accordingly. They are not yet againſt marriage, as enemies to the race and ſucceſſion of mankind; but they have an opinion that the fair ſex is frail and intemperate, and hardly to be kept within the compaſs of fidelity to one ſingle man.

Of the Eſſenes.

Their temperance.

Their opinion of marriage.

As to the matter of wealth, and the goods of this world, they have it all in contempt, and do not ſo much as know what it is to be rich or poor; for it lies all in common, as a condition of the ſociety. By this means, no man ſhall be contemptible for being poor, nor honourable for being rich; but the whole party ſhall live like brethren, being all equal ſharers in one common patrimony.

As for the goods of this world, they have all in common.

THEY will not ſuffer any oil to come upon their bodies; for if ſuch a thing ſhould happen, they are never quiet till they get it out again. They value themſelves upon the plain ſimplicity of their appearance, though never ſo coarſe; provided only that their garments be white and clean.

Their apparel plain and cleanly.

THEY chuſe their ſtewards, for the receipt and management of the revenues, out of the beſt men they have, and leave it to their diſcretion to make a diſtribution of them to every man in proportion, according to his need.

The extent of their charity.

THEY have no one certain place of abode, but diſperſe themſelves up and down into ſeveral cities; where they are ever ready and open to entertain all comers of their own ſect, and as free as if they were at home, though they never ſaw one another in their lives before.

Their way of living.

THEY carry nothing about them when they travel, but arms for their ſecurity upon the highway.

And travelling.

highway. They have ſome body or other in every city to take care of their friends, that they want neither lodging, food, garments, nor other neceſſaries. The dreſs they wear reſembles that of children, when they are under the charge of maſters and governours.

They have a mighty honour for the wiſdom of the ancients.

THEY have a mighty reverence for the works and writings of antiquity; eſpecially in what concerns the good either of ſoul or body; as in the caſe of remedies for diſeaſes; the virtues of plants, metals, ſtones, minerals, and the like.

They neither buy nor ſell one with another.

THEY never change either their garments or their ſhoes, but when the one is torn, or the other worn out. They neither buy nor ſell among themſelves, but help one another with what they want, and what one wants the other ſupplies; not by the way of exchange; but the one is oblig'd to give, and the other at liberty to receive.

The form and method of entring into the ſociety.

WHEN any man has a mind to come into the ſociety, they do not preſently admit him, but keep him out of the pale for one whole Year; admitting all of the ſame claſs to the ſame order of diet; giving every man alſo a pick-ax, a girdle, and a white garment, as aforeſaid. When a man has been long enough among them to give ſome competent proofs of his continence and virtue, they change his courſe of diet, and allow him the benefit of purifying waters to waſh himſelf: but he is not yet admitted to the table in the refectory, till he has ſtood a two years probation for his integrity and good manners; and upon that trial he is taken into the ſociety: that is to ſay, upon this further condition, before he can be eſtabliſh'd a member of the community.

Their ſcruples in matter of conſcience.

THEY are the ſtricteſt people in their piety of all men living. They make a conſcience of ſpeaking one word of common buſineſs before the ſun riſes; but they have certain traditional forms of prayer for that occaſion, imploring particularly from * God, that the ſun may ſhine upon them. After this act of devotion, they are all diſmiſs'd to their ſeveral tasks and employments; and when they have ſtudy'd, and wrought hard till the fifth † hour of the day, they meet again with linen cloths thrown over them, and ſo waſh themſelves all over with cold water. Upon this purification, they retire to their cells; where no mortal of any other profeſſion is ever allow'd ſo much as to breathe among them. From thence they enter into a refectory, which they account little leſs holy than the temple itſelf. When they have ſtay'd there a while without a word ſpeaking, the baker brings up every man his loaf, and the cook every man his plate, or meſs of ſoup, and ſets it before him. The prieſt then bleſſes the meat, and none there dares ſo much as touch it till the grace be over. And ſo after dinner, another grace again; for they never fail to give God thanks both before and after meat, as the author of the bleſſing. This duty being over, they quit their habits, as in ſome meaſure ſacred; and ſo to their ordinary work again till evening. They go next to ſupper as before; where they ſit together, gueſts and all, if they have any, at the ſame table.

With theſe further conditions.

HE is firſt to bind himſelf by ſolemn execrations and profeſſions, to love and worſhip God; to do juſtice toward men; to wrong no creature willingly; no, nor to do it though commanded; to declare himſelf an enemy to all wicked men; to join with all the lovers of juſtice, and equity; to keep faith with all men; but with princes eſpecially, as they are of God's appointment and his miniſters. He is likewiſe to declare, that, if ever he comes to be advanc'd to any ſtation above his companions, he will never abuſe that power to the injury of his ſubjects; nor diſtinguiſh himſelf from his inferiors by any ornament of dreſs or apparel: but that he will love and embrace the truth and bring falſe ſpeakers to juſtice. He binds himſelf likewiſe to keep his hands clear from theft and fraudulent dealing, and his ſoul as untainted with the deſire of unjuſt gain: that he will not conceal from his fellow-profeſſors any of the myſteries of his religion; nor communicate any of them to the prophane, though it ſhould be to ſave his life. And then for the matter of his doctrine, that he ſhall deliver nothing but what he hath receiv'd; that he will endeavour to preſerve the doctrine itſelf that he profeſſes, the books that are written of it, and the names of thoſe from whom he had it.

THERE'S no manner of noiſe or diſorder in thoſe houſes. They ſpeak by turns; and this way of gravity and ſilence gives ſtrangers a great veneration for them. This is the effect of a conſtant courſe of ſobriety, in their moderation of eating and drinking only to ſuffice nature.

THESE proteſtations are made uſe of as a teſt for new comers, and as a ſecurity to engage them ſtrictly to their duty.

The reverence they have for their ſuperiors.

THEY are not allow'd to do any thing without the advice of their ſuperiors; ſaving only in offices of aſſiſtance and compaſſion; and there they are left at liberty; for every man is free to help the virtuous, and to relieve good men in want. 'Tis true, they are not allow'd to give any thing to their relations without leave of their governours.

Their way of puniſhing offenders.

UPON the taking of any man in a notorious wickedneſs, he is excluded the congregation; and whoever incurs that ſentence, comes probably to a miſerable end. For he that is ty'd up by theſe rites and ſacraments, is not allowed ſo much as to receive a bit of bread from the hand of a ſtranger, though his life itſelf were in hazard; ſo that men are driven to graze like beaſts, till the fleſh rots from the bone. In this diſtreſs, the ſociety hath ſometime had the charity and compaſſion to receive ſome of them again, when they were at the very point of death; computing that the puniſhment they ſuffer'd might in ſome degree attone for the offence.

Men of temper, peace and good faith.
The Eſſenes are againſt all oaths.

THEY are great maſters of their paſſions, men of good faith, lovers of peace, and their word at leaſt is as ſacred as their oath: for they do effectually look upon the taking of an oath worſe than perjury, and account of him for a liar, and a man of no credit, who cannot be believ'd without bringing in God for a witneſs.

IN

The Eſſenes the ſtricteſt people alive

IN the adminiſtration of juſtice, they are the moſt regular and exact people alive. They determine nothing but what is carried by a hundred voices at leaſt; and when the judgment is once paſt, there's no recalling it.

The eſteem they have for their legiſlators.

NEXT to the ſupreme authority of God himſelf, they reckon that of their legiſlators; making it death to ſpeak ill of them, or to blaſpheme them. They aſcribe great honour to their elders, and to the majority of the people; and think it very reaſonable to obey the one, and to hearken to the other. When there are ten together in council, no particular perſon is to ſpeak, if the other nine be againſt it.

Their debates in council.

THEY make it a matter of immorality to ſpit toward the middle of the company, or upon the right-hand.

The ſtricteſt ſort of Jews in the obſervation of the ſabbath.

THEY are the ſtricteſt obſervers of the ſabbath of all ſorts of Jews; for they do not only make ready their ſabbath-day's meal the night before, to avoid kindling a fire on that day; but they dare not ſo much as remove a pot or a diſh from one place to another, or eaſe themſelves of the neceſſities of nature.

UPON other days, when they are preſs'd at any time to ſtep aſide, they take a pick-ax (as I ſaid before) and open the ground a matter of a foot deep; when they have diſcharg'd themſelves, they fill up the hole again, out of a ſuperſtitious ſcruple not to pollute the * beams of the ſun with ſuch an object. And though there be no more in it than a natural purgation, it is yet follow'd with the ſolemnity of a formal purification.

THE people that make profeſſion of this manner of life, are divided into four ſorts, according to their reſpective obligations; and the younger are reputed ſo much inferior to their elders, that if they do but touch one another, they are fain to purify, as if it were upon the contact of a ſtranger. They live to a great age; many of them to an hundred years and upwards; which I aſcribe in a great meaſure to the ſimplicity of their way of feeding, and to the temperance of their manners.

They live temperately and long

Are ſtand firm to the contempt of torments, and death itſelf.

THEY are firm and hardy againſt all dangers too, and reſolute to the contempt of torments; inſomuch that they account an honourable death much more deſirable than life itſelf. We need go no further for the proof of this aſſertion, than to the war betwixt the Jews and the Romans. And upon ſeveral occaſions, what torments did the Jews endure! as burning, breaking of bones, and all manner of pains, rather than let fall one irreverent word of their legiſlator, or but touch one morſel of a forbidden meat. And all this, not only without ſupplications and tears, or any abjection of mind, but with a chearfulneſs of countenance in the very anguiſh of their pains; defying and triumphing over their very tormentors, and delivering up their ſouls with a ſerene conſtancy of courage, in the aſſurance of exchanging a preſent life for a better to come.

The Eſſenes opinion of the ſoul

THEY firmly believe the mortality of the body; and that the ſoul, being of the ſame ſubſtance with the ſubtileſt air, is incorruptible and immortal; and, by a kind of natural inclination, or attraction, ſhut up in the fleſh as in a priſon. But when it ſhall be freed from theſe corporeal bonds, as out of a long ſlavery, it ſhall chearfully mount up to the region of endleſs bliſs. This opinion ſuits well enough with ſome conceits of the Greeks, who fancy a place beyond the ocean, where there's neither rain nor ſnow, nor raging heats, but only gentle refreſhing gales; and this do they make to be the ſeat of the bleſſed ſouls. As for the wicked ſouls on the other hand, they ſtand condemn'd to impetuous tempeſts, killing froſts, and everlaſting pains and groans, world without end.

THIS is much after the Grecian ſtory of the Fortunate Iſlands; which are the places ſet apart for the entertainment of thoſe glorious ſpirits they call heroes, and demi-gods: and then they have their hell too, in the deſcription of an infernal pit, with plagues and puniſhments for ſuch as Siſyphus, Tantalus, Ixion, Tityus, and the like; computing all this while the ſoul to be immortal, from the natural diſpoſition it hath to the love of virtue, and to the deteſtation of vice; for good men are made better even in this world by the hope of better things yet to come in another; beſide the check that it puts to impiety and lewdneſs, when men ſhall come to conſider, that though they may eſcape the eye and the ſtroke of human juſtice in this world, divine vengeance will yet find them out in that to come, and puniſh them with pains everlaſting. This is the Eſſenes philoſophy upon the ſubject of the ſoul; and we find very few, when they have once imbib'd this doctrine, that ever depart from it.

Some of them pretend to the ſpirit of prophecy.

THERE are among the Eſſenes alſo, that take upon themſelves to foretel things to come; building their confidence upon antient prophecies and holy writ; and not without preparatory ſanctifications to fit them for the work. But be it as it will, they ſeldom fail in their predictions.

Another ſort of Eſſenes.

THERE is beſides another ſort of Eſſenes, agreeing with the former in the ſame meats, manners and laws; but they are yet divided upon the point of wedlock; for they look upon thoſe that are directly againſt marriage, as the profeſt enemies of mankind: that is to ſay, in cutting off the ſucceſſion, and ſo extinguiſhing the race. Now if all people were of the ſame mind, the world would quickly be at an end. But they proceed with this caution yet, that the woman muſt be ſubjected to a three years probation, and if ſhe ſhall be found in a condition of health fit for child-bearing, ſhe ſhall be reputed after that trial qualify'd for marriage. The women are likewiſe to be cover'd when they waſh, as the men are; and this is enough ſaid of the Eſſenes.

Of the Phariſees.

TO come now to the two former ſects, the Phariſees, and the Sadducees: the Phariſees are, in the firſt place, the great doctors of the law, and the beſt read men in the Jewiſh rites and ceremonies. It is, in effect, the firſt article of their creed, that, "Fate and God do "all"; and yet that whether we do well or ill, it is much in our own power which of the two; only that deſtiny interpoſes ſometimes in this or that particular. They believe the ſoul to be immortal, and they believe likewiſe a tranſmigration of the ſouls of good men into other bodies; but at the ſame time, that the ſouls of the wicked are tranſmitted into a ſtate of everlaſting woe.

* See Sam. Petitus's Var. Lect. l. 2. c. 7.

THE

Of the Sadducees.

THE Sadducees, on the other hand, abſolutely deny fate. "God can do no ill, they "ſay, himſelf; and he leaves men at liberty "to do what they liſt". They have good and evil before them, and they take their choice. But for reward or puniſhment in another world, they underſtand nothing of it. The Phariſees, in fine, are ſociable, and live in a good intelligence one with another; but the Sadducees are harſh, and ill-natur'd even among themſelves, but directly inhuman and intolerable to ſtrangers. This is all I have to ſay of the philoſophy of the Jews, and I ſhall now return to the ſubject of my hiſtory.

They are harſh even among themſelves, but inhuman to ſtrangers.

Auguſtus dies and Tiberius ſucceeds him.

AUGUSTUS being now dead alſo, after a reign of ſeven and fifty years, ſix months, and two days, Tiberius the ſon of Livia ſucceeded to the Roman empire. Philip the tetrarch built a city in Paneas, which he call'd Ceſarea: it was erected at the very head of the river Jordan: and he rais'd another alſo in Gaulanitis; which he call'd Julias. Tiberias in Galilee, was built by Herod; and ſo was Julias alſo in † Perea.

Pilate made governor of Judea.

PILATE was now governor of Judea; and being ſent thither by Tiberius to take charge of his command, he ſecretly convey'd late one night into the city certain enſigns of Ceſar's, with his image upon them. This put the Jews into ſo outrageous a tumult the next day, that they were all under the greateſt concern imaginable, to think what would become of their liberties and religion, if their laws were trampled upon, and prophan'd at this rate; for the bringing of images into the city was a thing abſolutely forbidden. This diſorder in the town was quickly ſeconded and inflam'd by a vaſt confluence of people from all parts of the province. The Jews, upon this, went in a great body to Ceſarea, to move Pilate for relief; and there they earneſtly beſought him to be tender of their laws, and to order the removing of the images out of the city. Pilate gave no heed at all to what they ſaid; ſo that the Jews threw themſelves flat upon the ground round about his houſe, and in that poſture they continued five days and five nights, without ſo much as moving from the place.

Ceſar's image and enſigns convey'd ſecretly into Jeruſalem.

The people broke out into an uproar upon it.

They petition Pilate at Ceſarea for relief.

Pilate ſummons the Jews under colour of a hearing, but in truth with deſign to cut them all off that ſhould oppoſe the receiving of the image or colours.

ON the ſixth day, Pilate mounted the tribunal which was in the great ‡ court, and gave the Jews a ſummons, as if it had been only to receive his anſwer; when all on a ſudden, the deſign being ſo laid, and a ſignal given, the Jews were immediately ſurrounded with armed troops, three deep, quite round about them. This was ſuch a ſurprize, that the Jews might well be amaz'd at it; and in that inſtant Pilate declar'd that they ſhould die every man of them, unleſs they receiv'd the colours into the city; and upon that word he order'd the ſoldiers to draw their ſwords. The Jews in this confuſion caſt themſelves proſtrate, one and all before them, ſtretch'd out their necks, and offer'd themſelves to the execution; crying out with one voice, that they would rather die than ſee the prophanation of their laws. Pilate was ſo aſtoniſh'd at the daring zeal of theſe people in the defenſe of their religion, that he gave order preſently to have the ſtatues remov'd out of the city.

The generous behaviour of the Jews, prevail'd upon Pilate to remove the ſtatues.

There followed another broil about a tax upon the Corban.

THIS broil was follow'd with another. The Jews have a holy treaſure which they call Corban; and Pilate laid a tax upon it toward the charge of aqueducts, for the bringing in of water at the diſtance of three hundred  furlongs. The common people were ſo tranſported at this impoſition, that they came in great numbers with loud complaints to Pilate about it, as he was upon the very tribunal. But he had the foreſight to provide againſt a tumult, by intermixing ſoldiers in diſguiſe with the multitude, to be in readineſs to fall on, when ever Pilate ſhould give the word: but with this caution however, in caſe of any uproar, to make uſe only of cudgels without drawing their ſwords. The people grew clamorous and unquiet; and upon that provocation, Pilate gave the ſoldiers the ſignal; who did execution according to their orders. There was a great number of Jews deſtroy'd; ſome were kill'd by blows, ſome were crowded and trampled to death, others periſhed upon the purſuit. The rabble took this rebuke for a warning, and gave over muttering; ſo that this ſeverity put an end to the riot.

The rabble affront Pilate upon the very tribunal.

But by mingling ſoldiers with the multitude, the miſchief of the invention was utterly defeated.

Agrippa complains of Herod to Tiberius, who takes no notice of it.

AGRIPPA the ſon of Ariſtobulus, who was put to death by his father Herod, went ſome time after to Tiberius with a complaint againſt Herod the tetrarch. Tiberius never minded the accuſation; ſo that Agrippa was eaſy and quiet at Rome, in the condition of a private man; and made his court the mean while to perſons of the firſt quality, and in particular to Caius the ſon of Germanicus. Agrippa was treating him one day with the compliment of a collation; and when he was well warm in his cups, and in the height of mirth and jollitry, he ſtretched out his arm with an exclamation: "Ah, ſays he, how glad ſhould "I be to ſee Caius maſter of the world in-"ſtead of Tiberius." This was carry'd to Tiberius by one of the company; for which Caius Cesar succeeds Tiberius in the empire.

CAIUS CESAR, upon coming afterward to the empire, enlarged Agrippa, and gave him Philip's tetrarchy, who was now dead, and the title of king too. This advancement of Agrippa went to the envious heart of Herod the tetrarch; and his wife Herodias was not wanting neither to the inflaming of his ambitious mind into the hope of the kingdom; and at this rate she twitted him. "You were "lazy, says she, and might have had it for "the asking, if you had but thought it worth "a journey to Cesar. If Caius was prevail'd "upon to make Agrippa a king, of a private "man, he would never have stuck certainly "at making Herod a king, of a tetrarch." Herod was now prevail'd upon by his wife to go to Caius, and Agrippa his accuser follow'd him incontinently. But so far was the emperor from gratifying his ambition, that on the contrary, he check'd him severely for his avarice, and gave away his tetrarchy to Agrippa. Herod, upon this disappointment, fled with his wife into Spain, where he died in exile.

He releases Agrippa; gives him a tetrarchy, and the name of a king too.

This advancement went to the envious hearts of Herod and his wife.

The emperor with a severe check, gives away his tetrarchy to Agrippa.

The Jews petition Petronius at Ptolemais for relief; who summons them to Tiberias, and there reasons the case with them. Petronius relents; and dissolves the court once again, without coming to any resolution. He promises his mediation to Cesar; dismisses the multitude, and draws off to Antioch. Petronius writes to Cesar what had pass'd, who, in return, orders the putting of Petronius to death; but the death of Caius prevented the execution.*

Ant. b. 18. c. 13.

CAIUS CESAR had the blasphemous vanity, in this tide of his fortune, to set up for a god, and to assume to himself both the name and the worship. He struck off the heads of such numbers of the Roman nobility, that the very order was in a manner suppress'd, and his country disabled, by those frequent executions. And his impious cruelty did not stop here neither, but he carried it into Judea too; sending Petronius with a commission, and a charge to set up his statues in the temple, and to put every soul to the sword, that should dare to refuse them: and for the rest of the Jews to make them all slaves. But God in his mercy order'd matters otherwise. Petronius marched away in all haste from Antioch toward Judea, with three legions and a considerable number of auxiliaries out of Syria. The report of this expedition was such a surprize to the Jews, that the greater part of them could not believe it; and those that did, were not in any condition to provide for a defence; but the army being now advanc'd as far as Ptolemais, they were all seiz'd with a mortal terror.

Caius Cesar sets up for a god.

His bloody and merciless executions.

Petronius order'd to set up Cesar's statues in the temple.

Death without mercy to all refusers; and the rest to be all made slaves.

Petronius marches with a great army from Antioch towards Judea.

THIS Ptolemais is a city upon the coast of Galilee, situated on a large plain, and surrounded with mountains to the eastward at the distance of about sixty * furlongs, but belonging to Galilee; to the southward with Carmel, at about † a hundred and twenty furlongs to the north, with a very high mountain, call'd the Tyrian Ladder, at an ‡ hundred. About two furlongs  from the town itself, there was a little river called Belus, and not far from it stands Memnon's sepulchre, bordering upon a prospect of near an hundred †† cubits over, which has somewhat in it that is very remarkable. There is the appearance of a round valley that yields a kind of a glassy sand: the ships meet and carry it off, and as fast as they fetch it away, the winds from the top of the mountains fill up the place again. It is the nature of that place to turn any thing to glass that comes into it. But the most wonderful thing of all to me is this; that after those sands are vitrify'd, 'tis but casting any part of them upon the skirts of that place, and it turns to common sand again; such is the nature and condition of the soil.

The soldiers seiz'd at Ptolemais with a panick terror.

The situation and description of Ptolemais.

Memnon's sepulchre.

IN this consternation, the Jews with their wives and children went to Petronius, at Ptolemais, and there besought him as well for their country's sake, as their own, not to press the violation of their laws to the ruin of so many miserable people. The petitioners were so many and so earnest, and their case so deplorable, that Petronius was prevail'd upon to leave his army and the emperor's statues at Ptolemais; and so advancing toward Galilee, he summon'd the Jews of all sorts to attend him at Tiberias. Being come to Tiberias, he enter'd upon a discourse to them of the strength and power of the Roman army, and the menaces of Cesar; adding withal, that the Jews request was in truth but a tacit affront; for why should they take upon them to dispute those orders that all the subjects of the Roman empire beside themselves submitted to; that is to say; the placing of the emperor's statues in the temples among their other gods. This expostulation he told them, was within a little of a revolt; and next after Cesar, he himself was concern'd in the matter.

The Jews in a fright, petition Petronius at Ptolemais for relief.

Petronius relents.

He summons all the Jews to Tiberias.

He expostulates the matter with the Jews.

THEY had nothing to say for themselves, but that the laws and customs of their country would not allow them to set up any images whatsoever, either of God or man; or in any place whatsoever, either sacred or profane. "Well, says Petronius, and am not I to keep my master's laws as well as you are to keep yours? Or in case I should transgress them in your favour, ſhould not I deſerve to be puniſh'd; neither is it Petronius that oppoſes you, but Ceſar: for I am as much under command as you are yourſelves." The whole multitude upon this, broke out into an unanimous outcry, that if they were ſure to die for it, they would never yield to the violation of their laws.

WHEN the noiſe and confuſion was a little abated; "What! ſays Petronius, you are reſolved then to take up arms againſt Ceſar? No, ſaid they, there's not a day goes over our heads, but we offer up vows and ſacrifices to God for his proſperity, and for the whole people of Rome; but if he intends to impoſe images upon us in the temple, he may as well maſſacre the whole people of the Jews; and in that caſe we ourſelves, with our wives and children, are all ready to ſacrifice our lives, and die martyrs for our laws and religion." Petronius was ſo divided upon this, betwixt admiration and pity, to ſee the invincible force of ſuch a zeal for religion, and ſuch a multitude of people united in the ſame reſolution, that the meeting broke up once again without any thing done.

Petronius ſo charm'd with the bravery of the Jews, that he diſſolved the meeting without coming to any reſolution.

THE next day, and ſeveral days after, Petronius went in private from man to man, to ſome of the moſt eminent perſons among them, and ſpoke in publick alſo at the ſame time to the common people; one while adviſing them as a friend, and then minding them of the inſuperable courage of the Romans, and the danger of incurring Ceſar's diſpleaſure; "beſide, ſays he, that I am under an abſolute neceſſity of obeying my orders." But when he ſaw that nothing of this would work upon them, and that they had almoſt loſt their ſeed-time to attend this controverſy, having been already near fifty days about it, Petronius told them at laſt, that for their ſakes he was reſolv'd to expoſe himſelf to a deſperate hazard. "I will either ſatisfy Ceſar, ſays he, and ſave you and myſelf both at once; or, if nothing will ſerve him but extremities, I will lay down my life for you." And ſo he diſmiſs'd the multitude with a thouſand vows and prayers for him, and drew off his army from Ptolemais to Antioch. From Antioch he ſent immediately to Ceſar, with an account of the manner of his entring into Judea: how the whole nation were join'd in one common petition; which he was afraid could not be oppos'd or deny'd, without the hazard of the whole province. "They deſir'd nothing more, he ſaid, than the maintenance of their laws againſt all innovations." The anſwer that Caius gave to this letter, was an order for the putting of Petronius to death for not executing his command. But it ſo fell out, that the bearers of this order were kept three whole months upon the way by contrary winds and foul weather; and in the mean time arriv'd the tidings of the death of Caius by a quicker paſſage, and ſeven and twenty days before the other.

Petronius reaſons the matter with the petitioners.

And promiſes them his mediation to Ceſar.

Agrippa reign'd three years, and dy'd at Ceſarea. The family of Alexander and Ariſtobulus.*

CAIUS being cut off by treachery, when he had reign'd three years and ſix months, Claudius was advanced to the government by the army which was then at Rome. The conſuls, Sentius Saturninus and Pomponius Secundus, appointed, according to the reſolution of the ſenate, three companies for the guard of the city, and ſo they met in the capitol; where they determin'd to oppoſe Claudius for the barbarities of Caius, with a deſign to bring the government again to an ariſtocracy, as it was of old, when the worthieſt men were taken into the adminiſtration. It ſo happen'd that Agrippa came while this paſt, and was invited both into the council by the ſenate, and into the army of Claudius, as a conſiderable addition to what party ſoever he eſpous'd. Now Agrippa, finding Claudius to be as good as emperor already, he went over into his intereſt without much difficulty, and was immediately employ'd upon an embaſſy to the ſenate; giving them to underſtand, that the army's ſetting of him up for emperor, was an abſolute force upon him, and in truth, purely their act, whether he would or no: but that now, ſince the thing was done, he could not recede, either with honour or ſafety; for it would look like an undervaluing of the good will of the ſoldiers, to decline the dignity; as it would provoke them to a revenge, if he ſhould ſeem inſenſible of the obligation; telling them over and above, that now he was choſen, there was no declining it; for the envy of the choice would ſtick by him ſtill, even if he ſhould lay down the ſovereignty. But however, ſince the firſt point was over, and that he was in poſſeſſion of the government, he had determin'd within himſelf to attend and execute the office; not as a tyrant to domineer at will and pleaſure, but as a prince of tenderneſs for his people. He ſhould content himſelf with the honour of the name of emperor, and in caſes of ſtate to hearken to the advice of the ſenate; "for, ſays he, if Claudius were not modeſt and temperate in his own nature, the exemplary fate of Caius were enough to make him ſo."

Agrippa carry'd this anſwer to Claudius, who preſently ſent him back again to tell the ſenate, "That he was not a man to betray his friends who promoted him to the empire." He was very much troubled at the thought of having a quarrel with the ſenate: but if it muſt come to a deciſion by arms, Claudius deſir'd them only to appoint ſome ſpot of ground without the city for the place of battle; for it would be highly unreaſonable and unjuſt to have Rome itſelf laid in blood and and aſhes, only to gratify the humour of a few hot-headed people. This meſſage Agrippa had in charge from Claudius, and he deliver'd it accordingly to the ſenate.

A ſoldier ſtands up for the honour of Claudius.

WHILE things were in this diſpoſition and poſture, one of the ſoldiers who was there preſent ſtood forth, and drawing his ſword; "My fellow companions, ſays he, what's the "matter here that we are now at daggers-"drawing with the beſt friends we have, and "upon the very brink of a civil war, only for "adhering to Claudius? An emperor without "a blemiſh, and a prince that we ſhould ra-"ther treat with duty and reſpect, as our "protector, than with arms as an enemy". With theſe words he march'd off through the middle of the court, and the reſt of the ſoldiers follow'd him. This deſertion put the nobles into ſuch a fright for fear of the conſequences, that when they found oppoſition would not only be fruitleſs and inſignificant, but dangerous, they very fairly did as the military men had done before them, they went and declar'd for Claudius. In this interim, divers of the officious pick-thank ſoldiery lay upon the watch, with their ſwords drawn, under the walls, to diſpatch them at their coming out; and they had been kill'd every man of them, before Ceſar could have known any thing of the matter, if Agrippa had not given timely notice to prevent it, telling Ceſar plainly, that if he did not put a check to the licence of the army; eſpecially toward the nobility, there would be nothing but cutting of throats in a ſhort time, and inſtead of making him the maſter of a glorious empire, they would leave him only the prince of a deſart.

The ſoldiers deſert.

And the ſenate follows their example

The nobility had been all deſtroy'd, if Agrippa had not prevented it.

CLAUDIUS took Agrippa's advice, and put the ſoldiers in better order, treated the ſenators in his camp with all honour and kindneſs; and then went out with them according to cuſtom, to offer vows and ſacrifices for the proſperity of the empire. He beſtow'd upon Agrippa, not only his father's kingdom entire, but thoſe places over and above that Auguſtus had confer'd upon Herod, as Trachonitis and Auranitis; with a command alſo that was call'd the kingdom of Lyſanias, appointing the particulars of this grant to be notify'd by proclamation to the people; and giving it likewiſe in charge to the ſenate, to have it cut in tables of braſs, and ſet up in the capitol. He gave the kingdom of Chalcis alſo to Herod, the brother of Agrippa, who was become his ſon-in-law too, by marrying Berenice his daughter.

Claudius makes himſelf popular. He pays his vows and ſacrifices in form. His royal bounties to Agrippa and Herod.

AGRIPPA was now grown great in wealth and power, beyond all thought or imagination; and the treaſure that he got he did not ſquander away neither, upon vanities or trifles. His firſt enterprize was the walling in of Jeruſalem; and if it had been carry'd on anſwerable to the beginning, the Romans would never have been able to have taken it. But after a three years reign as king, he died at Ceſarea, and left the work unfiniſhed, having govern'd three years before in the quality of tetrarch. He left three daughters that he had by Cypris, Berenice, Mariamne and Druſilla, and one ſon, whoſe name was Agrippa. He was very young when his father dy'd; ſo that Claudius reduc'd the kingdom into a province, and made * Cuſpius Fadus governor; after whom Tiberius Alexander, who making no alteration in the laws and cuſtoms of the country, kept the people in peace. A little after this died Herod, who govern'd in Chalcis, and left by Berenice, the daughter of his brother, two ſons; Berenicianus and Hyrcanus; and by Mariamne his former wife, Ariſtobulus. There was another brother Ariſtobulus alſo that dy'd a private man, and left a daughter whoſe name was Jotapa. Theſe, as we have ſaid before, were the children of Ariſtobulus the ſon of Herod. But Alexander and Ariſtobulus were the ſons of Herod by Mariamne, whom the father himſelf put to death. The children of Alexander govern'd afterward in the Greater Armenia.

AFTER the death of Herod who govern'd in Chalcis, Claudius introduc'd Agrippa, the ſon of Agrippa, into his uncle's kingdom; and Cumanus ſucceeded Tiberius Alexander in the kingdom of Judea. During the time of his adminiſtration, the Jews fell into new and grievous troubles. The people being gathered together at Jeruſalem in vaſt numbers to celebrate the feaſt of unleavened bread, and a band of ſoldiers ſtanding at the gate of the temple (as it was cuſtomary upon theſe meetings) for fear of tumults. There was one ſoldier among the reſt that turned up his back-ſide naked in the face of the congregation, and made a beaſtly noiſe with it, anſwerable to the brutality of the action. This put the whole multitude into ſuch a rage, that they preſs'd in throngs up to Cumanus for juſtice upon the ſoldier for that affront; and ſome hot mutinous young men, among the reſt, made a direct brawl and quarrel of it; falling on with hard words and ſtones, and ſtriking the ſoldiers. Cumanus, for fear of further miſchief by a popular uproar, ſent an enforcement of freſh men to ſupport the former. This put the Jews in ſuch a fright, that they ſhifted for themſelves to get out of the temple as ſoon as they could; but the paſſages were ſo crowded and wedg'd up, that upwards of ten thouſand of them were trod and ſqueez'd to death in the preſs. This encounter made it a diſmal feſtival to the whole nation: there was nothing but tears and wringing of hands in every houſe; and not a family but had a ſhare in the mourning.

Another tumult occaſion'd by a robbery.

THIS calamity was ſcarce over, but it was immediately ſucceeded by another. One Stephen, a domeſtick of Ceſar's, was travelling upon the highway, with ſome houſhold-ſtuff of his maſter's. He was ſet upon near Bethoron, and robb'd, by a band of thieves. Cumanus ſent a party to take up the people in the adjacent villages, and bring them to him bound; making them anſwerable for not taking the highway-men. While they were upon this enquiry, a common ſoldier, happening in the ſearch to lay his hands upon the books of Moſes, tore them to pieces, and threw them into the fire. This brought the Jews together in multitudes, as if their whole country had been in a flame. They all met in the ſame inſtant, as if they had been mov'd by a machine; and then in the heat of a ſuperſtitious zeal, they repair'd immediately to Cumanus at Ceſarea: where they preſs'd him with violent importunities, not to let that wretch eſcape unpuniſh'd, that had put ſo audacious an affront upon God and his law. Cumanus found there was no quieting theſe people without ſome ſort of ſatisfaction, ſo that he commanded the ſoldier to be brought out, and put to death in the ſight of the multitude: and that put an end to the tumult.

A ſoldier tears the books of Moſes to pieces, and throws them in the fire.

Cumanus orders the offender to be put to death.

A quarrel betwixt the Jews of Galilee, and thoſe of Samaria.

THERE happen'd at the ſame time an unfortunate difference between the Jews of Galilee and thoſe of Samaria. There was a certain Jew of Galilee, paſſing thro' a village call'd * Geman, in the great plain of Samaria, that was there kill'd, as he was going up to Jeruſalem to worſhip at a ſolemn feſtival. The people of Galilee preſently drew out a body to revenge themſelves of the Samaritans by arms: the better ſort of them applying themſelves to Cumanus, and adviſing him by all means, before it went too far, to go over to Galilee; and upon a ſtrict enquiry made into the matter, to ſee juſtice done upon the murderers. Cumanus, it ſeems, had ſomewhat elſe to do, and ſo diſmiſs'd the petitioners without entring into the cauſe. The ſtory of this outrage coming ſoon after to Jeruſalem, put the whole multitude into ſuch a flame, that they left the ſolemn buſineſs of the day; and in a confuſion, without either officer or order, reſolv'd to fall upon Samaria, in ſpite of all their officers could do to reſtrain them. The heads, both of the robbery and the tumults, were Eleazar the ſon of Dineus, and Alexander; who breaking into the borders of Acrabatena, burn'd all before them, and put man, woman, and child to the ſword.

The occaſion and matter of it.

The ring-leaders of theſe outrages, and their mercileſs cruelties.

Cumanus marches to their relief, and puts Eleazar to the rout.

CUMANUS, upon the news of this ravage, came with a Sebaſtene party of horſe to the relief of the country; took a great many of Eleazar's followers, and cut off many more. As to the remainder of this rabble, that made ſuch havock in Samaria, the great officers, and the leading men of Jeruſalem, went out in ſackcloth and aſhes after them; begging of them, and uſing all arts and arguments to make them quit their deſign. "Do not deſtroy Jeruſalem, (they cry'd) to be reveng'd of Samaria. Have pity upon your country, your temple, your city, your wives; which are in truth all at ſtake: and do not ſacrifice all that is dear to you in this world, to be reveng'd of one poor Galilean." The reaſons prevail'd upon the Jews to deſiſt from their enterprize, and be quiet.

The rabble are at laſt reaſon'd into their wits again.

THERE was about that time moſt notorious robbing: as peace breeds villany. The countries were all over-run with freebooters; and upon the whole matter, it was but the greater thieves robbing the leſs. Numidius Quadratus being then governor of Syria, ſeveral of the heads of the Samaritans addreſs'd to him at Tyre, with a heavy complaint againſt the robbers that infeſted their country. There were divers of the Jewiſh nobility then preſent, and there was Jonathan alſo, the ſon of Ananus the high-prieſt. Now this Jonathan baffled all objections, with turning the blame upon the Samaritans, as the firſt authors of the tumult, in the death of the Galilean. He charg'd the conſequences alſo upon Cumanus, for want of doing juſtice in time upon the offender.

The countries are infeſted with robbers.

The Samaritans complain of them to Quadratus the governor of Syria.

Jonathan charges the riſe of the tumult upon the death of the Galilean, and the conſequences upon Cumanus, for not doing juſtice upon the murderer.

QUADRATUS, when he had heard the cauſe, put off the further conſideration of it till he came into Judea, where he might have a more particular information. He went after that to Ceſarea, and there cauſed all thoſe that Cumanus had taken alive, to be crucify'd. Thence to Lidda, where he heard the Samaritans cauſe once over again, and cut off the heads of eighteen principal men of the Jews, that he certainly knew were dipp'd in the tumults. As to the two high-prieſts, Jonathan and Ananias, with Ananus the ſon of Ananias, and ſome other Jews of the firſt quality, he ſent them all to Ceſar; beſide ſome noble Samaritans alſo. He order'd Cumanus and Celer the tribune away to Rome, to anſwer for themſelves to Claudius. Things being thus ſettled, he went forward from Lydda to Jeruſalem; where finding the people in the middle of their feſtival of unleavened bread, all in peace, he went back for Antioch.

Quadratus goes his way to Ceſarea; thence to Lydda, and ſo to Jeruſalem, to be further inform'd.

WHEN Ceſar had heard at Rome what Cumanus and the Samaritans had to ſay for themſelves, (Agrippa being there too, a zealous advocate for the Jews: and Cumanus had great friends there alſo upon his own account) he gave ſentence againſt the Samaritans; condemning three of the beſt of them to be beheaded, Cumanus to be baniſh'd, Celer the tribune to be ſent bound to Jeruſalem, and deliver'd to the Jews to ſee the ſentence executed, his body to be drawn thro' the city, and his head to be ſtruck off. He made Felix, the brother of Palias, governor of Judea, Samaria, Galilee and Perea. He prefer'd Agrippa from the kingdom of Chalcis to a greater command. He gave him alſo the province that had been † Philip's; which was Trachonitis, Batanea, and Gaulanitis: ſuperadding to all theſe, the kingdom of Lyſanias, and the tetrarchy that had been Varus's.

Ceſar gives Cumanus and the Samaritans a hearing at Rome.

He paſſes judgment againſt them, and orders the execution of the ſentence.

Nero the worſt, and the weakeſt of princes.

No man ever made a worſe uſe perhaps of the advantages of a great power and fortune, than Nero did; witneſs the waſhing of his hands in the blood of his brother, his wife, and his mother; and then the proſecution of that inhuman cruelty toward his neareſt relations; the folly and madneſs of degrading himſelf by turning player, and ſubjecting the imperial dignity to the buffooneries of the ſtage. But theſe ſtories are ſo generally known already, and ſo little to my purpoſe, that I ſhall rather paſs them over in ſilence, and ſo return to my buſineſs.

Ant. b. 20. c. 11, 12, 13. Nero's commiſſions and bounties.

TO come now to that part of Nero's hiſtory that concerns the Jews. He gave Ariſtobulus the ſon of Herod the government of the Leſs Armenia, and annexed four cities more to the territory of Agrippa; that is to ſay, Abila, and Julias in Perea; and in Galilee, Tarichee and Tiberias, with their dependences. The remainder of Judea he gave to Felix; who no ſooner had his commiſſion, but he made war upon the robbers; took Eleazar their captain, with ſeveral others, and ſent them all bound to Rome; after they had harraſs'd the country at pleaſure for twenty years together. In fine, what with the thieves that were kept priſoners, or put to death, and the country people that join'd with them, the number of the kill'd and taken was almoſt incredible.

Felix makes war upon the robbers, defeats them, and takes their captain priſoner.

A new ſort of cut-throats call'd Sicarii. Their way of conduct and execution.

So ſoon as the land was well clear'd of theſe ruffians, there ſtarted up another ſort of cut-throats, under the name of Sicarii, from Sica, the weapon they us'd. Now theſe people made no difficulty of doing their work even at noon-day, in the very ſtreets of Jeruſalem, and in the face of the ſun, eſpecially upon great days, when the town was crouded with people. Their way was, to carry ſhort daggers under their coats; and mixing with the multitude, privily to ſtab their enemies; and then as any man fell, none ſo forward as they themſelves to complain of the villany. This practice went on a good while, not only without diſcovery, but the actors of it were not ſo much as ſuſpected. The firſt man that fell by theſe aſſaſſins was Jonathan the high-prieſt; after which, not a day paſs'd for a good while, without ſeveral executions of the ſame kind. This ſo ſtartled the city, that the very fear was in ſome reſpect worſe than the miſchief; for it was as dangerous to walk the ſtreets, as to be in a battle. They ſuſpected every man for an enemy at a diſtance; and durſt not truſt their friends when they came near them. And after all, this watchfulneſs and guard was not enough to ſecure them: ſo bold and dextrous were theſe bravo's in the exerciſe of their profeſſion.

Jonathan the high-prieſt was the firſt that fell by theſe ruffians. The city in a diſmal fright and confuſion at it.

THERE was another ſort of miſcreants now, that did yet more miſchief with their tongues than the other did with their weapons. 'Tis true, they ſpilt no blood, but they deſtroy'd more with their doctrines, than the other did with their daggers; and utterly corrupted the happy and the orderly ſtate of the city. Theſe were impoſtors and ſeducers, that under the colour of religion, ſet men a madding after ſtrange opinions and innovations. They withdrew the people into woods and ſolitudes, upon pretence that God had a work in hand to ſet them at perfect liberty; and that he would reveal himſelf further to them by tokens from heaven, that would give them an infallible aſſurance of it. Felix ſaw manifeſtly what they were a doing, and found it neceſſary to nip the deſign of a rebellion in the bud; ſo that he ſent out a body of horſe and foot after theſe enthuſiaſts, and deſtroy'd a great number of their diſciples.

The danger of enthuſiaſts and impoſtors under colour of pretended revelations.

Felix defeats a body of the ſeducers.

THIS miſchief was follow'd with that of an Egyptian pretender, that fell heavier upon the Jews than the other. This Egyptian was a magician, but paſs'd for a prophet; he had inveigled at leaſt thirty thouſand men into his congregation, whom he led about by the way of the wilderneſs, and ſo to mount Olivet; propoſing to march thence to Jeruſalem; beat out the Roman gariſon, and make himſelf maſter of the place and country: with his friends and guards about him all this while to aſſiſt in the enterprize. Felix, finding it to be a growing evil, advanced up to the Egyptian with his Roman legions, and a conſiderable body of the Jews to join him. Felix gave him battle, and totally defeated him; the Egyptian himſelf, with ſome few of his followers, ſaving themſelves by flight. There were great numbers of his people kill'd, others taken and put in chains, and the reſt diſpers'd to their own homes.

A magician ſets up for a prophet, and marches at the head of thirty thouſand men towards Jeruſalem.

Felix encounters him upon the way, and gives him a total rout.

IT is with a diſtemper'd nation as in the caſe of an ill habit of body, one trouble is no ſooner remov'd but another immediately ſucceeds it: for the magicians and the robbers were now compoſing how they might ſet up for abſolute liberty, and engage the multitude in a reſolution to ſhake off the Roman yoke. This they attempted, both by argument and menace; threatening death without mercy for any man to own that juriſdiction: propoſing to reduce thoſe by terror, that would otherwiſe ſubject themſelves to a voluntary ſlavery. This party diſpers'd itſelf all over the country, plundering great mens houſes, cutting of throats, and burning wherever they came; ſo that Judea was brought to the laſt extremity of deſperation with dread and trouble, the war growing every day more cruel than other.

An outrageous tumult betwixt the Jews and the Syrians, about the city of Cesarea.

THERE was at this time another tumult also that broke out about Cesarea, upon a quarrel that arose there betwixt the Jews and the Syrians living promiscuously together. The Jews would have it to be their city; arguing that a Jew was the founder of it, meaning king Herod. Their competitors could not deny a Jew to have been the builder of it; but insisted upon it on the other hand, that it belong'd to the Gentiles; for if it were the Jews city, they would never suffer temples and statues to be erected in it. They fell into such heats upon this dispute, that they betook themselves to hostile violence; and not a day pass'd but there was mischief done, more or less, betwixt the forward men of the two parties. The elders did all that was possible to be done, by authority and advice, to quiet the Jews on the one hand, but they were wholly ungovernable; and the Greeks on the other hand, thought themselves too good to truckle to the Jews. The Jews, 'tis true, were look'd upon to have more wealth and courage, but the Grecks had a much greater interest in the soldiery: for a great part of the Roman army being drawn out of Syria, they were the readier to assist them, both as their countrymen and kindred. The magistrates and officers did all that was to be done too, by the uttermost severity of discipline to quash the tumult; as taking the incorrigible and obstinate into custody; whipping and chaining them up, and the like. But the exemplary sufferings of some wrought nothing upon the spirits of others that were more harden'd, nay, on the contrary, that which they thought would have discourag'd or over-aw'd them, made them still worse and worse.

The elders do all they can by fair means and foul, to quiet it.

FELIX at last, when he saw nothing would bring them to reason, commanded the faction away out of the city by proclamation, upon their uttermost peril. But divers staying behind in contempt of authority, the governor sent a party of soldiers in among them, that kill'd several of them and seiz'd their goods. But the sedition still continuing, the governor dispatch'd away commissioners to Nero; some of the principal men of both parties, to plead their cause before Cesar. Festus succeeded Felix, and fell very hard upon the highwaymen that were most troublesome to the province, taking and killing a great many of the thieves.

The cause comes at last to be heard before Cesar Festus succeeds Felix.

Ant. b. 20. c. 15, 16. Albinus succeeds Festus. A corrupt and tyrannical governor.

ALBINUS succeeded Festus; but he did not govern like his predecessor. He was a man so universally wicked, that there was no ill he boggled at: as corruption, avarice, extortion, oppression; and this in all cases too, as well private as publick; bribery in civil causes, bribery again in personal; and the nation heavily oppress'd under the burden of arbitrary tributes. Was any man in the hand of the law for rapine and violence, either upon conviction before the present magistrate, or upon the sentence of former judges? There needed but a friend and a piece of money to set him at liberty: and no man was ever found guilty by this governor, that had but money to make him innocent, and purchase his freedom.

THERE was at this time a faction at Jerusalem, that had set their hearts upon a change of government, and those of the party that had wherewithal, compounded with Albinus before-hand to be easy to them in case of a broil. But there was a popular mixture of men also, that could not be quiet themselves, so long as the state was at peace; and these people were taken into the interest of Albinus. The heads of this mutinous medley had every one of them a troop of resolute fellows at his command, of his own complexion, while the governor himself was only the most illustrious thief of the band, with his guards about him to do execution at pleasure upon those that were not in a condition either for resistance or defence. It came to this upon the main, that the oppressed durst not open their mouths to complain; and those that escap'd, were glad to give part of what they had for the saving of the rest; and the receivers themselves worse at last than the thieves. In fine, "there was no faith left upon the earth", and the multiplicity of tyrants was evidently the foundation of a slavery to come.

Albinus a lewd man, but nothing to Gessius Florus that came after him. Albinus and Florus compar'd.

THESE were the manners, and this the character of Albinus; but Gessius Florus his successor, was such a foil to him, that the former look'd like an angel upon the comparison. Albinus indeed was false, but yet close and secret in his iniquities, which had something like modesty in it; but Gessius made an open profession of his cruelty and injustice; insomuch, that he valu'd himself upon the merit of his crime, and made it his glory to declare himself a profess'd enemy to the whole nation. He behaved himself in the province more like an executioner than a governor; for he treated the whole body of the people like common criminals, without setting any bounds, either to his rapine, or to his tyranny. He had neither pity in him, nor sense of honour; but was mercileſs to the miserable, and utterly void of shame, in cases so foul that impudence itself would have blush'd at. No man ever put truth out of countenance with paradox and imposture as this man did; neither did ever any man find out such artificial ways of address for the doing of mischief. The destroying of a whole nation, man by man, would not serve his turn neither, without sweeping away whole cities intire, and cutting off the neck of the common body of the people at a blow. He gave such liberty and encouragement to spoil and pillage, that it fell little short of a proclamation of allowance to all people to take what they could get, provided he might but go a share in the booty. And then for his avarice, he drain'd the province into so starving a degree of poverty, that the inhabitants left it in effect, a desart, for want of of bread, and tranſplanted themſelves into foreign provinces.

Ceſtius Gallus governor of Syria.

CESTIUS GALLUS was at that time governor of Syria; and in his days there was not a Jew that durſt ſo much as open his mouth to him in a complaint againſt Florus. But however, upon his coming up to Jeruſalem, upon the feaſt of unleavened bread, the multitude, to the number of at leaſt three hundred thouſand, made their application to Gallus to take pity of a miſerable people, and deliver the province out of the hands of Florus, that peſt of a governor. Florus was within hearing of this outrage; but ſo far from being mov'd, or out of countenance at it, that he turn'd it all to ridicule. Ceſtius in the mean time, did what he could to pacify the people, by telling them that Florus ſhould deal better with them for the future; and ſo he went back again to Antioch. Florus brought Gallus onward of his way as far as Ceſarea, telling him a thouſand lies as they paſs'd; but, at the ſame time, contriving within himſelf the neceſſity of a war with the Jews, as the only way to lie undiſcover'd and bring himſelf off. In the caſe of a peace, the Jews, he thought would lay hold of ſuch an opportunity to bring the cauſe before Ceſar, which would be dangerous; whereas if he could but once work them to a revolt, the greater miſchief would take off the envy of the leſs: for which end he endeavoured every day, all that lay in his power, to force them by degrees into a rebellion in his own defenſe.

Ant. b. 20. c. 15 The buſineſs of Ceſarea was the occaſion of the Jewiſh war.

THE tyranny of Florus was indeed a dangerous temptation to a rebellion: but the Jews ſtood firm againſt that provocation, and afterward it was the buſineſs of Ceſarea that did the work.

THERE was a certain Greek had a houſe in Ceſarea, cloſe upon the place where the Jews had their ſynagogue. They would fain have made a purchaſe of this houſe, and treated with the maſter ſeveral times about it, offering him much more for it than it was worth: but ſo far was he from complying with their propoſal, that out of pure croſſneſs, inſtead of giving them more room, he fell to blocking of the way, in a manner, quite up, by crowding ſo many little ſhops into the paſſage, that there was hardly room left for one ſingle body to get into the ſynagogue. Upon this, ſome of the hot young men of the Jews went out preſently to the workmen, and caution'd them not to go on, at their peril. Florus countermanded that prohibition; ſo that the Jews had nothing more to do but to try the governor with a ſum of money. Several of their principal men met about it, and among the reſt, one John, a farmer of the king's cuſtoms; who contracted with Florus for eight † talents to forbid the building. They deliver'd him the money, and he promis'd all things ſhould be done accordingly; but immediately upon the receipt of it, he went from Ceſarea to Sebaſte, as if it had been on purpoſe to leave them at liberty for an uproar: as who ſhould ſay, eight talents is the price of an opportunity for you to cut one another's throats.

The Jews affronted in their ſynagogue.

The bribery and perfidy of Florus.

THE next day, being the Jews ſabbath, when the people were all together in the ſynagogue, a ſpiteful Ceſarean ſet an earthern veſſel juſt before the door, with a ſacrifice of birds upon it. This contemptuous mockery put the Jews out of all government and patience, to ſee their laws had in deriſion, and the place prophan'd. The more moderate and conſiderable men of the party, were for appealing to the governors for juſtice and redreſs: but for the ſeditious hot-brain'd young fellows of the faction, nothing would ſatisfy them but ribaldry and blows; and the Ceſareans, on the other hand, were as ready for the encounter: the ſacrifice of birds, being purpoſely deſign'd to draw on a quarrel. And here began the action.

A mock ſacrifice.

A violent commotion.

JUCUNDUS, a captain of horſe, and one that was left to keep the peace, coming in juſt upon this nick of time, order'd the earthen veſſel above-mentioned to be taken away: and then apply'd himſelf toward the allaying of the tumult. But the Jews finding Jucundus over-born by the Ceſareans, preſently took up the books of their laws, and carry'd them off to ‖ Narbata, a province of that name, about ſixty ‡ furlongs from Ceſarea. Twelve of their chief men, with John the publican, went to Florus at Sebaſte, with a complaint for what had paſs'd, and a petition for redreſs; not forgetting to remind him by-the-by, (tho' very tenderly) of the eight talents. Florus caus'd them immediately to be taken up and bound, for preſuming to remove their laws from Ceſarea. That was the pretence.

Jucundus a horſe officer, endeavours to compoſe it, but in vain. In this difficulty the Jews remove the books of their law. They petition for relief, and are puniſh'd for ſo doing.

THIS

THIS action of Florus provok'd the Jews of Jeruſalem to the higheſt degree of indignation: but they found it convenient for the preſent to ſmother their reſentment. Florus, juſt as if it had been his proper office to blow the coals of diſſention, and inflame the Jews to a quarrel, ſent in Ceſar's name for ſeventeen * talents out of the treaſury, and for the emperor's ſervice. This put the Jews in ſuch a confuſion, that they run up and down the city, and to the temple, like mad-men; crying out all the way upon Ceſar, Ceſar, as loud as they could bawl, to be delivered from the inhuman barbarities of Florus; purſuing him with clamours, mockeries, and maledictions of all ſorts: as there was one of the mutineers had gotten an alms-basket at his back, and went about the ſtreets begging of broken meat for the poor miſerable Florus, in deriſion of him. But all theſe taunts and abuſes had no other effect upon him, than that they made his avarice ſtill more ſpiteful, as well as more inſatiable. And then inſtead of putting a check to the firſt heat of the ſedition at Ceſarea, and removing the cauſes of the tumult as he ought to have done, both by duty and contract; he takes his march with an army of horſe and foot to Jeruſalem, and makes the power of Rome only ſubſervient to his private paſſions and luſts, either of pride, profit, or revenge; filling the hearts of the people wherever he came, with confuſion and terror.

Florus makes matters worſe and worſe.

The Jews outrageouſly fall upon Florus.

THE multitude however, after all manner of indignities caſt upon them, put on the countenance ſtill of an officious reſpect, in going out to receive him upon the way, and preparing to entertain him with all ſemblances of honour and eſteem, uſual in ſuch caſes. While they were in this diſpoſition, to give him a ſeeming welcome into the city, Florus prevented their compliment, by ſending Capito a centurion to them with fifty horſe to put a ſtop to their journey; who deliver'd his meſſage to them in theſe terms. "I am to command you, "ſays he, in the name of Florus, to go your "ways home again: and to let you underſtand "that the man you have made ſo bold with, "both in earneſt and jeſt, is not to be cajoled "into better opinion of you by a parcel of fair "and falſe words. If you are in truth, as you "would be thought to be, men of reſolution "and courage, call that man all thoſe ſcan"dalous and reproachful names to his face, "that you did behind his back; and aſſert "that liberty by your arms, that you have "made ſuch a noiſe with in your clamours." What with this rebuke, and the ſoldiers breaking in upon the multitude, the people ran ſeveral ways in a fright, without waiting for the ceremony of ſaluting Florus, or of paying thoſe offices to the ſoldiers that are cuſtomary in ſuch encounters. They went, in fine, every man to his own home; and, betwixt care and fear, paſs'd the night in anxious vigilance.

They offer him however the compliment of a ſeeming reſpect.

Florus turns them off with ſcorn.

FLORUS lodg'd at this time in the palace, and the next day he mounted the tribunal; the high-prieſt and the prime men of the city being there preſent. He paſs'd bitter reflections upon ſome lewd and reviling ſpeeches that had been thrown out againſt him; demanding poſitively that the authors of them ſhould be found out and produc'd; threatening withal, that he would take his revenge upon thoſe that were there upon the place, if they did not bring him the guilty. The Jews made anſwer, "That for the body of "the people, they were for peace and quiet; "and for thoſe that laſh'd out with their "tongues, they implor'd a pardon from them. "For it could not be imagin'd, they ſaid, in "ſo vaſt a multitude of people, but there muſt "needs be ſome raſh and unexperienc'd men. "Neither was it poſſible to diſtinguiſh who "were guilty, and who not: for even thoſe "that repented of what they had done, would "not yet own the doing of it. And therefore "they only offer'd it to Florus's conſideration, whether any thing could be more for "the ſervice of the Roman empire, than to "conſult the ſafety of the people and city, "by preſerving them firm in their allegiance to "Ceſar: and whether it might not be more "adviſable (in caſe of the worſt) to ſpare ſome "few criminals, for the ſake of a great many "innocents, than to deſtroy ſo great a num"ber of innocent men for the ſake of here "and there one that was guilty." This way of reaſoning blew up Florus into ſuch a rage, that he preſently order'd away the ſoldiers to the great market in the upper town, to rifle the place, and kill all they met. When the ſoldiers found themſelves ſupported in their claim to the pillage by the concurring authority of their commander; they did not only execute their order upon the places and people they were ſent to, but all houſes were alike to them, and all the inhabitants put to death without diſtinction; as well thoſe they took upon their flight, in by-ways, and ſecret paſſages, as thoſe they found in their houſes. No booty, in ſhort, came amiſs to them. Several of the nobility, that they ſeiz'd and brought to Florus, were by his order whipt and crucify'd. The whole number of the ſlain upon that day, reckoning women and children into the account (as the very infants at the breaſts of their mothers did not eſcape them) was ſix hundred and thirty. The calamity was grievous in itſelf, and yet worſe for the very novelty of it: for it was never heard of before Florus's time, that ever any of the equeſtrian order were whipt like ſlaves and gibbetted: for tho' the perſons were by extraction Jews, the dignity was yet Roman.

AGRIPPA was at this time gone to Alexandria, upon a viſit to Alexander, whom Nero had made governor of Egypt. His ſiſter Berenice was then at Jeruſalem, and in extreme affliction for the barbarous outrages that were practis'd there; inſomuch that ſhe ſent ſeveral meſſages to Florus by ſome of her horſe-officers and guards, beſeeching him earneſtly to hold his hand, and ſpill no more blood. But Florus had no ſenſe at all, either of the heinouſneſs of the ſin, or of the honour of the interceſſion. His heart was ſet upon lucre and pillage, and he look'd upon all other things (Berenice herſelf not excepted) with contempt and neglect. So that the ſoldiers did not only go on, maſſacring and cutting of throats, before Berenice's face; but had moſt certainly kill'd the queen herſelf, if ſhe had not made her eſcape into the palace; where ſhe lay waking all that night, with a guatd to look to her, for fear of a ſurprize. The occaſion of her coming to Jeruſalem, was the paying of a vow to Almighty God; as is uſual in caſes of providential deliverances from ſickneſſes and other great dangers. It is cuſtomary for people under thoſe circumſtances to continue in prayer for thirty days before the ſacrifice; abſtaining from wine, and ſhaving the hair. Berenice was now in her diurnal courſe of devotion; and ſtanding bare-foot before the tribunal, there was ſhe interceeding to Florus for the people, but without any ſucceſs or reſpect: beſide that ſhe ran the risk of her life for the piety of the office. This was the ſixteenth of the month † Artemiſius.

She mediates to Florus in favour of the Jews.

ON the next day, the people gather'd together in the market-place (in the upper town) outrageouſly exclaiming againſt the murderers of their friends that were kill'd there the day before. But the main ſtreſs of their rage and ribaldry fell upon Florus. The great men and the high-prieſts were ſo ſenſible of the danger of provoking him the ſame way over again, that they tore their garments, and went about begging from man to man, not to talk at that rate; for the exaſperating of Florus was the way to deſtroy them all. Upon this application, the multitude was a little more compos'd: partly out of reſpect to the interceſſors, and partly in hope that the governor's ſpite was over.

The people in an uproar raging againſt Florus.

They are reaſon'd into a better temper.

FLORUS was not at all pleas'd to ſee things ſo quiet again; and therefore he bethought himſelf of a contrivance how to create a new broil. He ſent for the high-prieſts and ſome of the chief men of the Jews to come to him, and then told them there were two companies coming from Ceſarea, and it would be a convincing evidence of the people's good affection to the government, if they would but go out, and meet them upon the way. The thing being promis'd and agreed upon, Florus gave it in charge to the centurions, that in caſe the Jews greeted them with any ſhew of compliment or reſpect upon their meeting, they ſhould not pay them any manner of civility in return: and if they ſhould expreſs any reſentment at it either in words or looks, they ſhould betake themſelves to their arms. The high-prieſts got the people together into the temple, and there adjur'd them by all means to go out and compliment the Romans upon the way, and to be ſure to give them a friendly ſalute, for fear any thing ſhould be taken amiſs. There were ſeveral rath heads in the croud againſt it; and the reſt of the multitude, while the ſlaughter of their friends was yet freſh in their memory, were forward enough to join in opinion with the incendiaries. While this was in agitation, in came all the prieſts and Levites, expoſing the holy veſſels and other precious ornaments of the temple: the ſinging men and organiſts with their muſical inſtruments, addreſſing themſelves to the people, with earneſt entreaties to preſerve the honour of the temple ſacred, without provoking the Romans by contumelious affronts to the rifling of it. There were alſo divers of the high-prieſts with aſhes upon their heads, their breaſts naked, and their garments torn; applying themſelves to all the men of dignity, one by one in particular, and to all together in general, with repeated importunities not to betray their country for ſo ſmall a matter, to thoſe very people that gap'd after the ruin of it. "For what, ſaid "they, will the Romans be the better for it, "if you ſhew them the ſame reſpect now that "you have done formerly? and what will the "Jews now be the better either for the refuſal of it? Nay, on the contrary, if you treat "them with honour, and according to the "forms of good manners, you will leave Florus no pretence to trouble you; and it will "effectually amount to a redeeming of your "country from the calamities that you have "otherwiſe to fear. You are alſo to conſider the diſproportion betwixt the peaceable "majority of the multitude, and a few ſcatter'd mutineers; and that there is all the reaſon in the world, that the greater part "ſhould over-rule the leſs." This way of diſcourſe had ſuch an effect upon the people, that, betwixt authority, argument, and menace, the hotteſt men of the faction were brought over to hear and to do reaſon. So ſoon as things were brought to this diſpoſition, the prieſts and princes of the people marched out to meet the ſoldiers; and the multitude in very good order follow'd them. When the Jews were advanced within diſtance of exchanging a ceremony, they ſaluted the Romans with great humanity; but receiving no return, the angry part of them fell immediately to reviling Florus, as the author and contriver of all their miſeries. The ſoldiers took the hint, and in the ſame inſtant fell upon the Jews with clubs and cudgels, put them into a confuſion, and upon the purſuit, trampled great numbers of them under their horſes feet; ſo that upon the whole, betwixt thoſe that dy'd of blows and wounds, thoſe that were cruſh'd to death in the croud, or ſmother'd in the gate by preſſing who ſhould get out firſt, and ſo hindring one another, there was upon the main a miſerable deſtruction, and as frightful a ſpectacle; for what with bruiſes, maims and ſuffocations, the bodies were ſo diſfigur'd, that one friend did not know the face of another, to give him decent burial. In fine, the enemy kill'd all they could come at; and the thing they principally labour'd was to get betwixt the Jews and the gate of Bezeth, being a paſs that led to the caſtle Antonia and the temple. Florus, at the ſame time, made a ſally out of the palace with what troops he had, upon the back of the Jews, in a proſpect of forcing the caſtle; but upon the people's rallying and making head againſt him, his deſign fail'd him. For having now got poſſeſſion of the houſes, they annoy'd the Romans to ſuch a degree with ſtones and darts, from the roofs, that the enemy finding no fence againſt that way of attack, nor any poſſibility of breaking through the multitudes of people that throng'd up thoſe narrow ſtreets, Florus was fain to retire with the remainder of his army to the palace. The Jews being now in ſome apprehenſion of Florus's returning to the aſſault, and of his making an attempt upon the temple by the way of the fort Antonia, they went and cut down a certain gallery of communication betwixt the fort and the temple; which was ſuch a mortification to Florus, that finding his project hopeleſs, and his avarice diſappointed, (for the holy treaſure was all he aim'd at) he gave over the enterprize. Upon this, he confer'd with the high-prieſt and the ſenate; telling them that he was now leaving the city, and ready to aſſign them what gariſon they ſhould think fit. Their anſwer was, in regard that there were to be no innovations, one company would be ſufficient; provided it might not be that which the people had had a quarrel with already; for they were great ſufferers by them, and lay under a prejudice. Florus chang'd the company, as they deſir'd, and went back with the reſt of his army to Ceſarea.

A terrible deſtruction. And a dreadful ſpectacle.

Florus attempts the caſtle, and is beaten off.

He retires to the palace.

The communication cut off betwixt Fort Antonia and the temple.

Florus gives over his deſign, and returns to Ceſarea.

CHAP. XVI.

Florus complains of the Jews to Ceſtius, as Ceſar's enemies. Ceſtius is better inform'd, and adviſes upon it. Politianus pitch'd upon to manage the enquiry. He conſults Agrippa; and they are both receiv'd with great reſpect. They ſhew Politianus what havock Florus had made; and the loyalty of the Jews to other governors. Politianus goes back to Ceſtius. The people preſs for a complaint to Nero againſt Florus. A healing ſpeech of Agrippa's to the Jews. A diſſuaſive from ſedition. The Romans are lords of the univerſe; as the Athenians, the Lacedemonians, the Macedonians, &c. Agrippa touches upon the conſcience and religion of the War. The whole body of the Jews is involv'd in one common cauſe. Agrippa brings the people to ſome degree of moderation.

FLORUS was no ſooner come to Ceſarea, but he found out new matter for the inflaming of a war, and ſent it in a letter to * Ceſtius, wherein he charg'd the Jews with a revolt, which was ſo impudent a falſity, that the very crimes he imputed to the Jews, he was expreſly guilty of himſelf. Now queen Berenice, and the principals of Jeruſalem, were ſo juſt and candid in this matter, as to give Ceſtius the particulars of the whole truth, and a punctual account of Florus's unjuſt adminiſtration. Upon the receipt of this intimation, Ceſtius preſently confer'd with the great men about him, what he had beſt to do. Some were for his marching with an army out of hand into Judea, and to bring the offenders to juſtice, if the report ſhould be found to be true, or otherwiſe, to encourage them in their loyalty, if they ſhould appear to be falſly accus'd. Now Ceſtius himſelf was rather of opinion for employing ſome perſon of honour and addreſs beforehand, to learn out the truth of things, and then to give him a faithful information upon the whole affair. The man he pitch'd upon was † Politianus, a tribune; who meeting king Agrippa near Jamnia, in his return from Alexandria, told him whence he came, who ſent him, and what was his buſineſs. There were at that time there, ſeveral high-prieſts of the Jews, ſenators, and others of the firſt quality, to pay their duty to the king: they had no ſooner paſs'd the firſt compliment of reſpect in courſe, but they launch'd out into a lamentable remonſtrance of the miſerable ſtate they were reduc'd to by the inhumanities of Florus. Agrippa thought as they did; but it would not have ſtood with his dignity to blow the coal; ſo that he rather turn'd the invective artificially againſt the Jews, whom yet he pity'd in his heart; out of a deſire rather to reſtrain and ſweeten, than to exaſperate their paſſions: for the leſs they might ſeem to ſuffer, the leſs provocation could they pretend to a revenge. They that had moſt to loſe, and certainly moſt reaſon to deſire a peace, could not but take that gentle reproach for a ſignal inſtance of the king's goodneſs.

Florus charges the Jews to Ceſtius, as enemies to Ceſar.

Berenice and ſome great men give Ceſtius the truth of the ſtory.

Ceſtius adviſes upon it.

And pitches upon Politianus for the menage of the enquiry.

He meets Agrippa, and tells him his buſineſs.

THE people of Jeruſalem receiv'd Agrippa and ‡ Politianus, upon the way, ſixty furlongs from the city, out of reſpect, to attend them up to the town; the women all the while bitterly bewailing the loſs of their murder'd huſbands, and the whole multitude, after their example, burſting out into tears and lamentations as by conſent: ſome of them imploring Agrippa in generoſity to take pity of the nation; and others begging of †† Politianus but to go into the city, and ſee what havock Florus had made there. Upon this they took him into the market-place, and ſhew'd him how every thing was abandon'd there and forlorn, and the houſes all in rubbiſh. They prevail'd with  Politianus after this, by the means of Agrippa, to take a view of the city as far as the pool of Siloah, and only one ſervant along with him; where he ſhould ſee with his own eyes how obedient the Jews were to all other Romans in authority; but for the horrid cruelties of Florus, they were utterly intolerable. When he had taken a view of the city, and inform'd himſelf ſufficiently in the loyal diſpoſitions of the Jews, he call'd the people together, and went up to the temple; where he enter'd into a declamatory commendation of their approved fidelity to the Romans; and then, after enlarging himſelf in exhortations and good counſels, upon the ſubject of the common peace, he gave God praiſes and thankſgivings, with all veneration for his holy religion, in place and manner according to the law; and ſo went back to Ceſtius.

And the loyalty of the Jews to all other Roman governors.

Politianus goes back to Ceſtius.

PoLITIANUS had no ſooner turn'd his back, but the multitude immediately addreſs'd themſelves to the king and the high-prieſts, preſſing for leave to ſend embaſſadors to Nero with a complaint againſt Florus: "For if we, ſaid "they, ſhould ſit ſtill, without bringing ſo "bloody an outrage to an examination, and "putting the authors of it to the teſt, it "would look as if we ourſelves were the "criminals, and durſt not abide the trial." It was clear on the one hand, that it would be dangerous for Agrippa to refuſe them this liberty; and it had at the ſame time, the face of an invidious proſecution on the other, to turn looſe the multitude againſt their governor by ſuch an invective, under the name of an embaſſy: ſo that Agrippa, finding himſelf divided betwixt the bold and martial humour of the Romans, and the hazard of tranſporting the Jews into a tumult, call'd an aſſembly to meet in a great gallery, and after the placing of his ſiſter Berenice upon a chair of ſtate, in the Aſmonean palace, which overlooks that gallery from the upper part of the town (the temple and the gallery being join'd by a bridge) he ſpoke to the people after this manner.

The people preſs for a complaint to Nero againſt Florus. The danger of ſuch a proceeding.

Agrippa calls an aſſembly.

A healing ſpeech of Agrippa to the Jews.

"IF I found you now under any ſort of diſ-"poſition to make war upon the Romans, as "I am at this time clearly convinc'd of the "contrary, and that the greater part of your "profeſſion are men of peace and order, I "ſhould have ſav'd both you and myſelf this "trouble: for what would any application "or advice of mine ſignify to a body of men "that labour under an incurable prejudice? "But in regard that ſome people are purely "unquiet, for want of an experimental know-"ledge of the miſeries of war; ſome out of a "vain and inconſiderate hope of liberty, others "out of avarice, for the advantage of the boo-"ty, and making profit to themſelves out of "a general confuſion: in regard, I ſay, of "theſe corruptions and miſtakes, I have now "thought fit to call you together; and to tell "you what I think convenient to be done un-"der your circumſtances, in order to the rec-"tifying of your errors, and to prevent the "ruins of a dutiful majority by the intempe-"rate heats of a few deſperate libertines. "All I deſire is only your patience and ſi-"lence, and to be heard without murmuring "and noiſe, whether you approve what I ſay "or not. As for thoſe that are abandon'd to "the ſpirit of diſorder and confuſion, and ir-"recoverably loſt, they are ſtill at liberty to "follow their own counſels, let my opinion "be what it will. But it is to no purpoſe for "me to ſpeak at all, unleſs I may be heard "by thoſe who deſire to hear me.

"I know very well that the faults of go-"vernors and the bleſſings of liberty, are two "common topicks for men of art and paſſion to "work upon. Now before I enter upon the "diſquiſition of what you yourſelves are, and "the force you are pretending to encounter, "I muſt, in the firſt place, divide two points "that you confound, by making them into "one. If revenge upon your oppreſſors (or "let it be juſtice, if you pleaſe) be the thing "that you contend for, what's the meaning of "your crying up liberty at ſuch an extrava-"gant rate? Or, if ſubjection be in itſelf ſo "intolerable, what's the quarrel to your go-"vernors? For let them be the beſt natur'd "people under the cope of heaven, ſubjection "is but ſubjection ſtill; and ſo ſtill as ſcanda-"lous as it was before.

The faults of government and the bleſſings of liberty are the common ſubjects for art and paſſion to work upon.

Whether rulers be good or bad, ſubjection is ſubjection ſtill.

"TAKE things to pieces now, and conſider "a little, upon what ground it is that you pre-"tend to calumniate and cavil, and in what "manner you are to behave yourſelves, even "if your governors ſhould be to blame. It is "your intereſt, as well as your duty, to "ſweeten things with offices of tenderneſs and "reſpect, and not to treat your ſuperiors with "brawls and coarſe language. When you "make things greater than they are, you pro-"voke thoſe that are over you to make things "worſe than they would otherwiſe be; and "to turn that male-adminiſtration that they "were half aſham'd of before, into a bare-"fac'd raging tyranny. There's nothing takes "off the edge of oppreſſion, like patience: re-"ſignation is enough to put perſecution out of "countenance, even let it be never ſo violent "and unjuſt.

We owe a duty and reſpect even to the worſt of governors.

"ADMITTING that you are in truth ex-"tremely abus'd by the Roman government, "will you have this to be the act preſently of "all the Romans; nay, and of Ceſar him-"ſelf too? And there's your quarrel. You "cannot imagine that thoſe governors have it "in their commiſſion to oppreſs you; or that "Ceſar himſelf can look eaſt and weſt, and ſo "thorough the four quarters of the world all "at a time; when 'tis no eaſy matter for him "to get a faithful account at Rome, even of "what is done here. How great a madneſs "is it then, to run the riſque of ſo dangerous "a war for trifles; and in very deed, for we "know not what! Beſide that matters may "mend in time; for governors are neither "immortal nor perpetual; but they take their "turns: and it is reaſonable enough to hope, "and to promiſe ourſelves, that who ſucceeds "next to the office will be better. Now when "a war is once commenc'd, 'tis neither to be "diſcontinued nor carry'd on without miſera-"ble inconveniences. As for thoſe that ſet "up for liberty, let them have a care, in the "firſt place, not to run themſelves out of it; "for the laſt ſlavery is always the uneaſieſt, "and to avoid that yoke muſt be acknow-"ledged a juſt cauſe of war; for he that is "once a ſubject, and then falls off, is rather "a ſtubborn ſlave, than a generous advocate of "freedom.

A diſſuaſive from ſedition.

"IF any thing could have been done againſt "the might of the Romans, why was it not "done when Pompey broke in upon us? But if

" ambitious contention for liberty, have been " forced to ſubmit and to obey: and are you
" the only men in the world, do you think,
" that are too good to ſerve the ſovereign lords
" of all other people? Where's your militia,
" or the arms that you depend upon? Your
" fleets to ſcoury the Roman ſeas? And where's
" your treaſure to anſwer the expence of this " undertaking? You fancy an Egyptian or an " Arabian war perhaps: but you proceed alto" gether upon falſe meaſures, without com" paring the diſproportion betwixt your abili" ty and your undertaking, and the inequali-
" ty betwixt a weak and a diſorderly people,
" and the ſtability of a formidable empire. 'Tis
" a common thing for you to be over-run and " ſurpriz'd by your next neighbours; when at
" the ſame time the Romans carry'd the whole " world before them.

The power and majeſty of Rome.

The Romans lords of the univerſe.

" NAY, and the known world would not " content them neither; for though they were " poſſeſs'd of the courſe of the Euphrates to
" the eaſt, the Danube to the north; the Li-
" byan deſart to the ſouth, and as far as Cadiz
" to the weſt; nothing would ſerve them but " another world beyond the ocean, and the " carrying of their arms into Britain; which
" at that time was look'd upon as inacceſſible.
" But what is it now that you pretend to all
" this while? Would you be thought richer
" than the Gauls, hardier than the Germans,
" or wiſer than the Greeks? or do you take
" yourſelves to be hard enough for all man" kind beſide? Upon what ground is it that " you are thus bold and confident againſt the " Romans? It will be ſaid perhaps, that it is " an uneaſy and an irkſome thing to ſerve: but " if it be ſo to you, what muſt it be to the " Greeks? Who, over and above a large ex" tent of territory, are look'd upon as men of " the nobleſt extraction of any people under
" the ſun, and the moſt renown'd for valour:
" and yet theſe men, great and noble as they " are, live in obedience to the Romans; and
" ſo do the Macedonians alſo; who have un-
" doubtly more right to a claim of liberty than " you can pretend to. Or what do ye ſay to
" the five hundred cities of Aſia, that peaceably
" ſubmit themſelves to a conſul, without any
" guard or gariſon to over-awe them. To ſay
" nothing of the Heniochians, the Colchians,
" the nations about the Boſphorus, and the " inhabitants of the coaſts of Pontus, and the " lake of Meotis; people ſo free in former " times, that they never had ſo much as a ma-
" ſter among themſelves: and yet three thou-
" ſand Romans were enough to keep them all
" in ſubjection; and forty galleys ſufficient to
" preſerve all thoſe ſeas in peace and obedience,
" which no body durſt ever venture upon be" fore.

" HAD the Bithynians, Cappadocians, Pam" phylians, Lydians and Cicilians, nothing to
" ſay for themſelves upon the point of liberty?
" for they are at preſent all tributaries, and " pay their duties, without ſoldiers to compel
" them. And how is it with the Thracians
" now, in a large country of ſeven days jour" ney in length, and five over, and much more
" rude, and more defenſible than yours; be" ing almoſt impaſſable for the bitter froſts and " deep ſnows there; and yet a guard of only
" two thouſand Romans keeps them all in or" der. And then for the Illyrians, from be" yond the Danube as far as Dalmatia, and
" ſo likewiſe the Dacians; they are all under " the guard only of two legions. Nay, the " Dalmatians themſelves, after ſo many con-
" teſts for liberty, ſo many baffles in the at" tempt, and ſo many rallies and re-inforce-
" ments afterwards, in proſecution of the ſame
" deſign; how quiet and eaſy are they under
" the command of one ſingle legion?

" BUT after all this, if any pretence what" ſoever might juſtify a revolt, the Gauls of " all men living have the greateſt encourage" ment and temptation to do it, in the very " ſituation of their country. For they are na" turally fortify'd; on the eaſt with the " Alps, the Rhine on the north, the Pyre-
" nean mountains on the ſouth, and on the " weſt with the ocean. But notwithſtanding
" all theſe advantages, three hundred and " fifteen nations in the ſame intereſt; an in-" exhauſtible ſource of all good things within " themſelves both for uſe and commerce, not " only for their own, but likewiſe for the " common benefit of mankind; and yet we " find theſe people under the Roman allegi-
" ance; and propounding no other happineſs
" to themſelves than in that of their maſters.
" And this reſignation does not ariſe from the " want of courage or diſcipline, or from the " want of brave examples in their anceſtors;
" who had ſtood a diſpute of eighty years for

" the maintenance of their liberty; but find" ing ſo admirable a concurrence of fortune
" and virtue in the actions of the Romans,
" the Gauls were ſo ſurpriz'd betwixt the ve" neration they had for the one, and their
" dread of the other, that the Romans gain'd
" as much upon them by their goodneſs as by
" their arms; inſomuch, that at this day, with " only twelve hundred men, they ſecure almoſt
" as many cities in their allegiance.

" WHAT advantage accrued to Spain from " their golden mines, when they came to con-
" tend with the Romans for their freedom?
" Or I might inſtance in nations more remote " from Rome, both by ſea and land; as the " Lutitanians and Cantabrians; where neither
" valour, diſtance, nor ſituation, could war-
" rant them againſt the power of Rome; tho'
" bordering upon a ſea ſo impetuous, that it
" is not to be ſo much as nam'd, or thought
" of, without dread and horror. And what
" ſignify'd Hercules's pillars, or the Pyre-
" nean mountains, the interpoſition of ſo ma" ny warlike nations, or any other difficulty,
" to the obſtructing of the progreſs of their
" victorious arms? but they were reduced as " well as the reſt, and one ſingle legion ſerv'd
" for a guard upon them all.

" I NEED not tell you that the Germans
" are a populous nation, and that their coun" try is of a vaſt extent; the people ſtrong,
" and big-limb'd, their courage anſwerable to
" their ſize and ſtature, and firm to the very " contempt of death itſelf. But part of this
" you are eye-witneſſes of; for the Romans
" have ſlaves of that nation all over the earth.
" In their anger they are more outrageous than " brutes; and the Rhine is at this day their " frontier. They have a guard of eight Ro" man legions upon them, that make ſlaves of
" as many of them as they take, and the reſt
" ſeek their ſafety in flight, not in force of " arms.

" As for thoſe that place ſo much confidence
" in the walls of Jeruſalem, they ſhould do
" well to conſider the walls of Britain, where
" the inhabitants are ſurrounded by the ſea,
" in a kind of a new world, not much inferior
" to the other. They have made themſelves
" maſters of this vaſt iſland too, and aſſigned
" only four legions for a guard upon it. And " what ſhall we ſay of the Parthians now? a " powerful and a warlike people, that have " heretofore given laws to ſo many great na" tions themſelves. What's the meaning of " ſending the flower of their nobility for hoſ-
" tages to Rome, but a tacit acknowledgment
" of ſubjection under the colour of peace? Are
" we the only men in the world to make war
" upon the empire, when all other nations
" tremble under the apprehenſion of their arms?

" PRAY call to mind the fate of Carthage, a " people that valu'd themſelves as branches of " the noble race of the Phenicians, that had
" the honour of the famous Hannibal for their " commander. What was the end of that " brave people, but to fall under the conquer-
" ing arms of Scipio?

" BUT neither the Cyrenians, of the Lace-
" demonian race; nor the Marmaridans, who
" ſtretched their dominion as far as the parch'd
" deſarts; nor the Syrtes, ſo frightful to our " apprehenſions; nor the Naſamonians, nor
" the Moors, nor the numberleſs multitude of
" the Numidians, were able to put any check
" to the Roman courage. They had reduced,
" in fine, the third part of the world to their
" ſubjection, ſo large that the very nations are " hardly to be number'd, beginning from the " Atlantick ſea and the pillars of Hercules, to
" the Red ſea, and comprizing all the Ethi-
" opia's. All this they took by arms, reſerv-
" ing over and above to themſelves, a yearly " tribute of corn, ſufficient to maintain the " people of Rome for eight months, beſide o" ther duties that they pay chearfully and rea" dily, though there be but one legion in ga-
" riſon to raiſe the contribution.

" BUT here's no need of recourſe to remote
" examples, for proof of the uncontroulable
" power of Rome, when we may have inſtan-
" ces ſo much nearer hand. As for the pur-
" poſe, in Egypt, a kingdom that ſtretches out
" as far as Ethiopia and Arabia-Felix, conti-
" guous to the Indies; and an infinite multi" tude of people in it, beſide thoſe of Alex" andria; and yet this mighty populous king" dom does not think much to be rated by the " poll toward the ſervice of the ſtate, and as " a tributary to the Romans; but tamely an-
" ſwers the impoſition, though not without
" ſome ground plauſible enough to murmur at it.

" How comes it now that Alexandria does " not revolt too? a ſtrong, a large, and an
" opulent city, thirty * furlongs in length,
" and ten † in breadth; prodigiouſly peopled,
" and fortify'd all around it, either with de-
" ſolated deſarts, ſeas without ports, deep
" rivers, or boggy quagmires. But the for" tune of Rome ſurmounted all theſe difficul" ties; for two legions in the city were e" nough to ſecure the ‡ peace of Egypt, and " to bridle the Macedonian nobility. Now
" this city paid more tribute in a month than " you do in a year; and four months provi-
" ſion in corn for the people of Rome, beſide
" money.

" IF this be the caſe, what deſarts do you
" propound to repair to for companions in
" your undertaking? for all the habitual part
" of the world is clearly againſt you, and in " effect Romans; unleſs you flatter yourſelves
" with hopes of aſſiſtance from your coun" try-men the Adiabenians on the other ſide
" of the Euphrates. But ſuppoſing now that " they could be guilty of ſo groſs an overſight,
" as to engage in a war ſo deſperate, upon ſo
" unreaſonable a ground; the Parthians them-
" ſelves would never endure ſuch a diſreſpect
" toward the Romans as muſt inevitably end
" in a rupture, by countenancing a war againſt
" them. So that you have no retreat left but
" a recourſe to God's power (in truth) againſt
" his providence; which is moſt evidently ſeen
" in the advance, eſtabliſhment, and protec" tion of the Roman empire.

* Thirty furlongs (as has been before obſerved) amounted to ſomething more than three miles and three quarters, Engliſh meaſure.

† Ten furlongs amounted to an Engliſh mile and a quarter, and fifteen geometrical paces.

CON-

Agrippa reflects upon the conſcience and religion of the war.

"CONSIDER again the conſcience and religion of the war, even if you yourſelves were the ſtronger of the two. How can you pretend to diſpenſe with the violation both of God's and your own laws; or to expect a bleſſing from heaven in the very act of your diſobedience? If you * keep the ſabbath-day as ſtrictly and religiouſly as you profeſs, and as your laws bind you to do you will moſt certainly be caught in the ſame ſnare over again that your predeceſſors were hamper'd in by Pompey heretofore: that is to ſay, by taking advantage of your ſcruples, and falling upon you on thoſe days when you dare not ſo much as move a hand to defend yourſelves. Now if you make no conſcience of breaking the laws, in fighting one day as well another, how do you fight for the maintaining of them, and how can you look for any favour from God in the deliberate breach of his own commandments? Who ever made war but in hope of aſſiſtance either from God or man? and when both fail, what can be the conſequence but a voluntary wilful ſlavery? If this be your reſolution, what have you more to do, but to lay violent hands upon your wives and children, and to lay your glorious country in aſhes? The extravagant madneſs of the action will be ſome ſort of excuſe for it: beſide that it will ſave you the diſhonour of falling by the hand of an enemy.

'TIS a high point of wiſdom, my good friends, and, upon my word, a very neceſſary point, to foreſee and to provide for a ſtorm while the ſhip is yet in harbour; and it is as dangerous, on the other hand, to put off the conſideration of it till the tempeſt is upon you, and then ſtand trembling, and at your wits end, which way to turn yourſelves. As for thoſe calamities that threaten us at unawares, and by ſurprize, people that fall into them are to be pity'd; for there's no preventing of evils not to be foreſeen: but for men that run headlong into viſible hazards, they fall not only unlamented, but with infamy alſo and ſcandal.

YOUR way of proceeding in this affair would almoſt perſuade any perſon of common ſenſe and reaſon, that you are already agreed upon terms with the Romans, how they are to behave themſelves in caſe of gaining their point: that is to ſay, with tenderneſs and moderation, and not according to the practice of other nations, with fire and ſword; burning your cities, extirpating your whole race, and deſtroying every man of you, upon the purſuit, that ſhall outlive the fury of the battle: for which way can you fly, but into the very mouths of your enemies; who are either the ſubjects of Rome already, or ſuch as live in fear of being quickly made ſo?

The cauſe of the Jews is one common cauſe.

"AND you are not to flatter yourſelves that this calamity will ſtop here neither; but all the Jews upon the face of the earth are to expect your fate, and the whole univerſe will join as one man, to the puniſhing of this rebellion. You will remember what I tell you now, when you ſhall ſee the ſtreets run blood, to gratify the impetuous violences of a few turbulent and hot headed counſellors. And the Romans are not to be blam'd at laſt, for doing only that which you yourſelves have forc'd them to; and you are then to conſider, on the other ſide, in caſe they ſhould ſpare you, what an impiety you have to anſwer for, in the abuſe of ſo much humanity and good nature.

"OR if you have no longer any ſenſe now of natural tenderneſs for your wives and children, have at leaſt ſome compaſſion for your capital city, and the ſacred walls of it; have mercy even upon the temple, your law, and the ſanctuary, which you yourſelves are now about to deſtroy with your own hands; for you are never to hope for mercy again from the Romans, after ſo ungrateful an abuſe of the dulgences you have formerly received from them.

"BUT to conclude, I do here call God and his holy angels, and our whole country, and all that is ſacred, to witneſs; that for my own part, I have done whatever in me lay toward your preſervation. If you will do as you ought to do, and follow my counſel, you may yet live in peace: but if you go on in this deſperate way of tumult and outrage, I will have no more to do with you."

THIS diſcourſe of Agrippa was ſeconded ſo effectually with the tears of his ſiſter Berenice, who was there preſent, that they both wept, and the people abated ſomewhat of their violence, and fell to muttering one with another, that their quarrel was not to the Romans, but to Florus, for the indignities he had put upon them. "And yet, ſays Agrippa, you do the very ſame things that the profeſs'd enemies of Rome would do. Have you not broken down the Antonian galleries; and do you not refuſe Ceſar his tribute? Now if you would remove all pretence of jealouſy, you have no more to do then, without any farther delay, but to pay the one, and to rebuild the other; for this is none either of Florus's fort or tribute."

Agrippa brings the people in ſome meaſure to their wits again.

THE people ſeem'd now to be argued into reaſon, and very orderly waited upon the king and Berenice up to the temple; where they apply'd themſelves immediately to the re-edifying of the galleries, and at the ſame time ſent their agents and officers up and down the province to collect the tribute that was unpaid; and the whole arrear, being the juſt ſum of forty † talents, was in a ſhort time pay'd in.

THE violent rage of the tumult being ſomewhat abated, Agrippa adviſed the multitude to ſubmit to Florus for the preſent, till Ceſar ſhould ſend them another governor. This put the people in ſuch a flame, that they did not only give him inſolent reviling language, but pelted him with ſtones, and drove him out of the city. The king was ſenſible of the contempt, to the higheſt degree; and finding the rabble ſo inſufferably bold and ungovernable, he ſent ſeveral men of quality to Florus at Ceſarea, to make ſuch choice out of them as he thought fit, to ſerve as collectors for the whole province; and ſo Agrippa departed into his own kingdom.

Maſſada ſurpriz'd, and the gariſon put to the ſword.

SOON after this, there was a ſtrong party of the rebellious faction gotten by ſtealth into Maſſada, a Roman gariſon; where they ſurpriz'd the ſoldiers, put all the Romans to the ſword, and placed a guard of their own people in their places.

The Jews reject the Romans cuſtomary ſacrifices. Eleazar the head of the faction; and this refuſal the ground of the war.

THERE happen'd at the ſame time another diſorder alſo, in the temple at Jeruſalem. One Eleazar, the ſon of Ananias the high-prieſt, a deſperate daring young man, and a military officer then in command, preſs'd ſome of his friends among the prieſts, not to receive any offering or ſacrifice but from the nation of the Jews. Now this was the very ground and foundation of a war with the Romans: for upon this inſtance of Eleazar's, Ceſar's ſacrifices came to be rejected, that were offered up in courſe for the welfare of the people of Rome. The high-prieſts, and the men of the beſt quality, declared themſelves extremely unſatisfy'd with the novelty of that prohibition; and with great importunities deſir'd the continuance of ſo pious a cuſtom as the offering up of prayers for princes and governors: but the mutineers were ſtiff and inexorable, depending upon the ſtrength of their numbers; for all that were for innovations were on their ſide, Eleazar being look'd upon more particularly as the head of the ſedition; a perſon (as I ſaid before) of courage, and in command. This occaſion brought together the princes, the high-prieſts, and the Phariſees of the firſt quality, to adviſe what was beſt to be done upon the preſent juncture: for they ſaw manifeſtly the mortal conſequences that threaten'd the city by this tumult. They debated the point, and came to this reſolution; to try what they were able to do toward pacifying the minds of the people. In order to this experiment they call'd the people together in a body, before the brazen gate, (as they call'd it) on the inſide of the temple to the eaſtward: and there they began their diſcourſe, with reflections upon the raſhneſs of the enterprize, and of involving their country in ſo deſtructive a war. From thence they proceeded to the unreaſonable ground of the diſpute, and the injuſtice of the cauſe: for ſo far were their predeceſſors, they ſaid, from prohibiting or refuſing oblations from ſtrangers, (which would have been a very wicked thing) that they were, in ſome ſort, a part of their worſhip: their preſents, as appears to this very day, being preſerved in the temple as ornaments, and in honour to the memory of the preſenters.

Men of the beſt quality are for moderate counſels.

The impiety and injuſtice of the prohibition.

BUT to be now provoking the Romans to a dangerous war, and to the ſcandal, if not the ruin, of Jeruſalem itſelf, by ſetting up new methods of religion (for this impious interdiction, to the excluding of all ſorts of people but Jews, from offering up prayers and oblations to God in his holy temple, imports no leſs:) this had the face, they ſaid, of ſo extravagant an impoſition, that the very inhumanity of it were not to be excus'd, even in the caſe of any private perſon: but to make it general, and to carry it to the whole people of Rome, and effectually, to the excommunicating of Ceſar himſelf, the affront muſt needs be unpardonable. But what if this contempt ſhould be turn'd upon us now, and we, that refuſe to offer up prayers and oblations for other people, ſhould not be allowed the liberty hereafter of worſhipping for ourſelves, when the city ſhall be left without all manner of diſcipline; all this we are to expect unleſs we repent, and make ſatisfaction, before Ceſar comes to the knowledge of the uncharitable and fooliſh things we have been guilty of already.

An affront to Ceſar himſelf

WITH theſe words ſeveral of the beſt read men they had in the Jewiſh rites and laws, ſtood forth with precedents and reports of the practices of former times, upon the point in queſtion; who did all agree and declare, that their anceſtors never refuſed the receiving of oblations from ſtrangers. But the innovators, whoſe buſineſs was war, not peace, gave no heed to what they ſaid; neither did the Levites ſo much as ſhew themſelves at the altar, being wholly intent upon the war.

Precedents and reports in favour of the practice.

WHEN the men of quality found that their authority had no influence over the multitude, but that the ſedition grew ſtronger every day than other, being ſenſible that themſelves were likelieſt to fall firſt under the laſh of the Romans, they laid their heads together, and agreed upon ſending deputies with inſtructions to make things eaſier to them; ſome to Florus, among whom Simon, the ſon of Ananias, was chief; others to Agrippa, the principals being Saul, Antipas, and Coſtobarus; which laſt was a kinſman of Agrippa's. Their buſineſs was to ſollicit them both, to come with ſome troops to Jeruſalem to cruſh the rebellion in time.

They apply themſelves to Florus and Agrippa for ſuccour.

THIS was the beſt news in the world to Florus, who long'd for nothing more than an opportunity to inflame the war, how calamitous ſoever in itſelf; as appear'd by the delay of his anſwer to the deputies, on purpoſe to give the rebels opportunity to gather to a head. But Agrippa, who was for the common good, had a mind to ſave both parties the beſt he could, the guilty as well as the innocent; and by that means to ſecure the Jews to the Romans, and Judea and Jeruſalem to the Jews. Beſides, he was well appriz'd how much his own intereſt was at ſtake too; whereupon he ſent two thouſand auxiliary horſe; that is to ſay, from Auranitis, Batanea and Trachonitis; with Darius at the head of them, and Philip the ſon of Joachim their general.

Agrippa ſends troops to Jeruſalem.

THE princes of the people, with the high-prieſts, and all that were for peace, received theſe deputies into the upper town; the lower part, and the temple, being already in the hands of the faction. They began a ſkirmiſh with darts and ſtones, and ſo proceeded to bows and arrows on both ſides, without intermiſſion: and ſometimes upon ſallies and excurſions,

A war begun in the city.

curſions, they fought alſo hand to hand. The rebels ſeem'd to be the more daring; but the king's men were better skill'd in the arts of war. The thing they principally preſs'd, was the forcing of the ſacrilegious faction out of the temple: while Eleazar and his complices labour'd as hard on the other ſide to make themſelves maſters of the upper town. The diſpute laſted ſeven days, without any manner of advance on either hand, but with great ſlaughter on both ſides.

A very great ſlaughter.

The feſtival of Xylophoria.

THE feſtival of Xylophoria (as they call it) now drawing on, which had the name from the cuſtom of carrying wood to the temple, to keep * fire all the year long, they excluded the rebels from their worſhip. But while a party of the Jews were abroad upon this office, a band of cut-throats (known by the name of Sicarii, from the privy daggers they wore) fell in among theſe people; and ſo improv'd the advantage, that the king's troops being overborn, both with hardineſs and number, quitted the upper town, and the faction immediately took poſſeſſion of it. They broke after this, into the houſe of Ananias the high-prieſt, and burnt the palace of Agrippa and Berenice to aſhes: propoſing in the next place, to ſet fire to the offices of record, and to deſtroy both together, that creditors might have nothing to ſhew for their money: not doubting by this contrivance to draw over all the meaneſt part of the people, and debtors into their intereſt; and ſo to turn the quarrel into a direct war of the poor againſt the rich, under the colour of aſſerting their liberties. The keepers, in fine, that had theſe papers and ſecurities in charge, abandon'd their truſt, and ſhifted away for themſelves; and both records and offices were all burnt. After this maim to the ſtrength and credit of the city, they apply'd themſelves more particularly to the proſecution of the war.

The king's troops worſted.

The faction quits the upper town, and lays all in aſhes.

Men of the beſt quality creep into ſinks and vaults.

IN this deplorable confuſion, ſeveral of the nobility and high-prieſts were forced to fly for their ſafety into common ſewers and vaults; others got into the upper palace among the king's troops, bolting the doors after them, and making good the paſſage: Ananias the high-prieſt, Hezekias his brother, and Agrippa's deputies being of the number.

THE faction contented themſelves for the preſent with the victory they had gotten, and the miſchief they had done; and ſo lay ſtill a while and paus'd upon it. But the day following being the fifteenth of the month † Lous, they attack'd the caſtle of Antonia; and after two days they carry'd it by aſſault, cut the whole gariſon to pieces, and burnt the place; paſſing from thence to the palace, where Agrippa's troops had taken ſanctuary, they divided themſelves into four bodies, and attempted the undermining of the walls; but the defendants were fain to keep cloſe, as not being ſtrong enough to venture a ſally. The aggreſſors all this while ply'd their works, and ſeveral of the faction, as well as the Sicarii, periſh'd under the walls. In ſhort, they fought day and night without reſpite: the faction, in hope of making the defendants deſperate by ſtarving them; and the defendants propounding to tire out the faction with the fatigue of a continual duty.

THERE was among theſe people, one Manahem, the ſon of Judas of Galilee, a crafty man, and an artificial orator: this was he that formerly upbraided the Jews, under Cyrenius, for profeſſing to worſhip one God, and yet at the ſame time owning the Romans for their maſters. This Manahem had a deſign upon Herod's arſenal at Maſſada; ſo he inveigled ſeveral men of quality into his party; took them along with him, and forc'd the place; arm'd a company of vagabonds and ſcoundrel fellows out of it; and, attended with them for his guard, he marched directly, like a little king, to Jeruſalem; ſets up for the head of the mutineers, and accordingly gave his orders in form, for the carrying on the ſiege of the palace.

Manahem heads the Jeruſalem rebels.

THE thing they moſt wanted was machines; for there was no working at the foot of the wall, within view of an enemy over their heads, to gall them from above: ſo that they began to break ground at a diſtance, and carry'd on a cover'd way to the foot of one of the towers, which they undermin'd at the foundation, and then propp'd it up with timbers to ſupport the weight. When they had finiſh'd the work, they ſet fire to thoſe timbers, and ſo withdrew: and thoſe pillars being conſum'd, the turret fell to the ground. But the king's troops were aware it ſeems of this ſtratagem, and ran up another wall immediately, behind the turret, to make the place good. This diſcovery, upon the fall of one of the towers, and when they reckon'd their work as good as done too, put the beſiegers into the greateſt aſtoniſhment and confuſion imaginable. But yet, for all this, the king's people in the palace ſent to Manahem, and the other leaders of the rebellion that were with him, for leave to depart: which was preſently granted; but only to the king's people, and others of his religion, who forthwith went their way.

A notable ſtratagem defeated.

The king's people get leave to depart.

THIS put the Romans who ſtay'd behind, quite out of heart, for they were neither able to deal with ſo vaſt a number, neither could they in honour deſcend to treat with rebels; beſide the hazard of lying at the mercy of men, who had neither honour nor faith. In this extremity they quitted the camp as not defenſible, and betook themſelves to the king's forts; as Hippon, Phaſael, and Mariamne. Manahem's people immediately breaking in as faſt as the ſoldiers quitted, killing all they could lay their hands on, ſtripping the places of all the furniture, and, in the concluſion, burning the camp. This action bore date the ſixth of the month ‡ Gorpieus.

The death of Ananias and Hezekiah.

ON the day following, Ananias the high-priest was taken up out of one of the sinks about the court, where he had hid himself, and his brother Hezekiah with him; and both put to death by some of the Sicarii. The faction set strict guards also about the forts; insomuch that none of the soldiers could make their escapes. Now, what with the ravaging of so many fortify'd places, and the death of Ananias the high-priest, Manahem was puff'd up into so vain and over-weaning a conceit of himself, that he became the most inhuman and insupportable tyrant upon the face of the earth; as if no man living had the spirit of government but himself. These outragious insolencies gave occasion to Eleazar, and some few of his confidents, to enter into a discourse one with another upon this subject. "It is insuf-
"ferable, (says one of them) that any man
"who has lifted up his hand against the Ro"mans in vindication of his liberty, should
"betray that liberty again to a private man;
"and truckle to such a master too, as even,

"ction. If there be an absolute necessity of "setting up one man above all the rest, Mana-
"hem certainly of all men living is not to pomp of a prince, both for his dress and train, in his royal robes, with his armed guards about him. While he was priding himself there in the ostentation of his glory, some of Eleazar's people made a violent assault upon his person; which set the people presently a stoning him, upon a fancy that all tumults would cease if he were but dispatch'd. His guards made a shew of some slight resistance, till they saw that the whole multitude were against him: and then every man shifted away the best he could. They kill'd as many as they could take, and after that hunted the rest out of their skulking holes. Some few got privately into Massada; as Eleazar the son of Jairus for one, who was Manahem's near kinsman: who afterwards exercised a tyrannical government in that place. As for Manahem himself, he was taken pitifully lurking in a place call'd Ophlas; dragg'd out of his hid-in ghole, expos'd, miserably tortur'd, and then put to death. His deputies and assistants were serv'd likewise after the same manner, and amongst the rest Absalom, who was the chief promoter of the tyranny.

THE people struck in all this while with the opposers of Manahem; fansying to themselves (as I have said already) that this would be a ready way to the working of an accommodation; whereas that party, in truth, was only an anti-faction to Manahem, that were setting up for themselves; not so much designing to suppress one tyranny, as to erect another. The multitude were at this time very earnest with the commanding men of the faction not to bear so hard upon the Romans, but rather to raise the siege and let them go; but the more they press'd it on the one side, the more were they against it on the other. When Metilius the Roman general, and the people about him had done all that was to be done for the defence of the place, and were now brought to the last extremity, they offer'd to capitulate with Eleazar, and to deliver it up with all that was in it, upon condition only of quarter for their lives. The terms were readily accepted, and Gorion the son of Nicodemus, Ananias the son of Saddaca, and Judas the son of Jonathas, were all three employ'd to ratify the treaty upon oath, and so to sign and seal the articles. So soon as the agreement was confirm'd, and the formalities over, Metilius drew off his soldiers without any manner of trouble or interruption, or the least suspicion of any; so long as the Romans were under their arms. But when, according to oath and compact, they came to deliver up their swords and shields, Eleazar's guards broke in upon them, seiz'd them, and barbarously assassinated them, without either resistance or supplication on the Romans part, or so much as any other reproach in their mouths than the bare syllables of oaths and articles. Metilius at last was the only man that escap'd with his life, and the only man that begg'd it too; which was however granted him upon a promise of judaizing, and submitting to be circumcised.

The barbarous perfidy of Eleazar.

THIS outrage was no mortal blow yet to the Romans; for what signify'd the loss of so many troops out of the vast armies they were masters of? But it was evidently a prologue to the destruction of the Jews. For here was in sight a war inevitable, on a just ground too, and a city (the principal in the quarrel) so polluted with perfidy and rebellion, that even if it should escape the vengeance of the Romans, divine justice would most certainly find it out. Never so mournful, so universally sad, and so despairing a face of things; and the innocent so involv'd in the dread of the common fate, as if they themselves were to be answerable for the guilty: and the butchery was so much the more afflicting and grievous, for being executed on a sabbath-day; upon which day we are not allow'd to do any work whatsoever, let it be never so holy.

Twenty thouſands Jews maſſacred at Ceſarea, on the very day and hour above.

UPON the very ſame day and hour, as divine providence would have it, there was a maſſacre of the Jews at Ceſarea, to the number of above twenty thouſand in one day; inſomuch, that not a Jew was left in the town: for Florus pick'd up thoſe few that fled, and ſent them in chains to the galleys. This butchery made the whole nation run diſtracted; ſo the Jews divided into ſeveral bodies, and diſpers'd themſelves. They began with ſome villages of Syria, and then laid waſte ſeveral of the bordering cities: as Philadelphia, Gebonitis, Geraſſa, Pella and Scythopolis. After this, they brake in upon Gadara, Hippon, and Gaulonitis; laying ſome places in rubbiſh, and burning others; and ſo they advanced to the Tyrian Cedaſa, Ptolemais, Gaba, and Ceſarea. They over-run Sebaſte alſo and Askalon, without any oppoſition: and when they had reduced theſe places to aſhes, they deſtroy'd Anthedon and Gaza; they rifled alſo, and laid waſte ſeveral villages upon the frontiers, and put to death as many of the men as they could catch. The Syrians, on the other hand, made their repriſals upon the Jews, not only in the vaſt numbers of them that were put to the ſword, but the perſecution extended to the very inhabitants of their cities. And they did this partly out of an inveterate hatred they bare them, and in part by way of prevention, in the weakening of an enemy. The ſtate of Syria, was at this time moſt deplorable; for every city had effectually two armies in it, and no way to preſerve either of them, but by deſtroying the other. The days were ſpent actually in blood-ſhed, and the viſionary fears of worſe, made the nights yet more uneaſy. The Syrians pretence was only to remove the Jews; but then they were ſo divided about others, whom they only ſuſpected to be Jewiſh, that as they thought it hard to put them to death upon a jealouſy; ſo they were afraid to let them alone on the other hand, for fear they ſhould be Jews.

Florus ſends others in chains to the galleys.

Miſerable havock made in Syria and thereabouts.

The deplorable ſtate of Syria.

THERE were ſome again that, of moderate and good-natnr'd men before, were now become hard and cruel, out of mere avarice, and the hope of lucre; for they rifled all they kill'd, and had the booty for their pains, as the reward for their virtue; reputing him the braveſt man that got moſt by his trade, for robbery was call'd victory. It was a horrid ſpectacle to ſee the ſtreets peſter'd with the dead bodies of men, women and children, that lay there, not only unbury'd, but uncover'd, without having ſo much as a rag over their nakedneſs. It was the ſame caſe with the reſt of the provinces too; beſide the dreadful proſpect of worſe calamities yet to come.

Mere avarice makes people hard and cruel.

THE Jews had hitherto made war only upon ſtrangers, but drawing toward the borders of Scythopolis, they found the very Jews of that quarter their enemies: ſo much did they prefer their intereſt and convenience, above either king or country. For the Scythopolitan Jews joined with the inhabitants of Scythopolis againſt the other Jews. But this agreement was manag'd with ſo much heat, that the very eagerneſs created a jealouſy of their good faith. For what, ſaid they, if theſe people ſhould jointly conſpire againſt them with the other Jews; ſurprize the town in the night, and then throw all at laſt either upon a revenge for their ſufferings, or the neceſſity of their condition? The citizens upon this occaſion, told the confederate Jews, that if they would prove themſelves to be men of integrity and juſtice towards ſtrangers, they ſhould withdraw for the preſent with their families into a certain grove there at hand. This they did accordingly, and for the two next days all was quiet at Scythopolis: but upon the third night, their ſcouts bringing them intelligence how looſe they lay, ſome faſt aſleep, others careleſs, and all off their guard, the men of Scythopolis fell upon them in this poſture, cut them all off to the number of thirteen thouſand, and ſeiz'd the pillage of their camp.

Jews againſt Jews.

Thirteen thouſand Jews put to death at Scythopolis.

AFTER this general account, I muſt not paſs over the death of one Simon, that periſh'd in this barbarous action. He was the ſon of one Saul; a perſon of condition, and a man famous in his time, as well for the ſtrength of his body, as for the greatneſs of his mind; both which faculties he had employ'd in the favour of the Scythopolitans, and to the wronging of his own country. He did daily executions upon ſeveral of the Jews living near that place, and would frequently put whole troops to the rout; inſomuch, that his ſingle perſon was almoſt equivalent to an army: but in the end, a vengeance overtook him anſwerable to his crime. For when he ſaw how the Jews were ſurrounded with the Scythopolitans, and ſtuck with arrows and darts all over the grove, Simon drew his ſword, and without aſſailing the enemy (for it would have been to no purpoſe to have attacked ſuch a multitude) he addreſs'd himſelf with outcries and exclamations to the men of Scythopolis. "How juſtly am I puniſh'd "here, ſays he, for the ills I have done, with "and for purchaſing your truſt and good will "the lives of ſo many of my fellow citizens! "Why ſhould ſtrangers be truer to me than I "have been to my friends and country? But I "am now to die, and it will not become a "man of honour to fall by the hand of an "enemy, but rather to do juſtice upon myſelf: "which will be an end and a puniſhment wor-"thy of me, and agreeable to the reputation "of a hero; that is to ſay, I will not put it "into the power of an enemy to glory in my "ruin, and to triumph over me in my cala-"mity." Upon the ſpeaking of theſe words, he took a view of his wife, his children, his ancient parents, and his whole family that were then about him, with both tenderneſs and rage in his eyes. While he was thus gazing as in ſuſpence, he took his father by the hair, ſet his foot upon him, and ſo ran him through. His mother's turn was next, and he kill'd her too; who ſeem'd willing enough to receive the ſtroke. After the father and the mother, he did execution likewiſe upon his wife, and his ſons; who appear'd rather to meet the weapon than than to avoid it; and by that means they prevented the enemy. But when he had put all his kindred to death, he heap'd them one upon another; and then advancing himself upon their bodies, he ſtretch'd out his right hand for all the people to take notice of it, and ſo plunged the ſword into his own bowels. This young man, for the force of his body and the firmneſs of his mind, deſerves to be remember'd with compaſſion: but whoever conſiders his fidelity to ſtrangers, and his unnatural inhumanity to his own brethren, cannot but confeſs, that in the end he was rewarded according to his works.

Agrippa removes him from his government. The rebels make themſelves maſters of Cypros. The Romans deliver up Macherus to the Jews.*

THIS maſſacre at Scythopolis was follow'd with ſeveral in other places after that example: two thouſand five hundred in Askalon; two thouſand in Ptolemais; a great number of the Jews put to death at Tyre, and more ty'd in chains: in Hippon and Gadara they cut off all that were ſtirring and active, impriſoning the reſt: and at this rate they were dealt with elſewhere, in proportion as they were hated or fear'd. But in Antioch, Sidon and Apamia, they were ſafe and quiet in the enjoyment of their lives and liberties: whether it was that they were not ſtrong enough to be dangerous, or out of compaſſion to a people that did not ſeem to have any deſign upon the ſtate, which ſeems to have been the more probable opinion of the two. As for the Geraſenes, they ſuffer'd the Jews that had a mind to ſtay with them, without any moleſtation; and thoſe who choſe rather to depart, they gave them a ſafe conduct to their own borders.

Several other maſſacres of the Jews.

THERE fell out at the ſame time a very unhappy buſineſs for the Jews in the kingdom of Agrippa. This prince having occaſion to give Ceſtius Gallus a viſit at Antioch, left one Varus, a friend of his and a kinſman of king Sohemus's, to adminiſter in his abſence. At that time, the province of Batanea ſent ſeventy of the beſt men they had, for wiſdom and quality, to deſire the favour of a gariſon; to the end that, in caſe of any commotion or tumult, they might be in condition to ſuppreſs it. Varus preſently ſends out a party of the king's troops to cut them all off upon the way. This he had the confidence to do, not only without the privity of king Agrippa, but much againſt his liking. It was his extreme avarice, that tranſported him to this impious outrage upon his countrymen: and after ſo flagitious a beginning, he ſtopp'd at no manner of tyranny or iniquity, but went on abuſing his power in every thing he did. When Agrippa came to underſtand, and to conſider the havock Varus had made he was loth, for Sohemus's ſake, to put him to death, but however remov'd him immediately from his government.

Agrippa takes a journey, and leaves Varus his deputy.

THE rebels in the mean while, got poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Cypros, upon the frontiers of Jericho; put the gariſon to the ſword, and demoliſh'd the place. At the ſame time another great body of Jews treated with the Romans in Macherus to deliver up the garriſon; who chuſing rather to part with it by agreement, than ſtay to be beaten out of it, render'd upon compoſition.

The Jews much in favour formerly with Alexander the Great; and no leſs afterwards with the Ceſars. A deſperate tumult in Alexandria betwixt the Jews and the Greeks; and they had laid all in aſhes, if Tiberius had not compoſed it. Tiberius turns his army looſe upon them, with a commiſſion to kill, burn, and pillage at pleaſure. Fifty thouſand Jews kill'd upon the place, and the reſt beg their lives. The implacable rage of the Alexandrians.

THE natives of Alexandria bore a mortal antipathy to the Jews there, from the days of Alexander the Great; who in acknowledgment of the ſervices they had done him againſt the Egyptians, made them free of the city; granting them all manner of privileges in common with the Greeks themſelves: and thoſe privileges were continu'd to them by Alexander's ſucceſſors, and a peculiar quarter aſſign'd them apart to themſelves; where they liv'd in a manner ſequeſter'd from the converſation of other people: being likewiſe entitled to the honour of calling themſelves Macedonians. When Egypt came afterward to fall into the hands of the Romans, the Jews had their old privileges ſtill continu'd by Ceſar and his ſucceſſors; but the Jews and the Greeks were perpetually claſhing; and though they ſuffer'd juſtice on both ſides for their miſdemeanours, all this had no other effect yet than to inflame the ſedition.

The Jews much in favour formerly with Alexander the Great.

And no leſs afterward with the Ceſars, when Egypt fell into the hands of the Romans.

THINGS were now at this time in extreme diſorder and confuſion every where; but nothing yet to what they were at Alexandria. The Greeks being met in an aſſembly, about an embaſſy to Nero, upon ſome extraordinary occaſion, there came ruſhing into the amphitheatre a mixed croud of Jews and Greeks. The Greeks ſet up an outcry that the Jews were enemies and ſpies; and in the ſame inſtant leapt at them in a rage, and fell upon them. They took three of the company, and the reſt got away; but thoſe three they dragg'd along, with a deſign to burn them alive. This commotion brought in the whole body of the Jews to their reſcue; who began with caſting ſtones at them at firſt, and, after that, they ran with flambeaux in their hands up to the amphitheatre, threatening the whole multitude to burn them all to aſhes. This they had certainly done, if Tiberius Alexander, the governor of the city, had not a little pacify'd the fury. And he did not effect this by violent ways neither, but by employing ſome of the moſt popular men among themſelves, to try if they could bring them to reaſon by gentle means and perſuaſion; adviſing them to moderation, and to have a care how they provok'd the Roman ſoldiers: the Jews all the while turning this formal gravity into ridicule, and venting their

WHEN Tiberius found that this uproar was not to be laid without mischief, he presently let loose upon them two Roman legions that were then in the city, and five thousand Libyan soldiers, that came by providence in that nick of time to plague the mutineers. Their orders were not only to kill all opposers, but to seize their goods also; pillage their houses, and then set fire to them. The word was no sooner given, but they march'd away to a quarter of the town that is called Delta: (where the Jews were then gotten together in a body) and there put their orders in execution to the uttermost extremity. The Jews plac'd their best arm'd men in the front; who for a while made a stout resistance: but upon the first disorder, they were scatter'd and cut to pieces; though in the mean time it prov'd a bloody victory. Death and destruction, in fine, never appear'd in so many several shapes: fire, sword, pillage, without either tenderness for infants, or reverence for gray hairs, or any distinction of age or sex; and the whole place overflowing with blood. There were fifty thousand dead bodies pil'd up in a heap; and the rest would have under-gone the same fate, if their stomachs had not been brought down to beg their lives. Hereupon Alexander in pity, bid the soldiers hold their hands; which they did at first word, out of the deference they paid to order and discipline. But the hatred of the Alexandrians was so implacable, that they had much ado to restrain them, even from insulting upon the very carcases. This happen'd at Alexandria.

The vast power of the Romans. The country comes in to Cestius, upon his march to Ptolemais: Agrippa joins him. Zabulon deserted, plunder'd and burnt. Cestius returns to Ptolemais. Two thousand stragglers of the Cyrians cut off by the Jews. Cestius removes to Cesarea. Joppa destroy'd; man, woman and child.

The vast power of the Romans.

CESTIUS finding the Jews every where possess'd with a spirit of rebellion, made his advantage of it in a vigorous prosecution of the war. He drew out his troops, and marched for Ptolemais. He took along with him the twelfth legion entire, which he had at Antioch; two thousand chosen men out of the other legions, four wings of horse, beside the king's auxiliaries: that is to say, two thousand horse, and three thousand foot of Antiochus's, arm'd all with bows and arrows; a thousand horse, and three thousand foot of king Agrippa's; a body of four thousand men of king Sohemus's; a third part horse, and the remainder of them foot, most of them archers. The people came trooping in to Cestius, out of the cities all the way as he pass'd to Ptolemais: not so good soldiers as his own perhaps; but what they wanted inconduct and experience, was supply'd with zeal to the cause, and spite to the Jews.

The country comes in to Cestius upon his march to Ptolemais.

AGRIPPA assisted Cestius both with his troops and counsel, and so the general march'd away with part of his army to Zabulon, the strongest city of Galilee, (otherwise called * Andron) which divides Judea from Ptolemais. When he came up to the place, he found all sorts of provisions there in abundance, but not one man to be seen in the town; for the people were all fled up to the mountains: whereupon Cestius gave his soldiers the pillage of the city. The general stood in admiration at the beauty and curiosity of the buildings; which were built much after the manner of Tyre, Sidon and Berytus; but notwithstanding this, he burnt and raz'd them to the ground. From thence he over-ran the whole country, destroying whatever fell in his way. When he had laid waste the territory, and set all the neighbouring villages in a flame, he left them in ashes, which done, he returned back again to Ptolemais. The Syrians hearts were so set upon booty, especially those of Berytus, that there was no getting them away; but a great many of their stragglers stay'd behind. The Jews took courage upon the retreat of Cestius; and falling upon the plunderers by surprize, cut them off to the number of near two thousand.

Agrippa joins him with his troops and person.

FROM Ptolemais, Cestius marched to Cesarea, and from thence sent a detachment out of his army to Joppa, with orders to preserve the place, if they could quietly get possession of it; but in case the inhabitants should put themselves in posture to defend it, they should then wait for the bringing up the rest of the army. The Romans, in fine, assaulted the place both by sea and land, and master'd it without much difficulty. For the people were so far from attempting to dispute it by force, that they had not room left so much as for an escape; but they were all put to the sword, men, women and children; masters and servants, without distinction; the city plunder'd and burnt, and the number of the slain computed to be about eight thousand and four hundred persons. They made the like havock with a body of horse in the neighbouring toparchy of † Narbatene near † Cesarea; where they laid the country waste, put great numbers of the inhabitants to the sword, seized their goods and estates, and bury'd their cities in ashes.

Cestennius Gallus commands in Galilee, under Cestius.

CESTIUS sent the twelfth legion also into Galilee, under the command of Cestennius Gallus, with a conjunction of as many other troops as he judg'd sufficient for the subduing of that province. Sepphoris, which is the strongest city they had, open'd their gates to him, and the rest of the towns had the prudence to follow their example: but for the mutineers and free-booters, they withdrew themselves to the mountain of Asamon, that crosses Galilee, and lies just opposite to Sepphoris. Gallus advanc'd upon them in their own post; but so long as the vagabond party kept the upper ground, they were too hard for the Romans, and kill'd upward of two hundred of them upon the encounter. But when the Romans came to take compass, and by little and little to gain the top of the mountain, and to deal with them upon even terms, the fugitives were presently routed: for neither were their ill-arm'd men able to stand the shock, nor they that fled, to escape the pursuit of the horse. Some few there were that say'd themselves by creeping into fastnesses and crags; but there were above two thousand of them cut to pieces.

Sepphoris and the neighbourhood side with the Romans.

The Romans too hard for the free-booters upon even terms.

GALLUS finding by this time that there was no more occasion for him in Galilee, drew off his troops to Cesarea; and Cestius with the whole army went to Antipatris. He was there given to understand, that a very considerable body of the Jews was gotten into the tower of Aphec, and he sent a party thither to dislodge them. But the Jews not being in condition to stand the attack, abandon'd it to the Romans, who rifled it, and then set fire to all the adjoining villages.

Gallus moves from Galilee to Cesarea; and Cestius with the army to Antipatris.

CESTIUS remov'd from Antipatris to Lydda; where he found only fifty men in the city; the rest were gone up to Jerusalem to the feast of tabernacles. He put those fifty to the sword, burnt the town, and so advanced by the way of Bethoron to a certain place called Gabaoh, about fifty * furlongs from Jerusalem, and there he pitch'd his camp.

Lydda burnt and destroy'd. Cestius encamps within fifty furlongs of Jerusalem.

THE Jews finding now that the war was brought home to their own door, even to Jerusalem their metropolis, laid aside the strictness of a festival, and stood to their arms. They reckon'd upon it that they had men enow; and in that confidence they sally'd out upon the Romans, with hideous clamours, and in a furious confusion, without scruple or any regard to the sanction of the seventh-day, (for it was now their sabbath, which among them is most religiously observ'd.) But the same rage that made them forget the conscience of the action, prov'd an advantage to them upon the execution of their extravagancies: for they repuls'd the Romans upon the first charge, disorder'd their front, and made so furious an impression into their main body, that if they had not been supported by a stand of foot that was yet entire, and a party of horse that came in to their succour in the very critical minute, Cestius and his whole army had been in danger of being lost. There fell five hundred and fifteen of the Roman soldiers in this skirmish: four hundred of them horse, the rest foot. There were kill'd upon the place two and twenty of the Jews. The two cavaliers that signaliz'd themselves in this action to the highest degree, were Monobasus and Cenedeus, two kinsmen of Monobazus the king of the Adiabenians. The next in reputation to these two worthies, were Niger of Perea, and Silas the Babylonian, who went over from king Agrippa, whom he had formerly serv'd, into the interest of the Jews.

The Jews make a furious sally upon the sabbath-day. The seventh-day's scruple laid aside.

Cestius and his whole army in danger.

THE Jews being now forced to a retreat, retired back again into the city; while the Romans drawing off also to Bethoron, were press'd upon the rear by Gloras, the son of Simon; who cut off several of them, seiz'd their carriages and baggage that they found upon the way; and carry'd them off to Jerusalem. Cestius continu'd three days after this in the field; for the Jews lay watching for his remove, upon the hills that overlook'd him: and if the Romans had but stirr'd, the enemy, in all probability, would have fallen upon them.

The Jews put to a retreat. The Romans draw off, and the Jews fall upon their rear.

The Romans steal away to Bethoron, and are beset by the Jews. Cestius saves himself by a stratagem. The Jews pursue them to Antipatris, and so give over the chace.*

WHEN Agrippa saw what prodigious numbers of Jews there were upon the hills and eminent places, he could not think the very Romans themselves altogether safe within reach of so formidable an enemy. So that he resolved to try, if there were any good to be done upon them by fair words; flattering himself that they might be reason'd perhaps into a better understanding one of another: or however, if he could not perfectly reconcile them, he might possibly be able to divide them, and abate something of the rancour of the quarrel. Agrippa, in pursuance of this resolution, sent two of his friends and officers, Borceus and Phebus, who were men of known fame and integrity, to offer them a league of alliance with the people of Rome, with an assurance of pardon and indemnity for all that was past, upon condition only of taking up other thoughts, and laying down arms. The faction, upon the hearing of this proposal, were so desperately afraid of the people's going over to Agrippa, in hope of this amnesty, that they resolv'd to take off the heads of the embassadors. They kill'd Phebus before he could so much as open his mouth. Borceus was wounded and got off: but the multitude were so enrag'd at the baseness of so wicked an action, that they forc'd the mutineers with stones and cudgels into the town.

Agrippa proposes an alliance with the Romans.

He sends Borceus and Phebus to manage the treaty.

This makes the people jealous.

They kill Phebus, and the other gets off wounded.

Cestius charges, routs, and pursues them to the walls of Jerusalem.

THIS intestine division gave Cestius the fairest opportunity in the world to break in upon the faction: so that he advanced up to them with his whole army; charg'd and routed them; following the pursuit up to the very walls of Jerusalem, and then march'd off again to a place call'd Scopus, about seven * furlongs from the city; and there he pitch'd his camp; where he lay three whole days, without attempting any thing upon the place; hoping perchance, that, upon second thoughts, the people within might come to themselves again. He sent into the neighbourhood indeed for corn and necessaries, and that was all he did.

Cestius advances with his whole army up to the city.

ON the fourth day, being the thirtieth of the month † Hyperbereteus, he advanced with his whole army in very good order up to the city; where the multitude durst not so much as stir for fear of the faction: nay, and the very heads of the sedition were so startled at the Roman conduct and discipline in their march, that they themselves quitted the skirts and out-works of the city, and withdrew into the temple. Cestius took his way by Bezetha; and in his passage forward burnt Cenopolis, and a place called the Wood-market; whence, advancing to the upper town, he pitch'd his camp near the palace. Now if he had but push'd it to an assault upon that nick of time, how easily might he have carry'd the place, and put an end to the war! But Tyrannus and Priscus, two of their generals, and several other great officers, corrupted with Florus's money, diverted him from his purpose: and this false step prov'd the absolute ruin of the Jews, and the source of all the calamities that afterward befel them.

And pitches his camp near the palace.

A mortal oversight occasion'd by bribery.

UNDER these circumstances, Ananus the son of Jonathas, and divers of the principal Jews, call'd out to Cestius, and offer'd to open him the gates; but he delay'd his resolution so long, either out of indignation, or of diffidence, that the plot was discover'd, and Ananus with his companions forced by stones from the walls, to fly for sanctuary to their own houses.

The gates offer'd to Cestius, who slips his opportunity.

THE Jews dispers'd themselves, upon this, into the turrets, to the defense of the walls, which for five days they made good against the utmost efforts of the Romans, though press'd with a most impetuous violence. On the sixth day, Cestius with the choicest of his troops and archers, gave an assault to the north-side of the temple; but was so bloodily gall'd with shot and stones from the porch and galleries, that the Romans were several times forc'd, not only to shrink and give way, but in the end directly beaten off. After these repulses, the Romans at last bethought themselves of this invention. The front clapp'd their bucklers close to the wall; and so covering their heads and shoulders with them, one after another, they join'd them in order, buckler to buckler, till altogether they made up a cover like the figure of a tortoise; which being proof against all the enemy's darts and arrows, the Romans were now at liberty to sap, and work upon the foundation of the walls, without any further danger: and the next thing they did was to attempt the firing of the temple gates. This put the faction into such an astonishment, that they gave all for lost; and a great many of them quitted the town upon it. The honest party were as much elevated on the one hand, as the rebels were cast down on the other; insomuch, that they called out to open the gates to Cestius, whom they look'd upon as their friend and preserver. Thus far it went; and if the general had but continued the siege never so little a while longer, the town had certainly been their own; but God in his just displeasure would not suffer this wicked and dreadful war to go off so. For Cestius, without ever heeding, either the good disposition of the people in general, or the desperation of the rebels in the town, by a kind of judicial infatuation, drew off his men all on a sudden, even when their hopes were at the fairest; and so, against all justice and reason, quitted the siege. This unexpected departure of Cestius put the revolters in such heart again, that they fell upon his rear, and cut off several of his people both horse and foot. He rested that night in a camp that he had fortify'd at a place call'd Scopus. The next day he continued his march with the enemy still at the back of him, as upon a pursuit, and killing him a great many men. The Romans had thrown up a trench with palisadoes on both sides of the way; where the Jews with their darts and arrows annoy'd the Romans extremely, in their march across the passage, without any revenge, or so much as turning their heads to look the enemy in the face. This they did, as not being in condition to secure their flanks; partly out of an apprehension of their mighty numbers, and partly for fear of breaking the order of their march, being heavy-arm'd themselves, and the Jews on the other hand light, and at liberty for excursions and surprizes, upon any occasion. Upon the whole matter, it was a terrible blow to the Romans, and cost the Jews nothing. The ways, in fine, were cover'd with dead and wounded bodies upon this retreat. Among the slain was Priscus that commanded the sixth legion; Longinus the tribune, and Emilius Jucundus major of the horse, beside common soldiers in abundance; but got at last, with the loss of a great part of their baggage to Gabaoh; where they had encamped before.

Another gross mistake.

Cestius quits the siege.

The rebels take heart upon it, and fall upon his rear.

A dreadful blow to the Romans.

Cestius in a miserable distress.

CESTIUS was now at his wits end, and took two days time to consider what to do next. Upon the third day, he found the numbers of the Jews mightily encreas'd, and the whole country up in arms, and ready to fall upon him. He was sensible by this time that his delay had not only hinder'd but endanger'd him; and that the longer he ſtay'd, the greater ſtill would be the number of enemies he ſhould have to deal with.

THE general, upon this, order'd the army to be forthwith diſcharg'd of all encumbrances, for the eaſe and expedition of the march. The mules, aſſes, and other beaſts of burden he caus'd to be all kill'd, ſaving only enough to carry arms and machines; which he thought he might have further occaſion for; beſide the miſchief of their being employ'd againſt him, if they ſhould fall into the hands of the enemy. This was the ſtate and poſture of the army in their advance to Bethoron, and himſelf at the head of them. The Jews gave them no manner of interruption, ſo long as they continued in an open country; but when they came into hollow ways and defilees, they charg'd them front and rear to divide them from the army, and to force them further into the valley. The Jews in the mean time, from the rocks and the crags, pouring down their ſhot upon the heads of the Romans. While the foot was in this miſerable diſtreſs; and conſidering which way to turn themſelves, the condition of the horſe was much more deſperate; for they could neither advance up to the Jews to attack them upon the mountains, nor ſecure themſelves againſt them in the vallies; neither could they keep their troops in order againſt that ſhower of arrows that was poured down among them. To ſay nothing of thoſe that periſh'd by precipices and other miſadventures. They were in ſuch a ſtreight, in ſhort, that they could neither fight nor fly; and in this deſponding extremity, the Romans had recourſe to all the paſſionate extravagances of tears, groans and outcries, that are uſual in ſuch caſes; while the rocks and the vallies rung on the other ſide with tranſports of encouragement, joy, inſolence and triumph. So it was, in fine, that if the Jews had had daylight, the whole army of Ceſtius had been totally deſtroy'd; but night coming on, the Romans made a ſhift to ſteal away to Bethoron; where the Jews immediately ſecur'd all paſſes thereabouts, to cut off Ceſtius's retreat.

The Romans not in condition either to fight or fly.

Ceſtius had been utterly loſt if the Jews had but had day light.

The Romans ſteal away to Bethoron.

WHEN Ceſtius found how he was beſet, and the impoſſibility of his getting off in the face of the enemy, he bethought himſelf of a ſtratagem to aſſiſt him in his eſcape; that is to ſay, he poſted betwixt three and four hundred of his braveſt men upon the tops of the houſes, with orders to call out as loud as they could bawl, to the watches and the guards, like ſo many centinels, as if the army were not as yet decamped. While this was a doing, Ceſtius ſhrunk away ſilently with the reſt of his people, and marched about thirty * furlongs that night. But when the Jews came the next morning to find the place quitted, and the groſs of the army withdrawn, they fell immediately upon the four hundred Romans that had betray'd them into that miſtake, kill'd every man of them, and then put themſelves upon the purſuit of Ceſtius; but Ceſtius having gotten a long night's march before them; and loſing no time the next day neither, to get off, there was no overtaking them. The ſoldiers however fled in ſuch haſte and confuſion, that they dropt all their machines, their ſlings, and other inſtruments for battery and attack, by the way; which the Jews took up and made uſe of afterwards againſt the Romans. They follow'd the chaſe as far as Antipatris: but finding that they were got out of their reach, they took care of their engines, ſtripp'd the dead, gather'd their booty together, and ſo return'd to Jeruſalem with ſongs of triumph in their mouths for ſo great a victory, with ſo very inconſiderable a loſs. There were kill'd of the Romans, and their auxiliaries † four thouſand foot and three hundred eighty horſe. This happen'd on the eight day of the month ‡ Dius, and in the twelfth year of Nero.

The Jews purſue them to Antipatris, and ſo give over the chace.

UPON this diſaſter happening to Ceſtius, the moſt conſiderable of the Jews in Jeruſalem quitted the city as a ſhip ſinking in a ſtorm. Coſtobarus and Saul, two brothers, and Philip the ſon of Jacimus, formerly Agrippa's general, ſtole away and withdrew to Ceſtius; but Antipas their fellow-priſoner in the palace, ſcorning to ſave himſelf by flight, was put to death by the faction. The manner of it we ſhall ſhew hereafter. Now Ceſtius ſent Saul and his companions to Nero in Achaia, with an account of his misfortunes; but caſting the blame of the whole miſcarriage upon Florus. Ceſtius took this method, in hopes thereby of exempting himſelf from blame, and diverting the ſtorm upon the other.

The Jews quit Jeruſalem like a ſinking veſſel in a ſtorm.

Ceſtius ſends Nero word of the miſcarriage, and lays the fault upon Florus.

So ſoon as the news of this defeat came to Damaſcus, the inhabitants enter'd into a confederacy to deſtroy all the Jews of that place, computing with themſelves, that if they could but take them together in the baths, or ſome other publick place, the deſign might be eaſily put in execution. All their fear was, leſt their wives, who were moſt of them attach'd to the Jewiſh religion, ſhould come to get notice of it. The people, in fine, took their opportunity, when the Jews were at ſuch a meeting; the place narrow, and themſelves without arms; and falling upon them, cut the throats of ten thouſand of them in one hour, without any difficulty.

A conſpiracy at Damaſcus againſt the Jews.

Ten thouſand of their throats cut in one hour.

THE Jews that had chas'd away Ceſtius, being by this time come back to Jeruſalem, made it their buſineſs, both by menaces and flatteries, to draw over as many of the Romans as they could engage into their party. Upon this, they had a meeting in the temple about the election of officers for the government of the war. So they declar'd Joſeph the ſon of Gorion, and Ananus the high-prieſt, their governors in civil matters, and the affairs of the city; recommending to their care, in a more eſpecial manner, the rebuilding of their walls. As for Eleazar the ſon of Simon, though he had in his poſſeſſion a mighty booty that was taken from the Romans, a conſiderable ſum of money from Ceſtius, and a maſs of publick treaſure to a great value over and above, they did not think fit yet to confer upon him any commiſſion at all; looking upon him as a man of an imperious and tyrannical humour, and upon his friends and confidents alſo, rather as guards than companions. But this did not hinder Eleazar however from inſinuating himſelf, by little and little, into the affections and eſteem of the people: and he ſo far wrought upon them by popular arts, money and addreſs, that they thought no man ſo well qualify'd for a governor as himſelf.

Eleazar makes himſelf popular.

THE commanders that they ſent into Idumea, were Jeſus the ſon of Sapphas, one of the high-prieſts, and Eleazar the ſon of the new high-prieſt; therewithal commanding Niger, the preſent governor of that province, to obey their orders. This Niger came from beyond Jordan, from whence he was call'd Peraites.

THEY took the ſame care likewiſe elſewhere. As they ſent Joſeph the ſon of Simon to Jericho, Manaſſes beyond the river, and John the Eſſene to Thamna. And to theſe were added Lydda, Joppa, and Emmaus, to be adminiſter'd in the form of toparchies. John the ſon of Ananias was made governor of Gophnitis and Acrabatene, and Joſeph the ſon of Matthias, governor of both the Galilees; caſting Gamala alſo into his command, the ſtrongeſt place in the whole country.

Joſeph the author of this hiſtory.

THESE governors diſcharg'd their parts with chearfulneſs and prudence, every man according to his commiſſion. As for Joſeph, upon his coming into Galilee, the firſt thing that he propoſed to himſelf was to make ſure of the hearts of the people; an intereſt, which he knew, even in caſe of the worſt, would attone for ſmall miſtakes. He conſider'd farther, that the certain way to make great men his friends, was to admit great men into a ſhare of the government; and that the way then to oblige the whole multitude, would be to employ natives and popular inſtruments in popular caſes. Now Joſeph's method was this: he choſe a council of ſeventy, out of the elders, men for prudence and wiſdom the ableſt of the nation. To this council of ſeventy, he committed the whole government of Galilee, under ſome few reſtrictions. He diſpos'd of theſe ſeventy judges, ſeven into every city, with a commiſſion to hear and determine all common cauſes, in ſuch manner and form as he had preſcrib'd; reſerving to himſelf the judgment of capital cauſes, and matters of greater importance.

His principles and inclinations.

His method and form of government. A council of ſeventy.

THE ſeventy being thus diſtributed, and affairs regulated at home, Joſeph took alſo into conſideration what was to be done to ſecure them from abroad. He made no manner of queſtion but that the Romans would moſt certainly break into Galilee; and therefore he took care in the firſt place, to wall in all the defenſible cities; as Jotapata, Berſabee, Selamis, Pereccho, Japha and Sigoh, Tarichee and Tiberias, with the mountain Itabyr. He fortify'd alſo the caves about the lake of Genezareth, in the lower Galilee. And in the upper Galilee, Petra, of the Achabarians; Seph, Jamnith and Mero, Seleucia, Soganes and Gamala, in Gaulanitis. Only the Sephorites, being a wealthy, and naturally a martial people, had liberty to build their own walls. John the ſon of Levi, by Joſeph's order, wall'd in Giſchala too. As to the reſt of the caſtles, they were fortify'd by the direction and aſſiſtance of Joſeph himſelf.

The defenſible cities to be wall'd in.
